"Second. That all the forces in said Territory hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's notice to repel any and all such invasion.

"Third. Martial law is hereby declared to exist in this Territory from and after the publication of this proclamation; and no person shall be allowed to pass or repass into, or through, or from, this Territory without a permit from the proper officer."

Mr. BINGHAM. I do not intend to waste much time on that document. I do not intend to enter into a special defense of anything it contains. Suppose we treat it here as an authentic document emanating from this man who signs himself Brigham Young, Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs? What does it amount to? That he will resist any armed invasion. He is out in the wilderness, three thousand miles from the capital of the country. He is advised that an armed invasion is being made into his Territory. He has no evidence that the United States Government sanctions that invasion, or even knows anything of it. If Young is guilty of treason, first indict him for it, and try to arrest him and bring him to trial and judgment by the ordinary process of the law. Until you at least try to do this, you have no right to make his treason the pretext for the indiscriminate murder of his people. I put it to the gallant gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] whether upon a showing of this sort he is willing to send an army of invasion into that Territory not only for the purpose of destroying Brigham Young, but of putting women and children to the sword? That is the point which is involved here. It is not whether Young has acted wrong in issuing a document of that sort; but is there any evidence of the necessity of an increase of the Army, and the proposed invasion of that Territory? I have searched for that evidence, but I have searched in vain. I have challenged the production of that evidence from the other side, but I have challenged its production in vain; and until the evidence of that necessity clearly appears I shall not record my vote for this measure of blood and murder, so help me God!

One word more and I have done with this matter. If it were perfectly apparent that the proposed increase of the Army of the United States was necessary, as provided in this bill, while the bill authorized the President of the United States to control that force, I could not and would not vote it. I say that it is a humiliating confession to make, but I make it because it is my felt conviction that the President of the United States has already proved himself wholly unfit for the trust; and to-day let me say that, in my judgment, the House would be more in the line of its duty to prefer articles of impeachment against the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors than to vote for four or five additional regiments to be put under his control and authority. That necessity, as I have shown, does not exist; but if it did I could not and would not vote for this bill because it allows the President to control the new force, and I believe him unworthy of that trust.

I am not alone in this opinion, that the President should not be intrusted with this additional force, or with any additional force. This measure has been before another body in the other end of the Capitol—a majority of whom profess to be of the party of the President—and yet, strange to say, that body has rejected both these propositions of an increase of the Army, either by volunteers or by regulars. If his professed political friends refuse to intrust this additional power to the President, I think those of us who never professed, much less felt, over-confidence in the President, may be pardoned if we hesitate and doubt his fitness or fidelity. Mr. Speaker, I would not wantonly speak harshly of the President, but a sense of duty constrains me to say that, in my judgment, the President has proved himself unfit for the trust proposed to be confided to him by this bill. He has grossly abused and betrayed the power conferred upon him by the existing statute which authorizes the employment of the Army for the suppression of obstructions to the laws of the United States, or of any State or Territory. Under color of that statute, sir, he has sent three thousand of your Army into Kansas and its immediate vicinity to coerce its freemen into obedience to enactments which they never framed or authorized, which Congress never sanctioned, and which have no sanction but that of the usurpers and marauders who invaded and defiled that Territory.

As a pretext for this act of oppression, for this gross breach of trust, the President, in his special message of the 2d of last month, says, that ever since the period of his inauguration "a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in rebellion against the Government;" and that they "would have long since subverted the government established by Congress, had it not been protected from their assaults by the troops of the United States—that they have constantly renounced and defied the Government to which they owe allegiance, and have at all times been endeavoring to subvert it, and to establish a revolutionary government under the so-called Topeka constitution." I aver, sir, that this charge of the President against the people of Kansas, that they have been in rebellion against the territorial government established by Congress, ever since the 4th of March, 1857, or at any time, is a calumny—that it is put forth by the President as a pretext for the military despotism which he has wrongfully established over them, in violation of his duty, of their rights, and of the laws of the country. Against the President's assertion that there is or has been rebellion in Kansas, I interpose, and hold up to the House and the country his solemn declaration in his annual message, of the 8th of last December, in which he says that the rebellion in Utah is "the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories."

Both of these assertions of the President cannot be true. If there has been rebellion in Kansas ever since the President's inauguration—if that people have been "all the time" since then in resistance to the laws and authority of the Government of the United States, it cannot be that the rebellion in Utah is the first rebellion which has existed in our Territories. If this statement concerning the rebellion in Utah be true, the charge of rebellion in Kansas is false; and is, therefore, what I aver it to be, a calumny upon that injured people, and a shameless pretext for the President's invasion of their rights and betrayal of his duty.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM.] From what I had learned from the friends of volunteers, and from the friends of an increase of the regular force, I supposed that no objection was raised to the first section of the bill, providing for a regiment for the protection of Texas. The gentleman from Ohio has called for information, and I will give him information in regard to the necessity of that provision which may perhaps enlighten others as well as himself.

The gentleman has taken as evidence for the formation of his opinion, the memorial of the people of Utah which was read yesterday—a people whom the Executive of this country has thought it necessary to send a force to subdue. If, sir, he gives credence to that memorial, he will surely give credence to a joint resolution of the Legislature of a State at peace with this country. At an early day of the session, the joint resolutions of the Legislature of Texas were presented, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. Those resolutions stated that it was necessary that this additional regiment should be raised.

In addition to that, we have the request of General Twiggs that an additional force should be raised for the protection of the frontiers of Texas. In addition to that, the delegation from Texas have letters from the Executive of that State, and from their respective constituencies, stating that the Indians all along our borders are capturing and killing the inhabitants. If, sir, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] wishes information, I will refer him to those sources which will not fail to enlighten him upon the subject. Twenty-eight persons have been killed and captured upon the frontiers of Texas; and one woman and two children have been carried into captivity. Men have been killed in their fields, on the high ways, and on the prairies. Blood has freely flowed along our borders; and when the government of Texas has requested the commanding General of that department to protect the frontiers, he tells us he is powerless. And a few days since the Secretary of War informed me that the whole military force of Texas would be ordered to Utah. If the gentleman takes that Department for authority for his representations in one instance, he will take the authority of that Department in the report it has made to the delegation from that State. Then, when that is done, (the removal of the troops,) our frontiers will be destitute of soldiers, and the Kickapoos, the Wichitas, and Camanches, will cross the whole length of our borders. If they make repeated incursions into our State in the face of over two thousand troops, the moment they know that the soldiers are removed they will make a rush upon the defenseless inhabitants, and desolate our borders.

We ask for this force, again, because we believe it is the most efficient force for the protection of the frontier. Regulars have done their duty well, sir, elsewhere. I wish not to pluck one leaf from the laurels they have won. More gallant officers are not to be found anywhere than those that belong to our little Army; but, in order to protect the frontier of our country, place upon that frontier troops who are accustomed to the mode of warfare which is carried on there; place upon the frontier those who have been habituated to follow the Indian into his fastnesses from their early manhood, and who know how to meet him. When the Indians find that theft and murder will be surely punished, they will sue for peace; their treaties will be respected. But when they visit our frontier on a foray, and return to their homes on the mountains and the plains unharmed, and are never punished, it is an invitation to them to commit similar offenses again. But mounted volunteers, in threes and fours and fives, can follow similar squads of Indians to their retreats and punish them there. When they are punished they are conquered; and when conquered you may collect them on the reserves and try to civilize them. The Choctaws and Chickasaws have proved that the Indians can be instructed in the habits of civilized life. I will say, with all respect to the gentlemen on the Republican side of the House, here is an object worthy of your intelligence and philanthropy. Let us civilize these Indians, that once possessed those vast domains; collect them upon the reserves, and teach them to read and write, and instruct them in those arts that have made us the great and mighty people that we are. It can be done. The reserves upon the Arkansas frontier afford evidence of this fact; and the reserve upon our own northwestern border, under the direction of that efficient Indian agent, Major Neighbors, proves that fact.

These are the reasons why Texas asks for this regiment. You have now a frontier of over twelve hundred miles in length on our State to protect. That protection can be made efficient with a few artillery companies upon the Rio Grande bordering on Mexico; and with a regiment of volunteers ranging between the Rio Grande and the Red river, a distance of four hundred and fifty miles, you will afford a complete protection to the citizens south of that line, and drive back the Indians north of it. That course will be the least expensive. You will remove much of the expenses incident to transportation of supplies from the coast to the interior to supply those posts. Nearly one half of the expense incurred in protecting the frontiers of Texas has been incurred in the transportation of supplies. Nearly half a million has been expended annually in transportation. The ranger, on an emergency, needs no transportation but that which he carries upon his horse, and the grass of the prairie frequently furnishes that horse with food. He can camp where duty calls him, without a tent. He can go where duty calls him, without a kettle or a coffee-pot. He is accustomed to that life; he is identified with the soil; and in protecting the frontier he protects his home, his fields, and his fireside.

These are the reasons why we ask for this additional regiment. I trust that the gentleman from Ohio has received the information he desired.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Speaker, I propose merely to occupy the attention of the House for two or three minutes upon the question on which the gentleman from Texas has so eloquently spoken. I barely wish to repeat what fell from the lips of a distinguished gentleman from Tennessee, in a former debate in this body—I refer to Mr. Cave Johnson, formerly Postmaster General of the United States. Speaking upon this very subject, he once said, that, if the Government of the United States would give him the money and rations paid to our troops defending that frontier, he would guard it himself. I say, from all the observation of my life—and I have some knowledge of the Indian character, for I have mingled with them perhaps more than the gentleman from Texas has; I have seen them in battle and in various conditions of life; I say, from the convictions of my heart, that, if you feed the Indian and do him justice, he will never injure the white man. I refrain from further remarks from prudential motives.

Mr. SAVAGE obtained the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Will the gentleman allow me to offer an amendment to the original bill?

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield for that purpose. The SPEAKER. The amendment is not now in order, inasmuch as there is a motion pending to recommit; but it will be reported for information. The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "and required," in the third and fourth lines of the first section. Also add the following: Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of this act as authorizes the President to receive into the service of the United States one regiment of Texas mounted volunteers shall not take effect, or be in force, unless the said State of Texas shall remain in the Union, or so long as the said State of Texas shall occupy an attitude of hostility or disloyalty towards this Federal Union.

Mr. SAVAGE resumed the floor.

Mr. CURTIS. The hour is late, and the House is exhausted; and, as I should like to have my friend from Tennessee come fresh to the field, I will move to adjourn, if he will allow me to do so.

Mr. SAVAGE. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I move an adjournment. The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at twenty minutes to four o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. A. HARROLD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to Rock Island in the State of Illinois, and its use as a military reservation; which was ordered to lie on the table.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. WILSON. There is a sort of informal understanding amongst Senators that the floor on the Kansas question has been yielded by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foor] to the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] and it is thought best to have an evening session. For that purpose, I move that at half past four o'clock the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. FOOT. I suppose that will be taken subject to this qualification, that if a member should be upon the floor, and should not have quite concluded his remarks at that time, they shall not be interrupted if he prefers to conclude them.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes so.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented additional evidence in support of the claim of S. W. and A. A. Turner; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Ann L. Rogers, wife and assignee of John A. Rogers, praying for compensation for his services as examiner of the land offices in the States of Alabama and Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. KENNEDY presented a memorial of merchants of Baltimore, remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BENJAMIN presented the memorial of B. F. Simms and Arthur Barbarin, inventors of an electro-magnetic fog bell, praying for an appropriation to test its practicability and usefulness; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of the State of New York, praying that pensions may be granted to those who served in the war of 1812, and to the widows of those who have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. SEWARD, it was Ordered, That the letter of T. J. Bowen, on the files of the Senate, in relation to the exploration of the river Niger, in Africa, be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, it was Ordered, That the petition of Sarah Smith Stafford, with the adverse report thereon, be recommitted to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on

Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Hastings, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 207) for the relief of John Hastings, collector at the port of Pittsburgh. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that the President of the United States had approved and signed, the 16th instant, a resolution (S. No. 5) to authorize certain officers and men engaged in the search for Sir John Franklin to receive certain medals presented to them by the Government of Great Britain.

COURTS IN UTAH.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to make a short report, which I desire to have read. It is accompanied by a joint resolution, which I ask may be put on its passage at this time.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

By the existing laws of Congress, no expenses incurred in prosecutions before the United States courts within the Territories, for offenses against the territorial laws, can be paid from the funds of the United States. This, in the present condition of Utah, renders it impracticable for the courts there to administer the laws, and requires some temporary provision for the present emergency. The committee recommend the adoption of the following joint resolution:

Joint resolution (S. No. 22) providing for the payment of certain expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled, That the expenses of holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah, during the continuance of the present disturbances therein, be paid out of the judiciary fund, under the limitations contained in the existing laws in respect to fees: Provided, That on the restoration of peace in said Territory, the expenses of said courts, when exercising jurisdiction under the territorial laws, shall be chargeable to the Territory, or to the counties, as in other Territories.

The joint resolution was read twice by its title, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DISTRIBUTION OF DOCUMENTS.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 19) respecting the distribution of certain public documents, was read twice by its title.

Mr. HALE. Let it be read in full.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, &c., That the words "so many," in the third section of the joint resolution of January 28, 1857, "respecting the distribution of certain documents," be, and the same are hereby, stricken out, and the words "two hundred and fifty" be, and the same are hereby, inserted in their place; and further, that the words at the end of the section, "by him," be, and the same are hereby, stricken out, and the words "to him by the Representative in Congress from each congressional district and by the Delegate from each Territory in the United States," be, and the same are hereby, inserted.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope that resolution may be put on its passage, if there is no objection made to it. I will state exactly what it is, as I am informed from the House of Representatives. There are certain numbers of the Journals and documents which are ordered, by the act referred to in this resolution, to be delivered to the Secretary of State for the purpose of distribution to the several congressional districts. At the time the last census was taken, the number of Representatives remained the same, but there has been an increase of Delegates from Territories, so that there is a small deficiency in the number. It falls short of furnishing an equal number to each district and Territory.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the Senator to allow the subject to lie over until tomorrow. There is really no more annoying thing that I know of than the distribution of public documents.

Mr. SEWARD. I will state the object, and then I will consent to the postponement. The object is merely to increase the number by a very small addition that is necessary to give to each congressional district the same number intended by the law providing that the distribution should be made by Congress. With that explanation, I move that it be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Let it lie over until to-morrow morning. I do not know that I shall even insist on a reference of the subject to the Committee on Printing.

The joint resolution was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD subsequently said: A joint resolution from the House of Representatives, in relation to the distribution of some public documents, was before the Senate a few minutes ago, and its consideration was arrested on the motion of the chairman of the Committee on Public Printing. He finds it all right, on examination, and with the leave of the honorable Senator from Georgia, who is entitled to the floor, I ask that it may be put on its passage.

The resolution was again taken up.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is no necessity for the reference of the joint resolution. It is a very simple matter, and may as well be passed at once.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

QUESTION OF ORDER.

Mr. STUART. On last Monday evening a motion was made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] that the Chair be directed to request the Sergeant-at-Arms to send for absent members. I raised a question that such a motion was not in order. The Chair decided that it was; and from that decision I appealed. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] moved to lay that appeal on the table, and it was done. I now move to proceed to the consideration of that appeal, and upon that question I ask for the yeas and nays.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will take the liberty of saying to the Senator from Michigan, as he recollects the decision made by him, that he ruled to be in order a motion by the Senator from New Hampshire to direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to request the attendance of absent Senators. The Chair subsequently ruled that, at that period of the session of the Senate, in his opinion, there was no power, in less than a quorum, to compel the attendance of absent Senators.

Mr. STUART. That may be. I only want to take up the question of the appeal which was laid on the table; and I say very frankly that my object is to bring the attention of the Senate to it at this time, to show that there is nothing here, and that there was nothing then to lay upon the table, to show the absurdity of the proposition; because a subject which could be laid on the table would remain there to be taken up at any subsequent time. My point was, that a mere motion could not be laid on the table; and when I took the appeal, the Senator from Ohio seemed to think that it could be laid on the table. I did not wish to pursue a disturbing system of inquiry by the Senate, and I let it go. But at this time, when the Senate is calm and cool, I make the motion for the purpose of showing that there is nothing on the table now, and the honorable President cannot find what was laid on the table on the motion of the Senator from Ohio; the Secretary cannot find it. There is no paper there; there is no subject; and that is the view taken when the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] read from the Manual, to show that a proposition might be laid on the table, and it seemed to be considered that a motion was a proposition. A subject can be laid upon the table—such a subject as you can find again—and take up again when the Senate has disposed of the business under consideration, and is ready to proceed to the consideration of that. But, sir, if you are to look for this appeal of mine, laid on the table, you cannot find it; there is nothing there.

Now, sir, I have accomplished all that I desired, simply to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that a mere motion which can be renewed at any time, is not such a proposition as can be laid upon the table.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator insist upon his motion?

Mr. STUART. I have accomplished all that I desired.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is no motion made, the Chair will take up the business upon the Calendar.

MASSACRE OF EMIGRANTS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. I offer the following resolution, and if there be no objection I should like to have it considered at the present time:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate what steps have been taken, if any, to punish the parties implicated in the massacre of one hundred and eighteen emigrants to California, at the Mountain Meadows, in the Territory of Utah.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. GWIN. I have not called attention to the subject-matter embraced in this inquiry before this for the reason that I had supposed that a military expedition would have been organized in California for the purpose of cooperating in Utah Territory with Colonel Johnston. When it is considered that a force composed of as fine a material as the world affords could have left California, and, long before this, could have traversed half their journey to Salt Lake City, it cannot be denied, if the Federal Government need additional troops in Utah, that my supposition had some foundation. Contrary to my own ideas and vote, the executive authority has been denied by Congress the increased military means which were asked; and hence it is now apparent that no large force can be sent from California to Utah.

I am afraid that in this we have committed a grave error. I am afraid that if the Federal arms should be resisted by misguided and rebellious men, the power and dignity of our country will not be vindicated by so imposing a force as the serious necessities of the case may require.

But, sir, I am induced by reasons peculiar to my position as Senator from California, to invite your attention to the incidents referred to in my resolution.

In September last, an emigrant train, composed of fifty-six men and sixty-two women and children, according to the best information that I can procure, were passing through Utah Territory, on their way to my own State. They were on our own soil, engaged in no unlawful pursuit; and yet, Mr. President, they were all murdered except a few children. I am unable to give to you the details of this horrid massacre, as they still remain shrouded in mystery. All that I can tell you, sir, is that one hundred and eighteen American citizens, including in this number sixty-two women and children, have been massacred without cause, and that as yet their blood is unavenged.

It is true, sir, that this outrage was not committed within the limits of California, or we, ourselves, without awaiting the tardy action of the Federal Government, would have sought and obtained a bloody vengeance; but the murdered victims had an intention to become Californians. They had left their homes in what you call the Far West, and, gathering their household gods, had taken up their march for our golden land of promise. Nay, sir, when they had reached the fatal Mountain Meadows, their longing eyes could almost behold the snow-covered peaks of our mountain ranges.

In all that constitutes unity of feeling and interest, they had become citizens of California, and as such, sir, as a Senator of that State, I am here to ask an account of the blood of my constituents.

As I before remarked, the details of this awful massacre are not known. There is no doubt that the various Indian tribes in the vicinity of the Mountain Meadows were the immediate agents in this butchery; and, sir, it is lamentable to say that, in the opinion of many well-advised parties, the Mormons themselves were their instigators and approvers. Upon this point no such positive evidence has been received as would justify me in asserting positively that they were guilty; and charity will gladly avail herself of any doubt which would hold our common nature to be free from so horrible a crime.

It is true, sir, that an intelligent and respectable meeting of citizens of Los Angeles, after an examination into the facts, expressed their deliberate conviction that the Mormons were equally guilty with the Indians, and asked the interposition of the President.

But, sir, there is no doubt that the Indians are culpable, and whether their guilt be shared by the Mormons or not, still their responsibility is the same, and the exactions of vengeance against them are undiminished.

Mr. President, since the Americans commenced to travel over the plains, since our hunters and adventurous trappers penetrated the remote valleys and gorges of the vast country lying between the Mississippi and the Sierra Nevada, since the Indian tribes between the Oregon and Sonora lines first heard the American name, no such reverse, no such loss, has been inflicted on us as the destruction of these one hundred and eighteen emigrants. We are accustomed to pity the poor Mexicans along our frontier line who suffer from the fierce inroads of the Camanches and Apaches; but, sir, the sad history of their border warfare will show but few, if any, more mournful and disgraceful massacres than the one of which I am speaking.

The intelligence of this massacre has spread throughout the numerous Indian tribes. The impunity with which it was effected, and the richness of the plunder that rewarded it, will be incentive to similar acts. Heretofore, when American citizens traveled together, particularly in large numbers, no Indian tribe would dare to attack them, for fear of the vengeance of a Government represented to them as strong and warlike; but, sir, if this matter be permitted to go unavenged; if this reverse be unrepaired, our prestige is destroyed, and new and more frequent massacres will take place.

We are now opening up the center of this continent, we are crossing it with wagon roads and mail lines, and unless we crush these vile and savage tribes with a strong hand, we expose to dreadful massacres our citizens, invited to travel in these inhospitable regions by our own action.

I have before remarked that these emigrants were murdered without cause. There was a report, derived from the Mormons, that the emigrants had poisoned the Indians back at Corn creek; but investigation has proved this statement to be utterly unreliable, and I have no hesitation in stating my belief that it is a calumny on the unburied dead. Yes, sir, on the unburied dead! No Christian hand has ever extended the rites of sepulture to the bodies of these victims; and an American who traveled near there, in a Mormon train, a few days after, was informed, by Mormons living in the vicinity, that it would be unsafe to attempt their burial.

Therefore, sir, I ask that the Secretary of War may be charged to investigate this matter. If this be proved true, I hope that an expedition will be sent from southern California to inflict upon the guilty parties a vengeance so summary as to be talked of with terror in every wigwam in the great Salt Lake basin.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the resolution would be more perfect if it were to require an inquiry to ascertain who did this act—to find out first who perpetrated the act. Before we punish them, I think we had better ascertain who they were.

Mr. GWIN. We know that our fellow-citizens were murdered. There is not one left to tell the story.

Mr. HOUSTON. Some persons killed them. The Mormons are suspected of it. Some Indians must have been in the vicinity. Now, Indians frequently go several hundred miles to start an expedition for the purpose of killing the Indians resident near that place; and Indians from another quarter may come there, and be inculpated and brought into jeopardy, while those who committed the crime escape. I think the inquiry would be more proper to ascertain who perpetrated the act, and not make war without any foundation.

Mr. GWIN. It is well known that the Indians in the neighborhood had a part of the spoils. That has been ascertained. They were implicated; they ought to be punished, and every one to whom it can be traced. I have no doubt that an expedition, if sent there, could soon ascertain the tribe of guilty Indians, and the white persons, if any, who instigated it, as has been charged.

Mr. HOUSTON. That would be very unsatisfactory evidence, because Indians traffic, as well as white people, and exchange commodities. The murderers may have stripped them, and in passing back may have disposed of the articles to the tribes contiguous to where the massacre was perpetrated. I am opposed to this indiscriminate warfare upon Indians, or Mormons, or any other people, until their guilt is ascertained. I want the facts as to who perpetrated the crime ascertained, and then inflict punishment according to the offense. But to imagine that somebody has done it, and therefore that some one must be killed or massaced in retaliation, is not the way to retaliate; it is the way to produce war by inflicting chastisement, as they call it, on people who have perpetrated no offense on the Government. That is the way our Indian wars are kept up. The Treasury would be drained of hundreds of millions annually, if every occasion of an outrage were immediately to be redressed by falling upon the first Indians upon our extended frontier that are suspected, or upon any tribe, because they had in their possession articles taken on the occasion of a massacre.

A resolution requiring the Secretary to ascertain and to report the facts, I should be glad to pass; and if it can be ascertained who were the perpetrators of the deed, inflict upon them a punishment commensurate with their offense; but do not fall indiscriminately on the Indians who are at peace on our borders, and thus provoke hereafter the massacre of perhaps ten for every one that has fallen. We know that the Indians, if they can, never go unavenged of injuries done to them, and you may attack an innocent tribe that had no participancy in this transaction, and inflict on them a great wrong. Redress on their part is the consequence, and other innocent persons have to fall victims to this indiscriminate mode of warfare that we are conducting on our frontier.

Mr. GWIN. I did not think that a member of the Senate of the United States could be found who would object to punishing what we know has been one of the most outrageous massacres that has ever been committed in the country. What does the Senator propose? That we shall make inquiries; that is to say, send persons there to be murdered as these emigrants were. I ask that a force shall be sent there that shall punish these persons, and they will only punish them when it is ascertained who they are. That is what I propose. I want a force sent there of sufficient power to inflict the most condign and summary punishment on these murderers, who have massacred men, women, and children—American citizens—passing peacefully through the country, and then, after they were murdered and left unburied, bring forth a false accusation that they had attempted to poison the Indians, as some excuse!

It is a charge which has never been sustained by any testimony. All that I ask is that the murderers shall be punished. I do not want innocent Indian tribes attacked, and I do not expect they will be attacked. They have made this attack on American citizens. On nearly the only emigrant route now open to California this massacre has taken place. We hear a great deal of sympathy for the massacres of citizens by the Apaches and other tribes of Indians, but there is nothing like this atrocious deed in the history of our country. Not one of the whole party of one hundred and eighteen was left. They only spared a few children under five years of age, in order to make slaves of them; all the adults were murdered so that they should not have an opportunity to divulge who committed this terrible crime. I want a force to be sent there to make the inquiry, and then to inflict punishment. That is all I ask.

Mr. FOOT. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question and all other orders, and that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of the bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, which was the unfinished business yesterday.

Mr. GWIN. Does the Senator from Texas object to the passage of the resolution?

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not, if the gentleman will amend it in such a way as to ascertain—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Vermont is on the floor, and has made a motion.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) to provide for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. FOOT. The floor was assigned to myself upon the adjournment of the Senate last evening; and by way of explanation, I will remark that it has been a subject of mutual private arrangement among those, or a portion of those, at least, who expect to address the Senate yet on this subject, as to the order of time in which they will address the Senate. I took the floor last evening on the adjournment of the Senate in the absence of the honorable Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. BELL,] at his request and for his benefit, he having expressed a desire, to which we all cordially acceded, to address the Senate upon this question this morning. Aware as I was that whatever opinions that honorable Senator might entertain upon this important question were of vastly more consequence and importance to the country than any opinions I might entertain upon it, that whatever he might have to say upon this question would be sought for with vastly more interest by the country than anything I could say, or might be expected to say, I have most cordially resigned to him whatever right I may have obtained to the floor this morning, taking my chances, of course, to obtain the floor at some other time to offer a few remarks on this question before the close of the debate.

I also further understand, perhaps it is proper to say here, that by agreement between the honorable Senator from Tennessee and the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] the latter is to precede the former in the discussion this morning. I have thought it proper to make this explanation, as I am put on the record as having the floor assigned to myself this morning.

Mr. TOOMBS spoke for two hours in support of the bill, and in reply to Mr. CRITTENDEN's remarks of yesterday.

His speech was followed by an explanation from Mr. CRITTENDEN.

Mr. BELL commenced a speech in opposition to the bill, but had not concluded when the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock, p. m.

After the recess, Mr. BELL resumed, and concluded his speech.

Mr. FOSTER obtained the floor, and the Senate adjourned, at ten o'clock.

[The residue of this day's proceedings will be published in the Appendix.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, March 18, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. T. N. HASKELL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. HICKEY, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the joint resolution of the House respecting the distribution of certain public documents. Also, that the Senate had passed a bill entitled, "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to incorporate the Provident Association of Clerks in the several Departments of the Government of the United States, in the District of Columbia;'" in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

VOLUNTEER BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the bill (H. R. No. 313) reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; upon which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, if I had the powers of oratory and learning at my command I should not deem it proper to use them on this occasion. We have before us a subject of great national interest, requiring plain statements and common-sense views, rather than elaborate oratory; and if I succeed in presenting my views in a plain, common-sense manner, I will have done all that I intend to do on the present occasion. It is a subject of great importance; one which ought to call forth our most deliberate considerations, and one which has already elicited opposing views from various gentlemen. This is an attempt to establish a policy, different, to some extent, from the policy that has governed us in times past. The question is, shall we increase the military force of the United States? That question is addressed to us by the President and Secretary of War, and I always feel a great delicacy in opposing one who is considered my file-leader. I have been, myself, a soldier, and am a lawyer; and my habit, as a Democrat, has been to carry my experience, as a lawyer and as a military man, into politics. I acknowledge the great doctrine of following the flag and fighting under it, no matter in whose hands it shall be borne. It is a very great responsibility, when a man, at any time, or under any circumstances, refuses to follow his flag. But, in acting on this great subject, I acknowledge no command from any source. I consider that, on this subject, Congress is the highest authority. As I read the Constitution of my country, Congress has the power to declare war; Congress has power to raise and maintain armies; and Congress has power to provide for the calling out of the militia to execute the laws, and to repress insurrection or rebellion. It is our power; it is our responsibility; it is our duty; it is our high authority, to provide the elements of defense, by which the safety of this great country is to be guarded. We may receive the opinion of the Executive, as a suggestion, or advice; but it is not to be binding on us. It is the business of the Executive to take and use the force that we furnish; and if we furnish the Executive with a force different from what it asks, the responsibility is with us. I am ready to assume my share of the responsibility, for it is no part of my character to dodge responsibility. When we furnish the force which, in the judgment of Congress, is the proper force to meet this exigency, if the Executive fails to make proper use of it, let the responsibility lie on the Executive.

This is my law. This is my conviction of right. I am an advocate of the bill reported by the majority of the committee. I shall support it here; and I have supported it elsewhere. Hence it follows that I am one who has been willing to see such an increase of force as is recommended by this bill; and it also follows that I am not willing to see the increase of force recommended by the Secretary of War. And I will show my reasons why I am not in favor of the kind of force asked by the Secretary of War. I was a little surprised to hear my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] state that he was against the bill simply because there was another one recommended by the Executive, and cite the authority of the Secretary of War as the reason why we should support the bill introduced by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] instead of the bill reported by the majority of the committee. Now, sir, at the very outset of this discussion, I join issue with the Secretary of War. I take issue with him in the whole of that statement, cited by the gentleman from Ohio, wherein the Secretary of War alleges that it will not be doubted that an army, properly organized, constitutes at once the cheapest and most efficient means by which these indispensable services can be secured to the Government. Now, sir, I declare that statement to be, in its broadest sense, entirely in conflict with all past experience; and the proof brought here to sustain it wholly fails to do so. The tables on which the statements are based are wholly unreliable.

I know that by certain unfair assumptions this conclusion may be arrived at. But, sir, when these tables are scrutinized, their assumption is as apparent as the noonday sun. If you will take the account of cost of a volunteer for three months, and the account of cost for the regular for five years, it may be that the volunteer will cost most; but then when you come to make a calculation of what you get for what you pay, I stand here to maintain that the volunteer furnishes the cheapest service the Government has ever had in any direction whatever, and that they are the main defense of this great nation; and that hosted Army of which gentlemen talk so much, is a very small part of our national safety. If we were to rely upon that system which is endeavored to be settled and fixed for all future time, then, indeed, would you soon have an army establishment such as every European Power now has. I do not believe that is the intention of the Secretary of War, but I say the inevitable effect of his argument would lead to the establishment of a regular Army in all future time, for the defense of the nation; the effect will be in less than twenty years to fix an enormous military establishment on this country in time of peace. This, sir, is the first step for treading in the pathway which other nations have trod; and, for one, I stand here to oppose it. The whole system will have been reduced to that corps of regular troops upon which we are to rely in all time for our defense. Once establish that idea in the public mind, and I say it will not be twenty years before you will have a standing Army of one hundred thousand men in time of peace.

Sir, I am not willing to pass this bill, particularly when founded upon such reports and such military documents as those of the Adjutant General and the Surgeon General, which have been laid before us. It is true that we already pay an enormous sum for the support of a very small Army; but taking into view the vast military establishments of other Powers, and we have the cheapest national defense of any nation on the face of the globe. Why is it so? It is because of the universal reliance upon the fact that on the tap of the drum unnumbered men will rush to the battlefield from civil life, who will bear aloft the banner of the stars and stripes, and carry it on to glory.

Now, sir, I want to show, as intelligently as I can in the brief time allotted to me, that I have not characterized this policy too strongly. But, before I pass to that, I will read from the Secretary's report a few words, going to show what this Army is. The description given by the Secretary of War of our Army, leaves no doubt that that Army is not the flattering thing which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] seems to think it is. The Secretary says in his report:

"The basis of our existing system is the British army as it served in the colonies before the Revolution, retaining many of the defects, since corrected in Great Britain, under the experience and necessities of long wars. Provisions inconsistent with the existing system, copied from other nations, and partial legislation designed for particular interests, have augmented these evils, and we have committed the fault of adapting our fundamental organization to a time of peace, instead of basing it on the exigencies of war."

The Secretary goes on to point out many other defects of our present Army organization, saying that we have adopted many errors, and retained many errors, which should be stricken from the system; and if the gentleman will introduce a bill to reorganize the whole Army system it will have my vote. He goes on to say:

"If our Army was put upon the proper footing, the anomalous spectacle of having two thirds of our rank and file composed of foreigners would certainly not be witnessed."

Now, I understand from this same document, right here upon the same page nearly, that the Secretary of War tells us that the Mormon rebellion is composed principally of foreigners. Do you propose to fight them with an army composed of two thirds foreigners? Sir, what we wish to accomplish by this bill is to send there the citizen soldiery—men from home, men who have been raised among us.

Now, sir, I come to deal with the facts and figures presented in the reports of the Surgeon General and of the Adjutant General. I call the attention of the House especially to an examination of these reports, for they will find that the assertion made by these officers, that the regular service is cheapest, is wholly a delusion, notwithstanding the intimation that it is founded upon reliable figures. The data upon which they estimate the expenses of volunteers is taken from the three months' service, the most expensive in their raising. They have taken the regulars at the time when they were the least expensive. They generally go back to the time when a regular cost only some two hundred and eighty or three hundred dollars a year; and the estimate for the volunteers when the cost had greatly increased. I say, therefore, that these reports are the greatest delusions ever presented before a legislative body to influence its action, and I characterize them as such. If you will look at the reports, you will find that they rely in nearly every instance upon what Mr. Poinsett, the Secretary of War for Mr. Van Buren, said, and upon calculations made in 1839.

Who is this Mr. Poinsett, who originated the proposition that regulars cost less than volunteers? Is not the thing absurd in itself? The volunteer cannot eat more, and is not paid more, than the regular, and yet he is more expensive. Take this absurd proposition as you will, give the statements made all the force they can have, and where does this whole thing rest? Why, sir, as I have said, it rests upon something said long ago by Mr. Poinsett. They prove, indeed, that the regular is cheaper, by the same logic that the negro proved in what way the world was upheld. A negro philosopher exercised himself to ascertain how the world was supported. He gave the subject grave consideration. After mature reflection he arrived at the conclusion that it was an absolute fact, in the organization of the spheres, that the world was not a self-existing body, but that it rested upon the shoulders of a huge negro. Said a bystander, as our negro philosopher explained himself, "What does the negro stand upon?" "He stands upon a huge terrapin." "Where is the terrapin?" "Why, he is nowhere." [Laughter.] So in this matter. You trace the reports of the Surgeon General and the Adjutant General back to Mr. Poinsett's statement in 1839; and when you seek to know where Mr. Poinsett's statement rests, you find that it rests nowhere. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee whether the report of the Paymaster General, upon which Mr. Poinsett's communication to Congress is based, is not predicated upon the actual data contained in his office, in the Third Auditor's office, and in the other bureaus of the Government? It is not a conjectural or a speculative statement. It is founded upon the actual data of the office.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I have examined the report of Paymaster Towson so far as I could. It was made in the year 1838 to Mr. Poinsett. I say that it fails to establish the conclusions which have been stated here. How could it establish them? I put it to the common sense of every man. There is not a man to whom the proposition can be proved that the volunteer who eats and is paid no more than the regular is more costly than the regular. I say that the proposition is an utter absurdity. It is impossible of proof. The proposition goes back for the evidence upon which it is made to Mr. Poinsett. Who is Mr. Poinsett? You will find a fact to discredit Mr. Poinsett as a witness from the start. Look to the report which follows the one referred to, and you will find that Mr. Poinsett recommends to the American people to divide this country into eight military districts; he recommends that two hundred thousand militia shall be put under arms; that they shall be divided into squads of twelve thousand five hundred, or that twenty-five thousand should be allotted to each district. One hundred thousand men are to be held in reserve, and one hundred thousand men to be held in active service. When I say active service, I use the words of the report. That was the military recommendation of Mr. Poinsett, and he is the man upon whose authority rests the proposition that regulars are cheaper than volunteers.

I have not a word to say against the distinguished Secretary of War. He is a gentleman. I think he is a soldier. The opinions which he expresses in his communication to the House are rightfully taken from the officers in his Department, if he believed them. But the recommendation amounts to nothing if these opinions fail. The Surgeon General and the Adjutant General really are the witnesses. They are the witnesses to establish this proposition, if it can be established, which is to overturn the military policy of the country, and for the future do away with those gallant volunteers, whose bright deeds are undying in our records; whose valor achieved our liberties at the beginning and protected them since. These are the witnesses; and, sir, they stand here discredited at the start. I do not mean to be understood that they are discredited as honorable men, but that they are discredited as witnesses. They are discredited by the facts and circumstances surrounding them. It is a universal principle in law, that when a witness testifies under bias, and that bias is known, it discredits what he says. Let us see what position these witnesses occupy. It is to be expected that the Commander of the Army, the Adjutant General, and the Surgeon General, should favor an increase of our forces. It is the bias of their profession. It is that bias which always will control men, no matter in what sphere of life they move. When the farmer wants less land and lighter crops, when the merchant wants fewer goods and smaller profits, when the lawyer wants lower fees, when the preacher wants a slimmer congregation, and when the politician gets tired of being elected, then will these Army men get tired of an increase of the Army, and not until then.

My friend from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] in his calculation put down the cost of the soldier at $300 per annum. In fact he costs us about one thousand dollars per annum. He charges the volunteer in the time of high cost, and the regular in time of low cost. Now, that sort of calculation will not do. Gentlemen talk about the sickness of the volunteers. Look to your regular Army. The number of casualties in the Army by death, discharge, and desertion, during the year ending June 30, 1857, was five thousand seven hundred and twenty-nine—one third of the whole force; and in making this calculation no deduction for the losses to the Army occasioned by the last cause is made. Now, what do you think of that? Here is a loss, by desertion alone, of two thousand nine hundred and fifty-four men, making one fifth part of the force. And yet we are told that regular troops are the cheapest and most reliable force! Now, if they had put this argument on another ground, it might have been sustained; but they have put it upon ground untenable, unreliable, and that could not be sustained—namely, that regular troops were the cheapest force.

If Congress will declare Utah in rebellion, and not have the Executive make war on his own hook, then I will talk to you as to whether we ought to give ten or twenty additional regiments to carry on war. But I have not seen any proposition of that sort. If we think that the Territory of Utah is in rebellion, it does not become us, as the Representatives of the people, to stand here quietly and leave the Executive to struggle with the difficulty. It is our business to act; to take the responsibility one way or other; to declare war against that Territory, and to make provisions for its prosecution.

So far as I am concerned, Mr. Speaker, I think that there is a great deal of ignorance about the people of Utah. There are things there which ought to attract the attention of a wise and careful Legislature. Small though this matter may be, smaller things than that have grown into the mightiest empires on the face of the globe. When we look at the results of religious movements in all ages of the world, we find that, from small beginnings, they have grown to be very stupendous things. There seems to be a striking parallel between the case of Mohammedanism and that of Mormonism. We see that when Mohammed came upon the world, he was too insignificant to attract the attention of the Christian and idolatrous nations that surrounded him; but in a very short time we find him at the head of an army, going on to conquest. That such is the object and design of Brigham Young I have no more doubt than I have that the sun shines. I do not stand here to interfere with the religion of any human being on the face of God's globe. I wish all to travel their own road to heaven. For my own part, I wish to chalk out my own road, uncontrolled by any power on earth. So much as to my religious feeling in this matter. And let it be distinctly understood here, that my action is not in any degree controlled by what is considered the odious feature of Mormonism; nor do I wish to be understood as approving of that. I stand here, not as a priest, but as a legislator; as a man whose business it is to look at the rise and fall of power, and to maintain a Government which is the model of wisdom.

It has been stated by a distinguished Senator, that, so far as this odious feature is concerned, there are already, in many of the larger cities, such as New York and others, more polygamy than there is in the valley of the Salt Lake. I do not know how far that is true, but I know that, so far as the cities of my State are concerned, it is not true. But whether it be true or false, it has no effect upon me in reference to this great question. Whether the Mormons have two wives or forty, is not a question to be considered here. I do not know that, as a theologian, I could decide the question correctly. As a legislator, I believe it wrong to have more than one wife; and in making laws, I would make them in that view. I know that there are great authorities to the contrary. I remember, as I read the Holy Book, that there was a man, whose name was David, who was much beloved of the Lord, and who had many wives. I remember, too, that there was Solomon, who was the wisest of human kind, and who had seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines; and I remember that this same Solomon spoke three thousand proverbs and one thousand and five songs to the Supreme Being.

Still this is a question which we have now nothing to do with. But as a friend of this great Union, as a man whose business it is to look to the power and glory of the Union, I must look at the foundation of this Mormon dynasty; and that will show that it is the work of ambitious men, for the purpose of building up a power that should destroy the Union. I see, in the person of Joe Smith, not a deluded fanatic, not an inferior man—for he was a man who might have stood by the side of Cæsar, of Cromwell, or of Napoleon. He was a man of genius, though a priest. He was a man of ambitious design, and of steadiness of purpose, in a higher degree than Kossuth. And he is not mistaken about Brigham Young. He is the equal of Joe Smith. Look at his letters. No small brain could concoct them. Ambition is at the bottom of this matter. Brigham Young stands out like a second Cæsar. Having had command intrusted to him, he now insists on retaining it; and evidently shows that he is ready to make that last appeal which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] says is the trial of right by the highest tribunal. Whether he wins or loses, he seems to be fully prepared for the contest. He defies you. He spurns you. He hates you. The Mormons look to you as their great persecutor; the great destroyer of the power of their Church; the great enemy which, if they can conquer, they will be supreme.

Now I read from the proclamation of Brigham Young, which was referred to yesterday, declaring martial law in the Territory:

"Therefore, I, Brigham Young, Governor and Superintendent of Indian Affairs for the Territory of Utah, in the name of the people of the United States in the Territory of Utah, forbid—

"First. All armed forces of every description from coming into this Territory, under any pretense whatever.

"Second. That all the forces in said Territory hold themselves in readiness to march at a moment's notice to repel any and all such invasion.

"Third. Martial law is hereby declared to exist in this Territory from and after the publication of this proclamation; and no person shall be allowed to pass or re-pass into, or through, or from, this Territory, without a permit from the proper officer."

Can language be bolder? Can a declaration of war be more impudent? Cæsar, when he crossed the Rubicon, made no higher assumption than Brigham Young when he declared war. He does not march upon us, but he stands defying us to march upon him, and is ready to make that last trial in defense of his position.

Then, sir, Brigham Young has expressly declared that no soldier of the United States shall, for any purpose, set foot upon the soil of his Territory. He is already in open rebellion, so far as any act of his can place him in rebellion. I will read from a letter of Captain Van Vliet, who repeats the language of Governor Young himself. I read from his letter to the Secretary of War, dated 20th November, 1857:

"At present Governor Young exercises absolute power, both temporal and spiritual, over the people of Utah, both of which powers he and the people profess to believe emanate directly from the Almighty. Hence the opposition of the people to a new Governor, and the remark of Governor Young, that should Governor Cumming enter the Territory, he would place him in his carriage and send him back."

Sir, notwithstanding the humble petition which was read yesterday from the Territorial Assembly, saying that if you will send peaceable officers there they will obey them, I say that it is a false, miserable subterfuge, by which they seek to delay and divert the attention of their adversary. Now hear what Elder Taylor says:

"I heard Elder John Taylor, in a discourse to a congregation of over four thousand Mormons, say that none of the rulers of the earth were entitled to their position unless appointed to it by the Lord, and that the Almighty had appointed a man to rule over and govern his Saints, and that man was Brigham Young, and that they would have no one else to rule over them."

Now let me call your attention to an extract from the memorial which was read a day or two ago in this House:

"You have appointed, the newspapers state, a full set of officials for Utah from among entire strangers, and to do so were obliged to hawk about the offices from State to State, every honorable and principled man indignantly declining your appointments, until at length you succeeded in finding the requisite number from among the reckless, the drunken, the unprincipled, the dissolute, the houseless, and penniless, who alone feel the need of the backing afforded by bayonets, and for this reason had far better remain where society is more congenial to their depraved and corrupt tastes. No doubt such is the character of the present appointees; for what other class would accept offices among a people where they well knew they were not wanted, and hence had no right officially to be? All we have further to say of them is, they had better tarry with their friends, if they really have any."

Now, sir, can language be plainer than that?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee to be in favor of an additional force, and that a volunteer force. Hence I infer that he does not consider the present military force of the country sufficient to conquer that rebellious people.

Mr. SAVAGE. That is a military question about which I would like to say something. I say, sir, that the present Army is sufficient to conquer them.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That is my opinion; and I wish to state to the gentleman the reason why I agree with him in that opinion. I have some little knowledge of the character of these Mormons. They made a settlement in my State, at Nauvoo, and what was then the congressional district in which I live. They soon became numerous and powerful, and undertook to rebel against our laws and set up for themselves. They were guilty of great outrages, and defied all law. They raised a military force, and undertook to defy the whole power of the State. You might have supposed then, as now, from their proclamations and threats and defiance, that it would take the whole power of the Government to put them down. But, sir, when forbearance had ceased to be a virtue, and a small force of the citizens of the surrounding country undertook to expel them from Nauvoo, where they had intrenched themselves, and which they swore they would defend to the last extremity, they made no resistance, but ingloriously fled. These Mormons are a set of cowards as well as scoundrels. One of the men who signed that memorial that the gentleman has just alluded to—a man by the name of Rockwood—murdered a man in Hancock county, Illinois, in cold blood. He was arrested and kept in jail in my own city for several months; but, the Mormons having control in the county where the crime was committed, he was enabled to get clear. He went to Salt Lake City, and is now one of the chief priests of the Mormon Church, and one of the leading spirits in this rebellion against the Government, and which must be put down; but I contend that the force already in the field is amply sufficient for the purpose without additional force.

Mr. SAVAGE. I express no opinion as to whether the Mormons are cowards or not. My experience has taught me never to presume on a man's cowardice. It is something I never take for granted. But, sir, I say from my experience and observation, that five thousand men are amply sufficient to send out there. Sir, Cortez conquered Mexico with less than a thousand men. Scott marched to the capital of Mexico, and placed the American banner in triumph upon the walls of the capital, with a population of two hundred thousand, and in the face of an army near forty thousand strong, with less than ten thousand men—having only about six thousand when he entered the city. You do not want a large number of men. An immense army train is sufficient to cripple the best army in the world. If I had a world of soldiers, I would not send exceeding five thousand to Utah.

Mr. FAULKNER. I have already stated that there will be a column on the march in the month of May for the Territory of Utah, of near three thousand men; and I will inquire of the gentleman from Tennessee how he proposes to protect the eastern Indian frontier, from which these troops will be taken, and which frontier should be protected if this army is sent to Utah?

Mr. SAVAGE. That is the easiest thing I have ever tried to answer. I will give the President the charge of these five regiments of volunteers, and if he cannot protect that frontier with them, then I shall think the Secretary of War understands his duty very little. As far as protecting the Indian frontier is concerned, I would not give one single company of rangers, western border men, who know the Indians, for a whole regiment of these undrilled foreigners.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If the gentleman will permit me, I will make a suggestion in reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from Virginia. It is this: when Congress is in session the President of the United States has no authority to move soldiers from Fort Leavenworth to Utah; and if the Congress of the United States does its duty, it will regulate the departure and the march of the troops; it will countermand the movement of the regulars, and furnish volunteers in their stead. The attempt of the President to move the regulars is a clear usurpation of power on his part.

Mr. FAULKNER. Is the gentleman prepared to vote for a resolution here to recall the troops from Utah; those already sent there, and those proposed to be sent?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I will say to the gentleman, without a moment's hesitation, that, as a member of Congress, I am prepared to control the direction of these troops, and I am prepared to do that on my congressional responsibility; I am prepared to let the Executive know what is the determination of Congress on this subject, and to compel him to obey it.

Mr. SAVAGE. I will say that I am not disposed to interfere with the discretion of the Executive. I will furnish him with the troops; I think necessary; and if he makes an unwise employment of them, then the responsibility will be his. But I have not that want of confidence in the Executive to believe that there will be an unwise employment of those troops.

I think that it is not a matter of importance whether volunteers or regulars are sent there. If it should so happen that volunteers would be raised too late for this service, then I would be willing to see the regulars take up the line of march for that Territory.

I have been drawn from my regular course of remarks. I will now read another extract in regard to the charges made against us by the Mormons:

"The troops, which claim to have been sent by the Government, have openly said, from the time they have left the Missouri river, and even before, that they were coming to destroy the leaders of our people, and that that was their object. That has been their constant speech by day, and the burden of their songs by night. They have threatened to take our lives, and to sport at pleasure with our wives and daughters. That is their openly avowed object, but woe to all who undertake to accomplish it. We trust, therefore, that you will excuse us if we do not entertain a very exalted idea of your humane (?) intentions in sending armies hither. Give us our constitutional rights; they are all we ask, and them we have a right to expect. For them we contend, and feel alone justified in seeking."

Is it possible for us to misunderstand language so plain? Brigham Young, I was going on to remark when I was interrupted, has made a mistake. I have thought in times past, that if I were head of the Mormon Church, looking to its real intentions to secure power, I would have written a little more in the Mormon Bible, and made a prophecy, locating the promised land somewhere nearer the city of Mexico. In a short time the Church would have been ingrafted upon a weaker nation than is the United States. Then would the Church have established an empire for itself. But Brigham seems to have been more ambitious. He seems to look to the planting of his standard upon the bosom of the American people. The Mormon organization is, in its character, rather military than religious. Their leaders thirst for empire. Look to the history of all usurpers and of all aspiring priests, and you will find that Young and Smith are the representatives only of those who have gone before them, and attempted to build up empires. Their history is so much like that of Mohammed, that, strike out the names, and it is difficult to distinguish the difference. The first thing Mohammed did was to convert his wife. That was a small church. A short time afterwards, and he converted his slave. The third convert was Ali. When driven from the city of Mecca, the Church only had eighty-three members. It was not half so powerful as the Mormon Church when it was driven from Nauvoo. The first expedition sent out by Mohammed consisted of nine men, and was directed against a caravan. It is recorded as one of the brightest victories of the Ottoman empire, and as a great dispensation of Providence; yet when Mohammed died, he left troops enough to overrun the surrounding Christian States, and to conquer them.

Is it not evident that these Mormon leaders are seeking to establish upon this continent an empire of their own? Are we, then, to let the pestilence spread, or are we to cleanse our land of it? Are we to wait until the Church grows stronger and stronger? Are we to wait until it subverts the Republic? I want Congress to endorse the President in his movement against them. I want to see who will and who will not indorse him. I want this thing done upon the square. Brigham Young throws down the gauntlet. He wants war; let us give it to him. We know the power of appeal. Let war rage in the Territory of Utah, under doubtful circumstances, and you will hear appeals come up to us from every State of the Union. I have seen a jury shed tears under the cloquence of the advocate, while defending the most unworthy criminal that ever stood charged at the bar; and if this Mormon war shall commence under circumstances that will permit it to be an element of party warfare, the Mormons will not be without their defenders.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. You will remember, Mr. Speaker, the very judicious recipe of Mrs. Glass for the cooking of fish; first catch the fish. And I would like to inquire of the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. QUITMAN,] and also of the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] if they have considered whether there is any legal authority whatever for the use of the additional military force proposed to be raised under the bill, or under the substitute before the House? It seems to me that there is now, by law, no authority whatever for the use of this additional military force, or of any military force of the country, in Utah, under any state of things that has existed, that now exists, or that will probably exist hereafter; and that if there is to be an addition to the military force of the country, both the bills before the House ought to be amended. The bill of the majority of the committee should be amended in the sixth line of the fourth section, by adding, after the words "President of the United States," the following words: "be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ the military forces of the United States;" so that there may be authority on the part of the President to use the military force of the country, independent of these volunteers, in Utah. The bill provides that the volunteers to be raised may be used for the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah. This amendment will give the President authority to use not only these regiments of volunteers, but also any other troops; and it seems to me that that authority ought to be given to him. I do not suppose that it would be in order to offer this amendment now, pending the motion to recommit, but I indicate it as one that ought to be made. I would also suggest the necessity of inserting an amendment in the second section, seventeenth line of the substitute, as follows:

That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to employ the Army of the United States for the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah.

Now, sir, the Constitution of the United States authorizes the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed; but this is in subordination to another section of the Constitution, which provides that Congress shall have power to provide by law for the calling out of the militia to "execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and to repel invasion;" so that the power of the President is under such law, and such law only, as Congress shall see fit to pass. He has no other power. There are two laws, and only two, on our statute-books, giving authority to the President to use the military power of the country in any case whatever—the acts of 1795 and 1807. The act of 1795 provides for the use of the militia of the States in three cases, and no more. The law of 1807 provides that wherever he may use the militia of the States he may use the land and naval forces of the United States, in such cases and no others: so that there can be no doubt whatever that whenever the President may, by law, employ the militia of the States, he may also, by law, employ the regular Army or Navy of the United States. But he can use the Army and Navy only in those cases. Let me read this act of 1807:

"In all cases of insurrection or obstruction to the laws, either of the United States or of any individual State or Territory, where it is lawful for the President of the United States to call forth the militia for the purpose of suppressing such insurrection, or of causing the laws to be duly executed, it shall be lawful for him to employ for the same purpose such part of the land and naval forces of the United States as shall be judged necessary, having first observed all the prerequisites of the law in that respect."

I think, then, it is very clear that we must look to the law of 1795 for all the cases in which the Administration has the right to use a military force, of whatever description, in any case. That law enacts that, whenever the United States shall be invaded, or be in imminent danger of invasion from any foreign nation or Indian tribe, it shall be lawful for the President of the United States to call forth such number of the militia of the State or States most convenient to the place of danger or scene of action as he may deem necessary to repel invasion.

Now, it is not pretended that there is any invasion, or danger of invasion from a foreign State, or that the Army is to be used, or that this additional force is necessary to be used, to repel any invasion by a foreign nation, or threatened by such.

And in case of an insurrection in a State, this act further provides that it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, on the application of the Legislature of such State, or of the Governor when the Legislature cannot be convened, to call forth such number of the militia of the State, or of any other State or States as may be applied for, as he may judge necessary to suppress such insurrection. But there is no law or authority whatever, and I challenge gentlemen to produce any, for the President of the United States to use the militia or the Army—for now, by the act of 1807, the Army may be used wherever the militia may be—in a Territory. Our fathers were jealous of executive power; and they were wisely jealous of the Army; and they took care that it should not be used against the people of a State, except there should be a sufficient and legal occasion—an occasion to be ascertained by the people themselves, speaking through their own government. And, sir, wise was it that the framers of that act did refuse to grant to the President power to use the militia and Army of the United States against the people of a Territory—against those, indeed, who might be the majority of the people—on the call, not of the Executive elected by them, but of an Executive whom the President himself had appointed, thereby authorizing and enabling the President to make his own occasion—by the removal, if necessary, of a refractory Governor, and by the appointment of his own creature—for calling out the troops for the purpose of oppressing the people of a Territory; and who, as I have remarked, might be the majority of the people, standing in resistance to a faction.

I think, sir, it was no oversight that the Congress of 1795 neglected to provide that the President should have power, upon his own mere motion, to call out the Army of the United States for the purpose of trampling upon the rights of the people of the Territories. But suppose he is thus authorized; suppose the President has the power to employ the Army or the militia in a Territory: can he use either in Utah? He can only use them in Utah (provided he can use them in a Territory at all) upon the call of the Legislature, or, when the Legislature cannot be convened, of the Governor. Thus, sir, if the Legislature is in session, or can be convened, the President cannot remove troops to the Territory and use them there, without the requisition of the Legislature; if not in session, he must have the call of the Governor. But, sir, Brigham Young has not sent a requisition to the President for troops to conquer his own people, and he will not do it. The Legislature, which may continue in perpetual session there, have not called upon the President to destroy their own people, and they will not.

Mr. FAULKNER. Does the gentleman from Maine regard Brigham Young as the Governor of Utah?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I beg the gentleman's pardon. I had forgotten for the moment that he was not Governor. But, sir, it makes no difference, for this reason: the law requires the Legislature, if in session or if it can be convened, to ask for troops, before they can be called out by the President. The Legislature of Utah may continue in perpetual session; and so long as they do, the Governor cannot, upon his own motion, under the law, make a requisition for troops; or if not in session, they may be in a situation to be convened at any time. So much, Mr. Speaker, for the first section of this law. The second section provides that whenever the laws of the United States shall be opposed, or the execution thereof obstructed, &c., in any State—not in any Territory—the militia (or, by act of 1807, the Army) may be used to enforce the laws. The provisions of this section do not apply to the Territories at all; and I do not know by what authority the President has construed the law to authorize the use of the military power to enforce the laws of the United States in one of its Territories. But, even if this section applied to Territories as well as States, the President would not be empowered to use the Army at this time in Utah, to enforce the laws of the United States. He can only do this "during the recess of Congress, and until the expiration of thirty days after the meeting of the next session of Congress." Congress is now in session, and while they are in session it is for it to provide for the execution of the laws, if their execution is obstructed. Congress has taken care that when they are in session the President shall look to it for the means and authority to see that the laws are faithfully executed. It is a tremendous power to be vested in one man, the right to control the Army and Navy of the United States. It ought not to be left in the hands of one man, when it can be exercised by the Representatives of the people.

Mr. SAVAGE. I wish to ask the gentleman from Maine, if the President has not the authority to use the Army for the purpose of suppressing rebellion in a Territory, would he be willing to give him that authority?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the President should have authority, and authority equal to the emergency. I have no doubt of that; not the slightest; and I am willing at any time to vote for a law that shall give the President whatever power is necessary to quell the disturbance which exists in Utah. I do not believe there is a gentleman in the House, certainly not on this side of the House, who will refuse to give the President that authority. But while there may be, and, I think, is, a large majority for giving him authority to use the force now at his command, I do not believe it is necessary, that there is any occasion whatever, for enlarging the military force of the country. There always has been a wise jealousy in this country against a large standing army. The pages of history are covered with examples of the dangers of standing armies—examples which we now and at all times shall do well to heed. They are always increasing in numbers and power, and their tendencies are ever to extravagance—extravagance in all the departments of the Government—and to the centralization of power. Mr. Speaker, if we go on as we have gone on for the last five or six years with the Army, its expenses by the year 1865 will be greater than the entire expenditures of the Government ought to be. They have already exceeded the enormous sum of twenty millions per annum; and where they are to stop, God knows. Think of the power twenty millions give to the arm of the Government which spends it.

Mr. QUITMAN. While the gentleman is upon that point, I would ask him whether the President of the United States has not the right, by virtue of his command of the Army and Navy, to send the Army into any department in this country where he thinks they ought to be used, and whether, if the troops thus sent are resisted by the inhabitants of that portion of the country to which they are sent, he has not the power to reinforce them, and, if necessary, to fight? I think there is an entire misapprehension on the part of gentlemen as to the objects and purposes for which the President desires to send additional troops to Utah. It is to accompany the newly appointed civil officers of the Territory as a protection to them, and to establish military posts in the department of Utah, which has now become a military department of the Government. Now I ask the gentleman if the President has not the right, if the troops are obstructed in the performance of these duties, to repel that obstruction?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I do not doubt that the President has the right to station or sub-sist troops wherever he pleases; but I hold that, under the Constitution, Congress has the sole and exclusive right of declaring how, and when, and where they shall be used in the States and in the Territories. An officer in command might be justified, in the case supposed, in resisting, upon the general law of self-defense. Nothing should be left unnecessarily to the discretion of the officers.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to inquire whether my friend from Maine admits that the President may send the Army into the State of Maine, or into any State, and station it there, unless he is called upon to do so, not but what the President has the right to send the Army to any portion of the country when he has been asked to do it? But, sir, has he the right to send the Army into the gentleman's village or town and quarter it there, unless he has been called upon to do so?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The President of the United States has the power to send troops wherever, by law, there has been provision made for quartering them, wherever there are military posts or reservations; and I thought I should be so understood, without the trouble of qualifying my language. My opinion is, that the President would have the right to station troops in the Territories; for in all of them we have already established military posts, and they are themselves the property of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Maine to this proposition before leaving this part of his argument. The President of the United States, by virtue of his office, is clothed with the power of Commander-in-Chief of the Army. That, I understand, invests him with the right to direct the movement of the Army to whatever place the public service may require it to go. The gentleman makes the objection that the President cannot call out troops in the States for the suppression of rebellion and insurrection. Is it not true that this exception is for the preservation of the sovereignty of the States—that he shall not send troops into the States for the purpose of suppressing domestic insurrection and rebellion, without the consent and authority of the States—and without any intention to abridge the right of the President to send troops to the Territories, and anywhere else under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The President of the United States has authority to use the Army of the United States wherever and whenever, by law, he may; but when Congress makes a law he cannot go outside of that law. No matter what are the reasons for the law, no matter what is the occasion of it, he cannot step beyond it. I think the reason why the law did not extend to the Territories was because its framers did not intend that the President should have the authority to make his own occasions for using the Federal bayonets against its own citizens, in its own Territories. I think that is the reason why there was this omission in the act of 1795. One reason for the requirement in reference to States may have been that which the gentleman has suggested, but while Congress was keeping the rights of the States in safety, I think it did not overlook the rights of the people of the Territories.

Mr. MAYNARD. I will ask the gentleman a question. Suppose his position to be true that the President is not authorized to send United States troops into the several States of this Union; but suppose that in violation of his duty and his right, he does so send them, I wish to know whether that confers upon the people of the States in which they are sent the right to levy war upon the Government of the United States, and to make forcible resistance, and to drive them out by violence?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. There would then be at most one illegality against another; a case of cross-illegalities.

Mr. MAYNARD. Does the gentleman hold that the people of the several States of this Confederacy have the right when the Executive violates the law, in their opinion, to resist him by violence? And if so, who is to be the ultimate judge between them?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I have been talking about Territories and not States, but to answer the gentleman's questions, I suppose that the people have some rights; and, sir, I must say that if the President manifestly, palpably, steps beyond the law and wholly outside of his power, the people, in that case, are not bound to stand quietly and be shot down by a despot, by one exercising a power never granted to him. In such case the President would be no more than a trespasser, or if it comes to killing, a murderer. Does the gentleman deny that?

Mr. MAYNARD. I will ask the gentleman whether he predicates that upon the legal rights of the people or the ultimate right of a revolution which is beyond and above all law and all constitutions.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I think the people have a pretty good right to resist any illegal interference with them, no matter whether on the part of the President or any of his officers; a right recognized by law, too, though one must be sure where he stands before he resorts to it.

Mr. GIDDINGS. If the gentleman will yield to me, I will cite a precedent, a distinguished precedent, and one, I have no doubt, which will be acknowledged to have force by the other side of the House, as it comes from high Democratic authority. During the Dorr rebellion, in Rhode Island, the President ordered troops there. The Democrats complained, and took the distinct ground that it was a violation of State-rights for him to march troops through that State. This was Democratic doctrine then. It was Democratic authority that the President, without the consent of a State, could not march troops within its limits.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Just see what the doctrine shadowed forth by the gentleman from Tennessee would lead to. The President is to be the sole judge, and whatever he does has the vigor of law, and no man can resist the gross usurpations without subjecting himself to punishment—simply for resisting a known, admitted wrong-doer. The President has the Army, and he may use it where and when he pleases, whether he have authority under the Constitution to do so or not, and no man has the right to call him in question. If his marshal breaks into the gentleman's house, commits burglary, would the gentleman from Tennessee think his answer a good one, that he had the President's authority for so doing? I ask the gentleman whether he believes himself in the doctrine intimated in his interrogation?

Mr. Speaker, there are in this country two great dangers to liberty; one the Supreme Court and the other the Army. Of the two, I think the Army is most to be feared. It is itself, a power for the execution of its own designs. If we are wise and faithful we will resist all attempts unnecessarily to increase it, for experience has shown us that when once increased it is impossible ever again to reduce it against the immense power and influence brought to bear against a reduction. The safety of the people is, not to increase it. Our strength and defense is, and must be, in the militia of the country, composed as it is in my section, of the active, the intelligent, and the brave, the vigorous, educated laborers of the country, of all men the most efficient and useful that we have. They are equal to all occasions, as good for fighting as for other employments or enterprises, easy to be called out when their aid is required, ready to act, and in my unprofessional judgment, the very best soldiers that can be produced; for in an army of such, behind every gun there is a living soul, an intelligent, patriotic man. On such, sir, is our dependence in all cases; and we may ever rely on it. The relations of these men to society are not to be illustrated by calling them "the mud-sills of society;" a better figure would speak of them as the corner-stone of our institutions. They will do the thinking and the voting, and the fighting too, for their country, so long as it shall be a free country; and when they cease to do so there will be no longer a freeman within our borders, and the republican of this land, if republican there shall be, will breathe his prayers and aspirations for liberty in faint whispers and suppressed sighs. Sir, other classes of men we may spare, for their places will not be long unsupplied, but the intelligent laboring men of this country, from whose ranks the militia are formed, are the men on whom our republican institutions must forever rest, and when once they shall be broken down I know not by what power they are to be reproduced.

"Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them, as a breath can make.
But a bold yeomanry, their country's pride,
When once destroyed, can never be supplied."

Mr. CURTIS. The bill of the majority provides for just that kind of force.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is true. The bill does so provide, and in that respect it is right. But I think there is no necessity for any increase of the Army. If I believed there was any such necessity for the purpose of suppressing the rebellion or quelling disturbances in Utah, I would vote for the raising of volunteer regiments very cheerfully, provided power could be granted to the President to use the force for this purpose; but I do not think there is the slightest occasion for it. There is, as I have shown, no contingency in which the volunteers or the Army can be used in Utah; and there is no probability that any such contingency will exist, as the law now stands. And, sir, there has existed no exigency in which the President had a right to use the forces of the United States in Kansas. There is only one possible event in which he can use them under the forms of law and with a pretence of the authority of law; and that is this: Suppose this Congress should admit Kansas as a State under the Leocompton constitution; and further suppose the free-State men, who compose nine out of every ten of the people of that Territory, should say, as they must say, and act as they should and must act, if they would not be disgraced forever and ever—then, sir, and in that event, the President will be called upon by the Governor—his Governor Marshall—or by the slave-State Legislature there, to send the Army of the United States to Kansas, to shoot down our people, because they resist a constitution in which they have had no hand, and which is most hateful and abhorrent to them.

Sir, I will not vote for an increase of the Army that is to be used in any other way than that known to the laws of the land. Nor will I vote for a force that is to be used in fixing upon a people a constitution which they have not formed, and one which no people ought to have in any event, no matter by whom formed. I hold that the people of Kansas would be justified in resisting this constitution from its intrinsic defects, as well as from the manner of its formation; and I believe, too, that we here have no right to vote for the admission of Kansas under that constitution.

Mr. FLORENCE. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman's remarks are not in order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine cannot now discuss the propriety of the admission of Kansas.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am discussing the question of the increase of the Army; and it seems to me that my remarks are directly pertinent to that question. How is this Army, when increased, to be used? Is it to be used to enforce on the people of Kansas a constitution not republican in form, and to which they are utterly opposed? I submit to the Chair that that line of discussion is in order.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order for the gentleman, in his remarks, to assign reasons why he shall or shall not vote for the admission of Kansas. It may be competent for the gentleman to discuss the condition of affairs in Kansas in reference to the increase of the Army; but certainly not as to the question of the propriety of voting for or against the admission of Kansas.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. One reason why I shall vote against an increase of the Army is, that the Army may be used and is likely to be used in Kansas, for what? For doing what I hold to be wrong. If what it is intended to do be right I ought to have no objection on that account; but if it be wrong, then I ought to have objection; and I desire to show that it is wrong.

I was saying, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the Army ought not to be used in any contingency, to maintain this constitution—that it is not republican in form. The seventh article of the constitution declares that the right to property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of an owner to his property in slaves and their issue is of the same character.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman cannot discuss the question of the constitution of Kansas.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Very well, Mr. Speaker; I do not want the Army of the United States to be used for the purpose of enforcing a constitution which I desire to show very briefly was one which ought not, under any circumstances, to be made, and which a free people can not submit to. But if I am out of order I will pass from it.

I have not come to the determination, which I have here expressed in reference to my vote on this question, without a careful examination of the considerations which may be addressed to this side of the House to dissuade us from voting against an increase of the military force of the country at this time and for the present exigency. I will endeavor to present them fairly, and to state the reasons why they have not controlled my decision.

It is or may be said from the doctrines which you, Republicans, maintain, and the principles you profess, you ought to be willing to give the Administration the necessary means to execute, speedily and thoroughly, its purposes in Utah. You are opposed to Mormonism. It is a vile despotism and a hideous immorality. It is anti-Christian and anti-human. Its creeds are impious and its practices revolting. It makes men slaves and brutes. Seventy thousand of these people, intrenched in the mountains between us and our young empire on the Pacific, living in the practice of the worst and most debasing immoralities—liars, thieves, polygamists, blasphemers, murderers—are now in open rebellion against the Government of the United States. Are you earnestly against slavery and indifferent to polygamy? Dissatisfied with "Americans," but prepared to tolerate Mormonism? Certainly not. And here is this imminent and fearful Mormon question upon you; it must be decided now; it has already been postponed too long. The Mormons are now no mere handful of wretched fanatics in your midst, whom the laws of the land can easily take care of; but they are a large and rapidly augmenting community, drawing to their folds great numbers of the weak and ignorant, and also many of the strong and crafty. Seventy thousand to-day; the next census, if you let them alone, will find their numbers more than one hundred thousand. Have you considered how to get rid of this abomination, or when you will seriously try? Will you wait till they are stronger—will you tolerate, and not disturb them—or will you, since they are, of their own motion, in flagrant rebellion, seize this opportunity to vindicate the rights of human kind, and the honor of the American name? And who, in this work, shall be foremost but you, who are so deeply enlisted in the cause of human welfare—you, who have in your platform of principles and duties, declared with marked emphasis against those "twin relics of barbarism, polygamy and slavery?" Who, of all men, is bound by his principles and professions to tender his counsels, skill, and efforts to those who may be intrusted with the responsibility of removing this moral and political cancer from the body-politic? Who, if not the Republican?

Mr. GIDDINGS. There is one point to which I desire to call the attention of my friend from Maine and the attention of the country. We have passed no law prohibiting polygamy in the Territory, and according to my friend's argument, we are sending an army there to butcher innocent people. We have been told that we have no power to regulate the domestic institutions of the people of the Territories. The opposite party have denied that power, and now deny it. Now, I say that I will never send an army to that Territory until we have prohibited this crime by law. Let us say distinctly to the country that this vile and infamous crime shall never be permitted in our Territories, and then if the people of any Territory violate that law, I will send an army to enforce it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I am stating, and thought I was understood as stating, the reasons addressed to us on this side of the House to induce us to vote for this bill. Will you not, it is said, consider well before you refuse to the Administration the increase of military power, which, we are told, is necessary to accomplish the difficult but most important work it has in hand, in such way as to prevent the unnecessary loss of life, and a vast waste of treasure? If you refuse, may you not be held to a grave responsibility before the country? You say you have no faith in the President, none whatever; knowing the crimes he is capable of committing you dare not trust him. You allege that he has been transferred and made over, body and soul, to the slave oligarchy, and is laboring to his utmost to crush out everything like liberty and democracy in America. But the real question is, will you help him in these ungodly purposes?

Will you permit him to place you in a false position before the country, and weaken your power to oppose him in his attempts to subvert the Constitution he has sworn to support? He knows that on these Kansas and slavery issues he is defeated in all the free States, and growing weak day by day, in the northern slave States, and hence he is endeavoring, with his low, characteristic cunning, to raise up a new issue to take the place of those now before the people. He means to divert the attention of the country from slavery and Kansas to Mormonism and Utah. Let five hundred of our men be cut off in the gorges of the Rocky Mountains, and he will cause a cry to be raised in every dwelling in the North that the Republicans refused him troops, and hence this disaster to our gallant but unprotected little army; and then painting the vices and crimes, foul and loathsome, of these people, he will hope to excite a fury of zeal, and raise a storm of indignation against the Republicans which shall demoralize and break down their party, and insure the success of the pro-slavery Democrats in the next election, and, in the mean time, the accomplishment of his purposes in Kansas, and the complete handing over of the government—its prestige and power—to the unchallenged uses of the slavery propaganda. Now, are you willing to be caught in such meshes as these, and will you allow the President to obtain the advantage he desires by any such misstep on your part? Will you not, rather, signalize your loyalty to the central ideas of your political faith, by giving to the Administration a necessary power for the execution of a worthy object, leaving to it the responsibility of abusing that power? And can an abuse of that power work any very serious injury, in the worst event, to the cause of freedom; and may not your refusal to grant it, expose your party, which is its defense, to dangerous, if not fatal, assaults? On the whole, therefore, is it not the part of wisdom to vote the President the increase of force which he asks for, doing so in the least objectionable form? Will you not give him volunteers for operations in Utah alone, and for a limited period?

Mr. Speaker, I feel the force of these considerations, and am aware that events may go very far to justify their wisdom, but they have failed to convince my judgment of the necessity or propriety of increasing the military power of the country at this time. I believe the present force, if employed as it should be, is sufficient for all necessary purposes. It consists of some seventeen thousand men, not one thousand of whom, I think, are east of the Mississippi river. Twenty-five hundred are in Kansas; at least as many more can be removed from other stations with perfect safety. These numbers added to those now in and on the way to Utah, said to be about three thousand men, will constitute a force equal to the emergency, and as large, I presume, as is contemplated by the Administration as necessary for suppressing the disturbances in Utah. Inasmuch as these men can and ought to be employed in the Utah expedition, there can be only one reason why they are not so employed, and that is, that they are to be kept where they may be used to impose upon the people of Kansas a constitution which the slaveholders' Administration have prepared for them, but which they loathe and abhor, I shall hold, and doubt not the people will justly hold, the Administration alone responsible for any reverses which may befall the Army of the United States in Utah, or on its way thither. The Administration has the necessary and sufficient military force already, and only needs the authority of law to use that force in Utah.

Mr. CURTIS. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say that he has very much overstated the number of troops stationed in Utah. There were sent there only two thousand men. There are there now not more than fifteen hundred men, and by the next spring there will not be more than one thousand. Then in Kansas we have three thousand, which makes four thousand. These are all the regular troops which can be relied on to meet the emergency. The regular Army is too much scattered in Oregon, in Washington, and in Florida, to be collected in time for this expedition.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The gentleman from Iowa understands military matters much better than I do; but I had understood differently in regard to the numbers in, and on the way, to Utah, and the feasibility of removing men from other stations.

Mr. COVODE. In reply to the remarks just made by the gentleman from Iowa, I wish, with the consent of the gentleman from Maine, to state that I now hold in my hand a letter from an officer now in Utah, written at Fort Bridger, in which he says there are men enough in Utah; that they do not want any more men; that they have men enough to conquer Salt Lake City, if they were there.

Mr. CURTIS. I should like to know what officer that is.

Mr. COVODE. It is an officer of the regular Army, who knows all about it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I will state in reply to the gentleman from Iowa, that I understood the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BRYAN] to state yesterday that he had been informed by the War Department that the troops now stationed in Texas had been ordered to Utah. He says:

"A few days since, the Secretary of War informed me that the whole military force in Texas would be ordered to Utah."

Now, I believe, as I have before remarked, that the standing Army consists of about seventeen or eighteen thousand men in all—perhaps of about sixteen thousand effective men. Twenty years ago, when the northeastern boundary was yet unsettled, and a thousand troops were stationed in Maine, when a large force was required in the Florida war, our entire force consisted of only some eight or ten thousand men. Now, sir, at this day, I do not suppose there are a thousand men of the Army east of the Mississippi river; and there are something like fifteen thousand between the Mississippi and the Pacific. That is my impression from the weight of testimony before me. I may be mistaken. There are now nearly six thousand men in Utah and in Kansas, and more are being transferred from Texas and other points to Utah. So that I think there is a sufficient force now under the control of the President—so far as numbers go, authority to employ them only being wanted—to meet whatever emergency exists; and if, in consequence of his failure to forward troops from Kansas, or elsewhere, any sacrifice of life should occur, any disasters shall happen, the Administration alone will be, as I have already observed, responsible, and will be so held by the country.

Now, sir, while these are my views of what we should do, I have no disposition to censure or complain of the gentlemen upon this side of the House, or, so far as that goes, on either side, who believe with my friend from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] that the Army is not sufficient for the necessities of the service at this time, and who therefore will vote for an increase of the Army by regiments of volunteers. I agree with them that if we are to have any troops, they should be volunteers; but I cannot bring my judgment to say that there is a necessity for raising more men, and increasing unnecessarily the expenses of the Government at this time.

This debate has been protracted long enough, and, in my judgment, the time has arrived when it ought to be terminated; and if there is no gentleman who wishes to address the House on the subject, I will call for the previous question.

Mr. QUITMAN. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to make an amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. QUITMAN. By some oversight in copying the bill, some words were left out. I move to insert them, so that surgeons and assistant surgeons shall be provided for these regiments, if they are raised.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must first withdraw his pending motion to recommit.

Mr. QUITMAN. I withdraw that motion. I hope, too, the courtesy will be extended to the gentleman from Virginia, to allow him to submit the amendment of which he gave notice.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move my amendment as a substitute for the fourth, fifth, and sixth sections. It provides for an increase of the regular force.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw his call for the previous question. I want to express briefly the wishes of the people

I represent in relation to this bill. They have tendered more than two regiments to the President for this service.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I do not wish to detain the House long; but on a question of this importance, and one in which my constituents feel so deep an interest, I could not be content to give a silent vote. I am in favor of giving to the Administration troops enough to settle the difficulty in Utah. If the matter were open to contract, I would guaranty that the State of Illinois would undertake to subdue these Mormons, and force them into obedience to the laws of the country. In the early part of the session, I tendered to the President the service of two regiments from my district, to maintain the supremacy of our laws and the honor of the country. I stated, in my letter of tender, that, at a very short notice, two regiments could be furnished.

Now, sir, as to whether regulars or volunteers are best suited for this service, my mind is made up as to what is the true policy and the duty of this Government. We have had too many demonstrations of the gallant services of the volunteers to doubt their efficiency. I believe that, at the battle of Buena Vista, if our force had been composed entirely of regulars we would have been defeated. I am told that a distinguished officer stated that the volunteers had been whipped, according to the science and rules of war, twice, but that they did not know it. If they were whipped, they were like the boy we have all heard of—they would not stay whipped! They went there to win a victory, to maintain the honor and integrity of the country, and they did it effectually.

In my judgment, sir, there is no force equal to that of regulars and volunteers combined. There is a rivalry created as to which shall do the most efficient and the most gallant service. I believe that the glorious deeds of our Army in Mexico are attributable to the fact that the force there was composed of regulars and volunteers.

I am willing to vote any amount of troops I may deem necessary. I am not sufficiently conversant with the subject to say whether more troops are needed or not; but I am willing to take the message of the President, and the report of the Secretary of War. I have great confidence, too, in the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. QUITMAN.] He has seen service, and I am willing to follow in his lead in this matter. There may be one or two provisions in his bill which I would be glad to change. He provides that the troops shall be received in regiments. If they only give to my State one or two regiments, I shall be satisfied. But, sir, as we of Illinois are not exactly in good odor, just at this time, I am afraid that my constituents, much as they may wish to serve the country and to fight its battles, and much as they may wish to take out an old grudge against the Mormons for outrages committed by them in my State, unless some provision is made for receiving less than a regiment, will not have an opportunity to show their devotion to the country, and to help to maintain the supremacy of its laws.

When I got up I stated that I had no intention of making a speech; nor have I. I simply wished to express the views of my constituents, and, as I believe, those of the State of Illinois, in this matter. They are patriotic, and they are willing to vote any amount of men and money, at any time, to maintain the supremacy of the law, and the honor and integrity of the country.

Mr. BLAIR. Representing a region of country as much interested in this question as any other, I have for several days sought the floor, but without success. The principal points involved in this discussion, that I desired to present, have been already submitted by the gentlemen who have addressed the House, and they have been treated in much better language than I could hope to employ. It will be especially unnecessary for me to make any defense of the volunteers, after the able defense of that branch of the service by the chairman of the committee, [Mr. QUITMAN,] who reported the bill to the House, and I shall pass to other topics.

The question which I desire to present to the House is, whether the National Government is prepared to exercise a wholesome control over its dependent territories, distant three thousand miles from this seat of central power, or whether it is intended that they shall run riot yet longer in the privileges of "squatter sovereignty." I say it is the duty of the Government, and especially if it has any regard for the interests of the people who live in the valley of the Mississippi, to reduce the Territory of Utah to a condition which will enable the people of that valley to pass across the continent to the Pacific ocean. As it is, the Mormons have created a blockade in the midst of our own territories against the citizens of our own Government. They send to this body what they call a petition, or memorial, but which really amounts to a defiance of the Government, telling you which of the citizens of our Government shall go to Utah; and who shall not be allowed to enter that Territory. This House is called upon to entertain that petition, to consider it; and, if I am to take the speeches of some gentlemen upon this floor as indicating the sense of the House at all, we are to permit that people to settle upon the territories of this Government, and prevent the entrance into them of any persons obnoxious to them.

I do not exaggerate; I have their own words for it. They tell us in that memorial that we may send there the Governor and other territorial officers, but that we may not send other persons—these troops—because they may not come into the Territory with good intentions.

Not only is that true which they themselves have stated, but it is also true that they have driven from that Territory the civil officers we have heretofore sent there. And who knows but that they will drive out those whom we have recently sent there, unless they are accompanied by a body of men sufficient to support them? Who knows but what they will repeat the insolence of which they have already been guilty, and the outrages which they have already perpetrated upon American citizens?

I desire, Mr. Speaker, to call the attention of the House to some of the legislative acts passed by that people. I had in my hand the other day a copy of the laws of Utah, which, however, is not to be found in our Government libraries, where the law requires that it should be found. The government of Utah has never conformed to that provision of Congress which requires that copies of their laws should be sent to Congress. They have for many years enjoyed the privileges of squatter sovereignty, and have passed laws which have never undergone the revision of Congress as required by the law under which that government was organized. I obtained the privilege, however, of perusing that volume of laws at the hands of one of the officials who were recently driven from that Territory.

In that volume I find one law for the incorporation of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints, giving that body the power to hold property, personal and real, to an indefinite amount, and the power to inflict punishment for breaches of church discipline. These same laws have granted out to individuals among the saints all the valuable land in the Territory, and invested them with every valuable ferry privilege in the Territory. They have also imposed taxes upon all who pass through that Territory; and those taxes are paid to the Church. Now, sir, those lands have never yet been thrown open by the Government to preemption. It used to be the policy of this Government, up to a very recent time, to dragoon the citizens off from the public lands. But here a people who have very little claim to the clemency of this Government have absolutely taken possession of all the valuable lands in that Territory, and have partitioned it out among themselves.

They have established, among other things, an emigrant fund, by which they bring into their Territory as many as are useful to them, and as they are willing to allow to come in. They have legalized African slavery and the system of Indian peonage. I can refer gentlemen to the pages of the statute where these laws are found; and I will say to gentlemen who are desirous of consulting these laws, that they will find a copy of them in the hands of Mr. Burr, who was the late surveyor general of that Territory.

They also provide for the compromise of criminal suits between the indicted criminal and the prosecutor, at any stage of the suit before trial and conviction. They grant the territorial probate court a jurisdiction equal to that of the United States courts; and they forbid the reading of any law in the United States statute-books, or of any of the decisions of the United States courts, in their courts, under a penalty. They punish attorneys with fine and imprisonment for not telling what has been confided to them by their clients, and they authorize very loose construction of the laws, declaring that a law may be construed in any tense, and that the plural may be taken for the singular; a provision by which almost any construction in the world may be placed upon a law. They establish polygamy, and make its observance a religious duty.

I have already referred to the fact of their disposing of the lands belonging to the Government of the United States; and I will now also allude to another law, which may be found on page 120 of the statute-book, which was made for the purpose of harassing non-residents and driving obnoxious people out of their Territory, by a confiscation of their property. There never was such a system of laws invented as this people have. They have united every power, both political and religious, in the hands of one man; and by the connivance of this Government, for a series of years, that man was made Governor of the Territory, and has been kept in that position.

They come here now and complain, in their memorial or petition, as they call it; that we have sent to that Territory non-resident civil officers, while probably that Territory is the only instance among all our Territories where they have had a man appointed over them selected from among their own people. Now, sir, we sent to New Mexico, to a people who lived in that country years before almost any of our States were settled, and certainly before any of them were organized into States, and long before the American Revolution, a Governor selected from this part of the country. This case was made almost the solitary exception, on account, perhaps, of a tenderness of feeling for those people, who had some peculiarities which we did not then suppose would lead to the distressing consequences which have resulted. We have indulged them; and what has been their conduct growing out of the indulgence granted to them? They manufacture a code of laws intended to wrest the whole of that Territory from this Government, and to harass every man sent out there who does not belong to their persuasion, and rob them of their property and murder them upon the plains.

I believe that in any court of the United States Brigham Young and his Mormon followers would be convicted of the murder of Captain Gunnison and his party. It could not have been done by the Indians. All of Gunnison's party were found with their scalps on, and not a mark was found upon them that would indicate that they had been killed by the Indians. On the contrary, they died from gun-shot wounds, and the Indians in that part of the country almost invariably use the bow and arrow. There were other marks upon them, as proved by the party which discovered their remains, which indicated to every man familiar with Indian warfare, that they had been slain by the Mormons.

Mr. Bridger, an old mountaineer, who had lived in that country for upwards of thirty years, at a place now called Fort Bridger, was driven out of the Territory, and barely escaped with his life. He was robbed of all he possessed, and he came on here and hovered about the city of Washington until his feet were almost worn off, begging the Government to interpose in his behalf. But in that he failed. This Government has suffered more by that people, and endured more from them than any other Government in the world would have suffered and endured.

Now, gentlemen object to raising an army to rescue our own people there, for there are many of them now there, and to take back again our rights in that country, of which we have been robbed by those Mormons; and more and greater than all, to prevent that country from being blocked up against our own citizens who desire to cross the continent. I say that the people who live in the West and Northwest will not tolerate, for a single instant, that that country shall be blocked up against them by the Mormons.

Again, objection is made that we have force enough already. Gentlemen have argued that, if you withdraw troops from this place and that place, we have troops enough to rescue our people and to take and exercise wholesome control over that Territory. One gentleman has read to us the opinion of an officer of the Army. I am always very glad to hear what the officers of the Army have to say about matters of this kind. But, Mr. Speaker, if we wish to regain and assert our ascendancy in that quarter without bloodshed, if we want to accomplish what these gentlemen say we ought to accomplish, we must have such a force to proceed there in the spring as will command ascendancy without striking a blow. The larger the force you precipitate upon that Territory, in my opinion, the less bloodshed you will have, and the sooner you will command peace. With the force now there, you will not have peace without first a great deal of bloodshed, and the loss of many lives. And I would tell that officer in the Army, if he were here, that I would prefer that his commanding officer had three or four times as many troops under his command, with which to take Salt Lake City, than he now has, and that thereby would be saved the lives of many gallant officers and many men upon our side.

The policy, in my opinion, which this Government ought to adopt, would be to send there a force which Brigham Young could not resist, and which the people of Utah and Salt Lake City would know it would be impossible to resist; and then, without striking a blow, we should have a surrender. Otherwise, you will have the loss of many lives in the Territory, and a protracted guerrilla war from the heads of all the cañons in the country; and one which can be maintained by those desperate men, inured to the hardships of a life in that country, and acquainted with its geography, as no other people are, for a series of years to come.

Now, sir, I do not participate in the alarm which some gentlemen feel, that this army will be used elsewhere. In the first place, if it is the intention of the President to do the thing which they fear he will do, he has the army and the men with which to do it already in that Territory; and he is as likely to do it with those men as he would be if we gave him the additional five thousand volunteers, for it will make hardly any difference in the conflict which that act would provoke, whether he had these additional five thousand men or not.

As I said, I do not participate in that alarm. It may have been, and I believe it was the case, that the President, in the flush of his first ascent to power, did do mischief; but he has learned some lessons since that time which he is not likely soon to forget, nor the men who back him. He has learned that there is a power which can check his career, and which will not submit to have the Army of this country turned upon the peaceful citizens of this country, for an illegal and an abominable purpose. In my opinion, he has already learned that lesson from what has transpired since the attempt was made. If he has not learned it, and persists in going forward in the career he seems to have marked out for himself, he will meet with a power which can check his career. There is a mode of doing these things which the President well understands; and we all feel and know that it will be exercised if he undertakes to use the Army against the peaceable citizens of the country in Kansas.

Therefore, I do not participate in that alarm, nor do I intend to hold myself responsible here for refusing to do what I believe the country demands of us, for fear that the President, or some other man, may do some other thing equally obnoxious. I am as willing to confront him in this matter as to confront Brigham Young in the mountains, and to apply that remedy to his conduct here which I shall vote to apply to Brigham Young. I think, if he does persist, he may himself be a fugitive as well as Brigham Young, and the fate of Comonfort may await them both.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it is due to the exigency that we should at least place these troops at the disposal of the President, so that, if there should arise any emergency in Utah requiring the troops, he may have them. If, as gentlemen say here, there is no such necessity now, I argue that there may be; and if, as has been already remarked on this floor, any evil should befall the gallant army that is now shut in by the snows of the mountains, I do not wish, for one, that I individually, or the party with which I act, should be held responsible for that calamity. So far as anything has occurred already in this matter, we know where the responsibility is. We know that the planning of that campaign, and the imbecility which marks every step of it, are to be fixed upon the President and his Administration. We know that, if he had not kept the troops in Kansas to do a work which of itself was infamous, they would have been, before the winter snows fell, in the valley of Utah, and have brought that people to subjection. Now, while up to this period the responsibility does rest on the President from his failure to do his duty in this matter, I trust that we shall fix the whole responsibility on him and on the executive arm of this Government, in the future conduct of this campaign.

I have no difficulty—none at all—on the subject of the power of the President to move the Army into the Territories of this Government. Nor have I difficulties about the power of this Government over the Territories; and I trust that, if no other good thing comes out of this unfortunate affair—so to characterize it—it will give the last and fatal blow to that heresy of squatter sovereignty that has grown up in this land. I am one of those who believe as strongly in the doctrine of popular sovereignty as any man on this floor; but it is the sovereignty of the whole people of the country in regard to their territories. It is the right of the people of the country to govern what belongs to them; and I say it is rank cowardice to abdicate a power conferred on Congress by the Constitution, to shirk it off upon the first two or three hundred individuals that may reach a territory to be organized by this Government.

I make these remarks, Mr. Speaker, in view of what I have read from the laws of that Territory. I think that, while we are preparing to bring Young and his deluded followers into subjection, we should, at the same time, take proper measures to prevent the recurrence of similar events. I think that we should, before the adjournment of this Congress, pass a bill, copied from the bill organizing the old Northwestern Territory, giving to the Governor and judges of that Territory legislative power. It is the only means by which that Territory can be regulated, if it retains a territorial organization. These people have already, as is well known to the whole community, driven out from their midst every man who does not agree with them in their polygamist code; and now the Mormon community is nothing but a great brothel.

Mr. Speaker, I have not examined with a great deal of care, nor do I consider myself competent to pass to an examination of, the details of the bill before us. The confidence that I repose in the Committee on Military Affairs, and especially on those members of it who are most conversant with military affairs, would constrain me to vote for the bill they have reported. I shall therefore vote for the bill to place five regiments of volunteers at the disposal of the President, but I will not, under any consideration, vote to add a single man to the regular Army.

Mr. QUITMAN. I think now that this debate has been sufficiently extended, and that the views of all the subdivisions of the House have been presented on this bill. I therefore move the previous question.

Mr. GROW. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to give way for a moment.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would willingly comply with the gentleman's request, but I think we have already had debate enough on the bill.

Mr. FAULKNER. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLFAX. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Alabama to let the previous question be seconded, and then the gentleman from Mississippi can close the debate at this time; and that will give time for members to be sent for.

Mr. HOUSTON. After the previous question is seconded, a call of the House is not in order. If, by general consent, a call of the House can be then had, I have no objection. I simply desire to have members present when the vote is being taken.

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Mississippi will, of course, speak for some time,

Mr. HOUSTON. I am willing to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays, as I understand the gentleman from Mississippi intends to occupy his hour now before the previous question is seconded. Then the call of the House can be had.

The SPEAKER. Under the practice of the House, the gentleman from Mississippi can occupy his hour after the previous question is seconded.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then, with the consent of the House, I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FAULKNER. And I ask leave to withdraw the motion for the call of the House.

There being no objection, the motion was withdrawn.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi will withdraw his call for the previous question. I want to say a few words on this question.

The call was not withdrawn.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 70, nays 48; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. QUITMAN. After the somewhat protracted debate upon this bill, I shall endeavor to confine my remarks to those points which, in my judgment, need reply or explanation.

There seem to be two classes of opponents to this bill. First, those who distrust the Administration, and are therefore unwilling to place at their disposal any additional military force whatever. While some of these gentlemen admit that an emergency has arisen such as to require an additional force, yet their distrust of the Administration overrules their good judgment, and induces them to oppose this bill.

The other class is composed of gentlemen who desire to increase the regular standing Army. Well, Mr. Speaker, I think gentlemen who thus oppose this bill for the first reason, mistake altogether the views of the President in regard to the expedition to Utah. I do not appear here as a special defender of the President's measures. I have had no part in them, and perhaps might find, were I to look into them, some objection to the way the Army has been employed within the last year. But, Mr. Speaker, the President is right in his determination to support the officers appointed to take charge of affairs in Utah by some military force. The gentleman last up, on the other side of the House, [Mr. BLAIR] has presented this question in a very strong light. There may be some doubt whether Utah, strictly speaking, is in a state of rebellion or insurrection; but no man can doubt that it would be unsafe to send civil officers of the United States there to enforce the laws of the United States over that Territory, unprotected by a military force.

As I understand it, the Territory of Utah has been constituted into a military department of the Government, and the President wishes to station a sufficient number of troops there to prevent resistance to the laws, and to suppress the rebellious spirit which appears to exist there. No man in this House will deny that it is the duty of the President, as it is his right, to appoint officers to administer the government of that Territory, in accordance with the laws of the United States. Finding the laws made by the existing Legislature of Utah such as the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] has shown—finding that they are arrayed against the authority of the United States—who doubts that it is the duty of the President, in sending officers there, to protect them with a military force, not for the purpose of making war, but for the purpose of performing the peaceful duty of applying the laws of the United States to the Territory of Utah? Who doubts the propriety or even the necessity that they should thus be protected? Besides, it is the right, I believe it to be the duty, of the President, under existing circumstances, to station a strong force in that military department of the country. There is no intention, so far as I have heard, upon the part of the Administration, to make war upon the Mormons, or to murder their wives and children. On the contrary, I doubt whether there is a man upon this floor who does not know that the whole American people would repel the idea of making war upon the Mormons, if they submit to receive the officers legally appointed over them, and obey the laws rightfully made for their government. I see, therefore, no reason to suspect that this military force is intended to be used otherwise than on the defensive, and not in the aggressive. I doubt whether any man in this House will rise and say that he has any fears, if the Mormons will peacefully receive the officers of the Government, respect them as they should, and permit the laws to be executed in that Territory, that one drop of blood will be shed, or a single injury inflicted upon Mormon life, limb, or property, or even their social institutions be disturbed. However odious they may be, the Government has not yet pretended to interfere with them.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

NEW SERIES....No. 75.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. If I understand the distinguished gentleman from Mississippi, he informs this House that when this army is raised and sent out to Utah, it will find no work to perform there.

Mr. QUITMAN. Not if the Mormons submit to obey the laws.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. And he has no doubt the Mormons will obey the laws.

Mr. QUITMAN. No; I did not say that.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I understand him to say, then, that, in his opinion, they will not obey the laws. Then I propound to him this question: suppose they refuse to obey, and the Army are used as a posse comitatus to enforce the laws, and to assist the Governor and judges and marshal in the enforcement of the laws: the Mormons have the grand and petit juries; and if they are arrested, as they will be, my word for it that when this army gets there they will offer no resistance. If they be resisted, how can those laws be enforced? How can you enforce them when there is to be a Mormon grand and petit jury?

Mr. QUITMAN. I am told that the new government is now organized at Colonel Johnston's camp; that the court is in session, and progressing with its business. If without forcible resistance the execution of the laws be defeated, we may be compelled to repeal their territorial acts; we may be compelled to place them under the government of some adjoining Territory. Whenever it is clearly manifested that the laws cannot be enforced through the ordinary channels of the courts of justice and the ministerial officers, then it is time for us to resort to some other means for their enforcement. So long as we can, we should endeavor to pursue justice through its ordinary channels; but if Mormon juries and Mormon judges will not suffer the law to be executed, then we must devise some means, by changing the territorial organization or otherwise, to transfer the trials before the courts there to other courts in other places, in some of the other Territories, or in some of the States, if you choose. So long as justice can be administered in the ordinary way, it is improper to use military force. When justice cannot be administered in that way, and there is no force used to resist it, we must apply the remedy of further legislation. There are now some portions of the Union in which the laws could not be executed by State tribunals. When this became manifest, we did not resort to military force; we resorted to legislation, and gave power to United States judges and courts to try such cases. I admit, then, in the contingency stated by the gentleman, there is now no remedy; but it at once becomes the duty of Congress in its wisdom to apply the remedy. I will say, as the frank expression of my opinion, that there is nothing in the President's message which exhibits a disposition on his part to wage war upon these people. It simply asks for a protecting force in Utah to enable the government, appointed under law by the Administration, to go into operation. But I cannot dwell on this point.

If the present Army of the United States could be entirely withdrawn from the frontier, there would be no reason for this additional force; but as that cannot be done without serious disadvantages and dangers, the emergency which now exists demands that there should be an additional force voted. The bill before the House provides for the organization of one regiment to defend the frontier of Texas, to serve for eighteen months; and it authorizes the President, in his discretion, to call for an additional number of volunteer regiments, not to exceed four. If things take a peaceable turn, they may not be wanted, and therefore will not be called out. With our largely increased frontier, this rebellious spirit which exists in Utah will create disturbances amongst the Indians upon that frontier—a contingency for which we should provide; and, at any rate, it seems to me that it would be unwise to create so great a derangement in the position of the Army as would be produced by a withdrawal of the entire force from our frontier to send it to Utah.

We find that the Administration, in reinforcing Colonel Johnston, are stripping the frontier of Texas of the troops necessary to defend that frontier. What is the consequence? Before me is a file of papers from the Governor of Texas, General Twiggs, and many others, showing that the Indians are taking advantage of the withdrawal of the troops, and are already committing depredations upon our citizens. The withdrawal of the troops would lead to the raising of several regiments of volunteers by the State of Texas, for the defense of her frontier. These would not be under the control of the United States, and would, in the end, cost ten times more than if the United States had provided, under their own control, a corps for that purpose.

From what information I possess, I do not believe it was the best policy on the part of the Government to allow the Governors of the Territory of Kansas to control the movements of the Army. It is the power which was given to these Governors to withdraw the troops from the line of march which has, in a great measure, caused the partial failure of the expedition now under command of Colonel Johnston. It was a mistake to grant these extensive powers to control the movements of the Army to the civil Governor of Kansas. I have never believed it necessary to employ more than a battalion of troops for the purpose of aiding in preserving the peace in Kansas. They are now, I believe, in an actual state of removal, and there is no desire on the part of any one to keep them any longer in Kansas.

I, however, Mr. Speaker, will pass over the many answers which might be made to those who oppose this bill on account of their objection to increasing the military force of the country in any wise. I must now confine my remarks to the objections which are raised to the use of volunteers; or rather to answering the arguments which have been used by those who prefer a regular force, especially those presented by the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] a member of the Military Committee, against the use of volunteers and in favor of increasing the number of the regular troops.

I stated, in the opening of my remarks upon this bill, that, in my judgment, a permanent military establishment was necessary for the protection of every government; but that military establishments should only be composed of regular troops, when that establishment is permanent and intended to be permanent; but that, for all temporary purposes in this country, we ought to use the force so peculiarly American—the volunteer. Prejudices may have existed against this force, as for a long time they did against the use of the American weapon—the rifle; yet now the armies of the world are arming their soldiers with the American rifle, or grooved gun. The volunteer is the best force to be used for temporary purposes. There are other objections besides those which I urged in my opening remarks, to the temporary increase of the regular Army. No one, I believe, contemplates a permanent increase. Without going into the argument against the increase, it is enough to know that, from the indications in the other branch of the national Legislature, and the indications coming from all parts of the country, public sentiment is opposed to a permanent increase of the regular Army of the country. No man, or very few men, contemplate that it is possible to effect anything more than a temporary increase.

In addition to the many objections I have already urged to a temporary increase, I should state one which I have not yet mentioned, and that is the derangement which is produced in the permanent establishment of the Army, either by a temporary increase, or by the withdrawal of that addition from the Army. Suppose you should adopt the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] it amounts to this, that we raise three additional regiments of regulars for the space of two years. What will be the result? In the first place, it produces a derangement of the divisions and brigades of the Army, and a remodeling of the whole system—a derangement made at the moment when so large a portion of those troops are to be placed in service. Upon their going out of the Army, it will produce bickerings and heart-burnings among the officers. Both a temporary increase and the withdrawal of that increase, have ever produced a moral derangement in the regular Army, serious in its nature. Suppose a bill like that proposed by the Secretary of War is passed, as a temporary addition to the army: there would be one hundred and eighty-five officers to be appointed, and one hundred and eighty-five officers, at the expiration of two years, to be discharged. These derangements create disturbances throughout the whole country, and tend to demoralize the regular Army; whereas the coming in or going out of a temporary volunteer force produces no effect upon the regular establishment.

But, say some gentlemen upon both sides of the opposition to this volunteer bill, the President has not called for volunteers; and, say some, that the Secretary of War strongly implies that he does not desire volunteer soldiers. The President has confined himself to a call for an increase of the Army. He does not inform us in his message what description of forces he desires. He might, perhaps, with propriety, have laid before Congress his own wishes and opinions upon the subject. But, when recommendations come here, if they come at all, they come addressed simply to the discretion of Congress. As I said before, it is the right of Congress, and of Congress alone, to raise armies and to support them; and it is our right and duty alone, under the Constitution, to make rules and regulations for their government, and to prescribe what description of forces shall be raised, and what shall be the period of their service. Neither the President nor the Secretary has any responsibility upon the subject. The responsibility lies here; and as much as we may respect the wishes and opinions of the President and Secretary of War upon this subject, their duty is simply to recommend; and upon us, and us alone, rests the responsibility of raising troops, of prescribing rules and regulations for their government, and determining the period of their service. And even we are prohibited, by the Constitution, from appropriating money for their support for a longer period than two years.

But I cannot forbear, in the course of my remarks, to abstain from noticing that much stress has been placed upon the opinion of the Secretary of War in regard to the character and number of troops required. From his position, much regard should be given to his opinions; but these appear not to have undergone as thorough an investigation as they might, because the President differs with the Secretary of War. The President recommends four regiments, and the Secretary of War five. The President says nothing about description of forces, and makes no argument upon the subject. On the contrary, the Secretary of War presents arguments, and introduces documents for the purpose of showing that volunteers are the more costly forces, and more objectionable, and that the increase ought to be regular troops, as being less expensive and more reliable.

The matter, in another point of view, does not appear to have received that consideration which would justify us in giving to the matter that consideration which it might otherwise receive, coming as it does from the War Department. The point is this: the President asks for additional forces upon the ground of the Utah disturbances; while the Secretary places the application upon the ground of the general condition of the service. I admit that the recommendations of these high functionaries deserve our best consideration; but in the last resort it comes to us to be the judges as to what description of forces we shall give, and what shall be their period of service. We raise them and place them under the control of the President; and it will not do for gentlemen to intimate, as did the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] that they would not be used if we tendered them. Let us tender them, as it is our duty to do, and throw the responsibility, in case necessity should arise for them, where it belongs. If we tender them, and the brave and gallant Johnston should be overwhelmed by the forces of the enemy, and should suffer for want of provisions, the responsibility will be averted from our heads.

Mr. STANTON. I wish to inquire of the honorable gentleman from Mississippi, as a military man, whether he supposes that, if regular troops could be recruited for this service, and sent to the relief of Colonel Johnston, they would be able to reach him in time to afford assistance?

Mr. FAULKNER. I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from Ohio to the fact that the supporting column will leave Fort Leavenworth in the month of May, for the support of Colonel Johnston. It is already under marching orders.

Mr. QUITMAN. I presume that every effort will be made by the Administration to avert evil, and to support the army now in advance. I have no doubt it will be successful.

Mr. STANTON. Another question. That army will march at all events, whether this bill passes or not?

Mr. FAULKNER. It is already under marching orders.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly.

Mr. FAULKNER. My object is to supply, upon the frontier, the place of those troops removed to Utah.

Mr. QUITMAN. It has been done, to a great extent, at the expense of the defense of the frontier of Texas; and perhaps the Indians seeing our forces upon the northern frontier weakened, may commence depredations there. Now, I propose to furnish the Government with forces equal to those they are now marching away, by supplying them with volunteers. If the bill should pass both Houses and become a law, in less than forty days each regiment of volunteers can be placed upon the field of action, and immediately commence their guardianship of the train, and move on in time for the army to move. If it is necessary to retain any of the veterans upon the frontier posts, the volunteers raised by this bill will take their places and move on to the scene of action. And I pledge my word, from a knowledge of the facility with which our frontiersmen become soldiers, that in one month they will become as well drilled and trained for the immediate service required, as the new recruits which have been enlisted within the last six months, and are now marching for Utah. The former already have what it requires perhaps some months to impart to those who enlist in the regular service—a thorough knowledge of the general use of arms—having been trained in the militia, or having belonged to some volunteer companies, or having had experience in the war with Mexico.

I will now answer the question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. STANTON.] I believe there are already, as well as my memory serves me, some five regiments of volunteers offered to the President of the United States. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SMITH] informed us this morning that two regiments had been offered from that State. If so, six regiments have been offered by the different States to the President of the United States. I will ask how long it would take to bring a regiment from Illinois, or from Kentucky, or from Missouri, during this high stage of the waters of the West, to Fort Leavenworth, or at any other point, and be ready to move forward? Probably some time before the general movement should be made, which cannot well be made before the grass grows upon the plains. Most of the troops upon the northwestern frontier have been enlisted within the last year, and are therefore mostly fresh, and unused to the horse and to fire-arms; whereas, the volunteers in general are already accustomed to ride the horse, and to use fire-arms of every description; and every man who has seen anything of the service knows that he can soon become a soldier.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would ask the gentleman if he intends to include foreigners? If foreigners are allowed as volunteers, there will be four out of five of them who would be unaccustomed to riding the horse.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am surprised to hear such an expression from the gentleman from Virginia. Such has not been the case. There are, of course, exceptions. In general, twenty to one of our volunteers have been American-born citizens. But I do not see the pertinency or the importance of the question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I would say to the gentleman that the reason of making the remark, just at this time, was that he seemed to lay a good deal of stress, in his argument, on the skillful horsemanship of the American volunteer, and I thought that if foreigners were to be taken as volunteers, there was nothing in that argument.

Mr. QUITMAN. I think that the Irish boy or the German boy who comes among our people at a tender age is likely to follow American habits and become a good rider.

Now, Mr. Speaker, some comparison has been made between the two descriptions of force—volunteer and regular. I know the force of early ideas and of prejudices, and the imposing effects of professional knowledge, and make allowance for it; but still, as my friend from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] has indulged in some comparison of the two descriptions of forces, I feel myself in duty bound to reply to him. He prefers, for this description of service, regulars to volunteers; and one of his principal reasons is, that the regular is the unimpassioned instrument, subject to the commands of his superiors; that he is patient and submissive, without any other feeling than that of obedience; and that he is therefore preferable to the volunteer for this species of service for which we wish to use him. There seems to be an idea in the mind of the gentleman that there exists in the American breast a natural bloodthirstiness and cruelty. Sir, such an idea is contrary to all our experience and to all our history. By whom have murder, rapine, and devastation, been committed, in the sacking of towns and cities, in the history of European wars? Why, by regular troops. Where have there been more terrible butcheries perpetrated than in India by the regular soldiers? I do not mean to condemn their conduct. This retaliation may have been necessary. But, sir, you could not have bought an American volunteer to commit the cruelties that were committed by British soldiers on the inhabitants in India after a surrender. Our whole history shows that. There is a marked instance of the forbearance and humanity of American volunteers which I cannot pass—I mean the battle of San Jacinto, where all the American troops were volunteers. While their blood was boiling with the remembrance of the massacre of their brethren at the Alamo and on the field of Goliad, they nevertheless took between six and seven hundred Mexican prisoners after the battle; and that was an occasion when they would have been, perhaps, justified, for the butcheries and cruelties and violations of plighted faith on the part of their enemies, in putting to the sword every man that was in their power, and in giving no quarter. And yet we find the number of prisoners taken in that battle greater than the force of the successful army. Why was that? Because there rests in the breast of our citizens—from our institutions, from our respect for the other sex, from the gallantry and spirit infused by American institutions and American manners—a humanity which forbids them to commit outrages upon a conquered enemy. I might multiply instances of this kind, but I deem it unnecessary. Why, then, should the gentleman argue that if volunteers were used for the purpose of forcing the Mormons into obedience to the laws of the United States, greater cruelty would be perpetrated than by regular soldiers? Why should men who can be influenced by reason, by the love of glory, by other feelings of humanity, be more cruel than those who, the gentleman says, are mere instruments in the hands of higher intelligences?

Mr. FAULKNER. I can well imagine what the feelings are that would lead men to volunteer for service against a foreign enemy; but I ask the gentleman what is there to induce volunteers to serve on this expedition?

Mr. QUITMAN. I will give the gentleman the best answer I can. One inducement may be a love of military achievements; but the principal is the desire of the volunteer to maintain the laws of the country. There is something in the pleasure of military organization; but the principal object is to maintain the laws. I commanded for twelve years a company of volunteers in the city of Natchez; and I found them at all times ready to move, to a man, in support of the laws. There certainly was no other inducement for their action than a desire to maintain the laws. And I will venture to say further, that though volunteers might be led to join the service from military ardor, still, the moment they found an inoffensive people, they would cease to use their arms. I would rather rely upon these moral sentiments than alone on the mere power of officers to control their men, because officers cannot always have their eyes on the men under them. I would rather rely on the natural feeling of the soldier himself than on his mere habits of obedience.

But, sir, there is another reason alleged why volunteers should not be employed; and that is, because they are not so easily controlled as are regular troops. Now, in the Mexican war, (I do not like to refer to my own experience, but it is the best information I have,) I commanded at times fifteen regiments of volunteers; and throughout the war I was never willfully disobeyed by officer or soldier. There was never an instance of disobedience on the part of officers or men; and no officer or man was ever punished for willful disobedience.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is my duty to look at some of the comparisons made by the gentleman from Virginia, at the conclusion of his very able speech the other day. He instituted a comparison between the number of regulars who were engaged in actual service in the Mexican war, and the number of volunteers. And, taking his data, no doubt, from the books, he says that the aggregate of regular forces engaged in that war was twenty-six thousand nine hundred and twenty, and of volunteer forces seventy-three thousand five hundred and thirty-two; and that the aggregate of officers and men killed and wounded was, of the volunteers about two thousand, and of the regulars about three thousand.

Now, Mr. Speaker, why introduce this? The gentleman in question has taken some interest in the history of the Mexican war, and he must know that more than ten thousand of these volunteers were included in his estimate who did not arrive in Mexico until after all the battles had been fought, and ought not, therefore, to be included in this estimate.

He must be aware, too, that some thirty thousand of them were detained upon the Rio Grande; and that more than three fourths of these volunteers were never engaged in any battle at all, much to their regret. Generally speaking, the regulars were preferred, and thrown forward into action, although the volunteers eagerly solicited this description of service. It was regarded as a favor to be permitted to take part in it.

I will venture to say this, and I challenge denial from any quarter, that there was no occasion, when regulars and volunteers were jointly engaged, that the volunteers did not lose more men in proportion to the force engaged than the regulars did. There are some cases also put by my friend from Virginia, which may deceive the reader. I read from his speech:

"In the battles of Contreras and Churubusco, fought 19th and 20th of August, 1847, there were, volunteers killed and wounded, two hundred and thirty-nine; regulars, seven hundred and fifty-nine."

Does not my friend know that there were some twelve regiments of regulars engaged in these actions at Contreras and Churubusco, and but two regiments of volunteers under General Shields, and that those two regiments lost two hundred and thirty-nine men? While the whole of the twelve regiments of regulars lost only seven hundred and fifty-nine? Showing that the two regiments of volunteers lost vastly more in proportion to their numbers in these actions than the regulars! Again, he says:

"In the battle of El Molino del Rey, fought 8th September, 1847, there were, of regulars killed and wounded, seven hundred and six; volunteers, none. There were, I presume, no volunteers engaged in that fight. In the battles of Chapultepec and city of Mexico, fought 12th, 13th, and 14th of September, were, volunteers killed and wounded, two hundred and seventy-three; regulars, five hundred and thirty-eight.

The gentleman in making this statement should have recollected that in the first action there were no volunteers, and that in the remaining two of these actions there were only three regiments of volunteers engaged, and I think fifteen regiments of regulars.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to say here, and the gentleman will see it in the whole course of my remarks, that I have not sought to cast the slightest imputation upon the volunteers at all, but I deemed it due to the regular Army, as a historical fact which has been lost sight of in the blaze of glory which has been thrown upon the volunteers, to show that the bones of the regulars upon the battle-fields of that war, attest by whom the service had been done, and not to cast any reflection upon the volunteers.

Mr. QUITMAN. I have no doubt the gentleman intended no reflection upon the volunteers; but the statistics he has given go forth to the world, showing first the whole number of regulars engaged in that war, and then the whole number of volunteers, then giving the number of regulars and volunteers killed in that war. If the gentleman intended to give a fair exhibit, he should have stated the number of each engaged in each action. I submit whether these statistics, thus presented by the gentleman to go forth to the world, may not produce a false impression?

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Speaker, I will make a statement in regard to the battle of Molino del Rey. It is true there were no volunteers, but there were some of the new regiments, among others the fourteenth, under the gallant Trousdale, composed of men from Louisiana, Illinois, and Tennessee, and who, though enlisted but a few months, in this battle and the storming of Chapultepec showed themselves in every way equal to the old regiments. We will furnish just such a force by this bill, with the exception that the President in that case appointed the officers.

Mr. QUITMAN. Well, Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to intimate that the gentleman from Virginia made these comparisons for the purpose of disparaging the volunteer services, but I thought the statement should not in justice go to the world without explanation. A large portion of the volunteers were left in garrison. They were not unfrequently (although earnestly soliciting it) refused active service. I fear their efficiency, even, was questioned until at the battle of Monterey they fought their way into the notice of their general. They fortunately had an opportunity at Buena Vista of removing all doubts of their efficiency, bravery, and steadiness. Where they had an opportunity of being employed, they did service equal to that of the regulars. I have shown, and I challenge denial, that in every action where they were both engaged, the volunteers lost, in proportion to their force, as many men as the regulars.

In my opening speech on this subject, I stated what I believed at the time to be true, that no desertions had ever taken place in the volunteer ranks. As I presume the statistics of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. FAULKNER] are technically correct, I of course must retract that remark. Since he has drawn my mind to it I have seen that there is a number of desertions reported in the volunteer service. Engaged as I was during the whole war with the volunteer service, I pledge my word that I never knew an instance of desertion except under some peculiar circumstances, where some worthless man, by common consent, of officers and men, was driven from the company, and merely for form's sake reported as a deserter. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LETCHER. As the House is not full, and in order that we may have a full vote on this question, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon the House (at a quarter to four o'clock, p. m.) adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. T. N. HASKELL.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, in favor of the organization of the Territory of Arizona, and the removal of the Indian tribes in the Territory of New Mexico to that part of the proposed Territory of Arizona, north of the thirty-fourth parallel of north latitude; which, on motion of Mr. GREEN, was referred to the Committee on Territories; and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SEWARD presented a petition of citizens of the town of Dix, New York, praying for the adoption of some practical measures for the peaceful and gradual extinction of slavery, by which compensation shall be made out of the national Treasury, or the public domain, to the owners of slaves that may be manumitted; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying that the amount due to that State, under the act for its admission into the Union, from the proceeds of the sales of the public lands within its limits, may be paid; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MALLORY presented the petition of George L. Bowne and William Curry, praying to be allowed a portion of the money paid as duties on certain coal saved from the bark Rainbow; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, presented a petition of citizens of Washington county, Texas, praying that the public lands shall no longer be considered a source of public revenue, but be subject to entry hereafter by actual settlers and cultivators only; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SEWARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 23) to authorize a change of the location of the South Pass wagon road, for the purpose of giving greater security and protection to emigrant travel; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Fabius Stanley, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 208) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 209) for his relief. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

MASSACRE OF CALIFORNIA EMIGRANTS.

Mr. GWIN. I offered yesterday a resolution of inquiry, to which the Senator from Texas [Mr. Houshron] objected. I understand that this morning he is willing to withdraw his objection, as he finds that the resolution simply provides for an inquiry. I move that it be taken up.

The motion was agreed to; and the resolution was adopted, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to communicate to the Senate what steps have been taken, if any, to punish the parties implicated in the massacre of one hundred and eighteen emigrants to California, at the Mountain Meadows, in the Territory of Utah.

CHARLES D. MAXWELL.

Mr. YULEE. There is a bill of the House of Representatives for the relief of Dr. Charles D. Maxwell, lying on the desk of the President, which I ask to have taken up and acted upon. It will lead to no discussion at all.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that this is a House bill, which he did not lay before the Senate for reference heretofore, on account of a suggestion of the Senator from Florida.

The bill (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Dr.

Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy, was read a first and second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It provides for allowing the difference of pay between that of the grade of passed assistant surgeon and surgeon, from December 22, 1845, to July 7, 1848, being the period during which Dr. Maxwell performed the duties of surgeon and assistant surgeon on board the United States ship Cyane.

Mr. YULEE. This bill is identically in the same words as one reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs of the Senate at this session, and passed by this body. There is, therefore, no occasion for its reference, and I ask that it be now put on its passage.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think it would be better to have it referred.

Mr. YULEE. A bill, in the same words, has been reported by our Committee on Naval Affairs, and passed by the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. How much money does it appropriate?

Mr. MALLORY. The identical bill now before us was passed by the Senate and sent to the other House; but that body, instead of passing the Senate bill, has sent us this, which is in the same words. It may, perhaps, give one thousand or fifteen hundred dollars to this gentleman. It is in the usual form of bills which we are in the habit of passing for the relief of officers under like circumstances. It passed the Senate at the last session.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read a third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers, for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the following bill and joint resolution:

An act (H. R. No. 216) for the relief of Doctor Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 19) respecting the distribution of certain public documents;

And they thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. FOSTER spoke in opposition to the bill.

Mr. CLAY supported the bill, and entered into a defense of the course lately pursued by the Legislature of Alabama in the adoption of resolutions prescribing the course they will pursue if Kansas shall be rejected with the Lecompton constitution.

After which Mr. DURKEE took the floor, and spoke in opposition to the bill. [These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. WILSON. It was understood that the Senator from Rhode Island, [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor,] were to speak to-day; but both those gentlemen, on account of the condition of their health, are unable to do so. This breaks up the arrangement of to-day. Several Senators are to speak to-morrow, and in order to accomplish all that we can possibly do, I move that the Senate adjourn until eleven o'clock to-morrow. I have consulted gentlemen in regard to this proposition.

Mr. GREEN. I suggest that we ought to make this bill the special order for to-morrow, without any morning business.

Mr. SEWARD. The motion should be, that when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRAGS.) The Chair will put the motion in that form.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. Now, I move that the bill be made the special order for to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, March 19, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. STEPHEN P. HILL, D. D.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SELECT COMMITTEES.

The SPEAKER announced that he had appointed the following select committees:

Select committee under the resolution of Mr. BURROUGHS—Messrs. BURROUGHS, CASKIE, BLISS, WRIGHT of Tennessee, DAWES, DEWART, POTTER, JACKSON, and PALMER.

Select committee under Mr. FLORENCE's resolution—Messrs. FLORENCE, MACLAY, GILMAN, SCALES, and WALDRON.

COMMITTEE OF ACCOUNTS.

The SPEAKER also announced that he had appointed Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, on the Committee of Accounts, vice Mr. RUFFIN, excused.

RESOLUTIONS OF NEW MEXICO.

The SPEAKER laid before the House resolutions of the Legislative Assembly of New Mexico relative to the proposed Territory of Arizona; which were referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

DES MOINES RAPIDS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the War Department, containing information relative to the improvement of the Des Moines Rapids.

Mr. CURTIS. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CURTIS. The work has been under the control of the War Department, and I think it ought to go to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is information in relation to the improvement of the rapids of the Des Moines river, and of course appertains to the commerce of the country; therefore, sir, I think it ought to be referred to the Committee on Commerce. I move that it be referred to that committee, and ordered to be printed. A bill on the subject, reported from that committee, at the last session, passed this House.

Mr. WASHBURNE's motion was agreed to.

LIGHTING PRESIDENT'S HOUSE, ETC.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, in reference to additional appropriations for lighting the President's House, the Capitol, &c.; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

EXPENDITURE IN THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Navy Department, containing a detailed statement of the expenditure of the contingent fund of the Navy Department for 1857; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MEMORIAL OF UTAH LEGISLATURE.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. What has become of the memorial of the Legislature of Utah, which was read here the other day?

The SPEAKER. It has been laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have it referred to the Committee on Territories.

There being no objection, it was so referred.

INDIAN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. KINGSBURY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to have a Senate bill taken from the Speaker's table and referred. It is an important bill, and I think that there will be no objection to its reference. It has been on the Speaker's table these five weeks.

There being no objection, Senate bill (No. 82) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the President of the United States to cause to be surveyed the tract of land in the Territory of Minnesota, belonging to the half-breeds or mixed bloods of the Dacotah or Sioux nation of Indians, and for other purposes," approved July 17, 1854, was taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

SOLDIERS OF THE CREEK WAR.

Mr. DOWDELL, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be directed to inquire into the propriety of so amending the act entitled "An act in addition to certain acts granting bounty land to certain officers and soldiers who have been engaged in the military service of the United States," approved March 3, 1835, and the act amendatory, being approved the 14th day of May, 1836, as to extend the benefits and provisions of said act to embrace the volunteers and militia in the State of Alabama, who have rendered fourteen days' actual service in the Creek Indian war of 1836, whether such persons served with the armed forces, or were regularly mustered into the service of, or paid by, the United States or not, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

VOLUNTEER BILL.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the bill (H. R. No. 313) reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers; the pending question being on Mr. QUITMAN's amendment, to add, in line twelve; section one, after the word "rank," the words, "one surgeon and two assistant surgeons."

Mr. BURROUGHS. Was that amendment offered before or since the previous question was seconded?

The SPEAKER. It was offered before the previous question was seconded.

Mr. QUITMAN. It is simply to correct an omission in the bill.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment offered by Mr. FAULKNER, as follows:

Strike out the following sections of the bill:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the northern and northwestern frontiers, the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to call for and accept the services of any number of volunteers, not to exceed in all four regiments, of seven hundred and forty privates each; the same, or any portion thereof, to be organized into mounted regiments or infantry, as the President may deem proper, to serve for the term of eighteen months from the time of their being received into service, unless sooner discharged by the President. Said volunteers, if called for and received as mounted men, shall be constituted in the same manner as is provided in the first section of this bill for the Texas regiment of mounted volunteers, and shall receive the same pay and allowances, and, except the appointment of officers, shall be subject to the same rules and regulations as are provided in this bill for said corps; and if called for, and if received as infantry, they shall be placed on the same footing, in every respect, with the infantry regiments now in the service, shall receive the same pay and allowances, and be governed by the same rules and regulations; and the said regiments, whether organized as mounted men or infantry, shall be subject to the rules and articles of war.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said volunteers shall not be accepted in bodies of less than one regiment, whose officers shall be appointed in the manner prescribed by law in the several States or Territories to which said regiments shall respectively belong.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the pay of said volunteers shall not be due until received into the service, but each officer and man shall then be entitled to one day's pay for every twenty miles he may have been required to travel from his residence to the place of muster."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in addition to the present military establishment of the United States, there shall be raised and organized, under the direction of the President, one regiment of dragoons and two regiments of infantry, each to be composed of the same number and rank of commissioned and non-commissioned officers, buglers, musicians, privates, &c., as are provided for a regiment of dragoons and infantry, respectively, under the existing laws, and who shall receive the same pay, rations, and allowances, according to their respective grades, and be subject to the same regulations, and to the rules and articles of war: Provided, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States alone to appoint such of the commissioned officers authorized by this act, below the grade of field officers, as may not be appointed during the present session of Congress.

"Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the said officers, musicians, and privates, authorized by this act, shall immediately be discharged from the service of the United States at the expiration of two years from and after the passage of this act.

"Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the President of the United States be authorized to select such officers of the Army as he may think proper, and assign them to command, with temporary and increased rank, in the regiments hereby authorized, and who, while exercising the temporary rank thus conferred, shall receive the pay and emoluments of the commands to which they have been assigned, and be entitled to no other pay and allowances whatever during the period of said detached service; officers so employed shall succeed to vacancies in their own corps, according to the ordinary rules of promotion, and, if not previously ordered to do so, shall, upon the disbandment of the regiments to which they have been assigned, rejoin their own regiment, corps, troop, or company, as the case may be. The field officers of the regiments herein authorized and provided for shall be selected from the officers of the Army, and appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to temporary commissions, the effect of which will cease and discontinue on the disbandment of the corps to which they may be assigned.

Mr. MAYNARD called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 43, nays 143; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahi, Barksdale, Bishop, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Dimmick, Faulkner, Florence, Gilmer, Goode, Gregg, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Letcher, Maclay, Millson, Pendleton, Phillips, Pottle, Powell, Russell, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, William Smith, Stevenson, George Taylor, White, Whiteley, Winslow, and Wortendyke—43.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Blair, Bliss, Boyce, Braxton, Bryan, Buffington, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Campbell, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, Cockerill, Colfax, Collins, Cowdore, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lawrence, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pettit, Peyton, Pike, Potter, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Talbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, Wilson, Woodson, Augustus R. Wright, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—143.

So the amendment was rejected.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BISHOP stated that his colleague, Mr. ARNOLD, had been called out of the city on pressing business.

Mr. CASE stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. NIBLACK.

Mr. BOWIE stated that Mr. CORNING had paired off with Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio.

Mr. MOORE stated that his colleague, Mr. SHORTER, had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

Mr. ENGLISH stated that he was not within the bar when his name was called, being detained at the Departments, attending to the business of his constituents, but that if he had been he would have voted in the negative.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have been desired by Mr. GREENWOOD, to say that on the Kansas bill, and matters pertaining to it, he has paired off till Monday next at twelve o'clock, with Mr. DICK, and on the bill reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, he has paired off with Mr. MOTT.

Mr. POTTER stated that his colleague, Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin, had been called away by sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. SHORTER.

Mr. EDIE stated that his colleague, Mr. STEWART, had paired off on Kansas matters with Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, for a few days.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask leave to vote, having been absent on the business of the House when my name was called.

Mr. KELSEY. I object.

Mr. BURNETT. If I had been in my seat, I should have voted "ay."

Mr. CHAPMAN asked leave to vote, he having been absent from the House, engaged in other business, when his name was called.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut, objected.

Mr. HUGHES stated that his colleague, Mr. NIBLACK, had paired off on political questions with Mr. CASE; and that if he [Mr. HUGHES] had been in the House when his name was called, he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, asked leave to vote, he having been absent when his name was called.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Then I desire to say that, if I had been present, I would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. CLARK, of New York, asked leave to vote, he having been engaged in his committee room when his name was called.

Objection was made.

Mr. BILLINGHURST stated that Mr. Houston and himself, differing on this bill, and being in the committee room when their names were called, had paired off.

Mr. SANDIDGE stated that his colleague, Mr. EVERTS, was detained from the House by indisposition.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. BONHAM. I would like to ask if it would be in order to introduce the first section of the minority bill, as a substitute for the first three sections of the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER. It would not be in order pending the execution of the order of the House under the main question.

Mr. HUGHES. I move to reconsider the vote by which the previous question was seconded.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay that motion on the table.

Mr. KEITT. I have never known the vote by which the previous question was seconded to be reconsidered; and I raise the question of order, that the motion is not in order.

Mr. HUGHES. I think if I could be permitted to make a single explanation, there would be no objection.

Mr. HOPKINS. I submit that the motion cannot be in order. A second merely cannot be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The order of the House having been partially executed, the Chair is of the opinion that the motion is not in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is true that the previous question has not exhausted itself; but does the Chair hold that it would be in order to reconsider the seconding of the demand for the previous question at all?

The SPEAKER. That question has not presented itself.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the Chair holds that the second can be reconsidered at all, it can be reconsidered now as well as at any time. If it can be reconsidered at all, it can be reconsidered like any other motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must perceive that if the motion to reconsider be entertained, the vote last taken must first be reconsidered.

Mr. HOUSTON. The previous question only serves to bring the House to a direct vote upon the propositions before it. The House has voted upon one proposition before it; but the fact that another remains to be voted on would not prevent the vote seconding the previous question from being reconsidered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 128, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bishop, Blair, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gaultrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hull, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, Macley, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Ward, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—128.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bingham, Bliss, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Danrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, English, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert E. Hall, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottier, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Zollcofer—74.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MOTT stated that he had paired off with Mr. GREENWOOD.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland, stated that he had paired off with Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, upon all questions relating to Kansas. If any gentleman on the other side of the House thought this bill had any relation to Kansas, he would decline to vote. ["Vote!" "Vote!"] He voted "ay."

The bill, being engrossed, was read the third time.

Mr. QUITMAN. I demand the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that demand for a moment.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am sorry that I cannot accommodate the gentleman; but I do not feel authorized to do it.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. QUITMAN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 73; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Anderson, Atkins, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bishop, Blair, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Chapman, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochrane, Cokerill, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gaultrell, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Letcher, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Montgomery, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Trippe, Ward, Warren, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and John V. Wright—124.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bingham, Bliss, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Danrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Farnsworth, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert E. Hall, Harlan, Haskin, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Leach, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Parker, Pike, Potter, Pottier, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Zollcofer—73.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. AVERY, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked permission to vote.

Mr. DEAN objected.

Mr. AVERY stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted "ay."

Mr. ADRAIN, not being within the bar when his name was called, asked leave to vote.

Mr. PHELPS objected.

Mr. ADRAIN stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. QUITMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. HICKLY, one of their clerks, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House for the relief of Dr. Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy;

Also, that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the following title, in which he asked the concurrence of the House: "A joint resolution providing for the payment of certain expenses for holding the United States courts in the Territory of Utah."

ENROLLED RESOLUTION AND BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled a joint resolution respecting the distribution of certain public documents;

Also, a bill for the relief of Dr. Charles D. Maxwell, a surgeon in the United States Navy; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Is not this private bill day?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope we shall have the committees called for reports of private bills.

Mr. DAVIDSON. The Committee of Claims is a privileged committee. I want to make a report from that committee.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. PHELPS. I have a statement I want to make to the House. I am reported as having the other day introduced a bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, and comments have been made upon that report. Now, sir, I have introduced no such bill. I suppose the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Montgomery] was attributed by the telegraphic reporters to me.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The question was put; and, on a division, there were—yeas 60, nays 70.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I renew the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the House will not take the yeas and nays. It is useless to consume the time of the House in that manner.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I wish to suggest that, by unanimous consent, the House shall meet to-morrow, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of general debate. There are many members who desire to make speeches.

Mr. FLORENCE. I hope that course will be pursued, so that those of us who wish to do so, can go to the Departments to attend to our business. That will obviate the necessity of adjourning over.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope we shall go on with our business, or else adjourn over promptly.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn until Monday next; and upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 125; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bishop, Bowie, Bryan, Burroughs, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clingman, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Crawford, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dimmick, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Gillis, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Robert B. Hall, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hughes, Jewett, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Macley, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Miles, Montgomery, Edward Joy Morris, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Ricard, Ritchie, Rogers, Rufin, Russell, Scott, Aaron Shaw, Robert Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Tappan, George Taylor, Ward, Winslow, Woodson, and Augustus R. Wright—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocoek, Branch, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Cokerill, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Danrell, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dewar, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Leifer, Leicher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pettit, Peyton, Phelps, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Reagan, Robbins, Royce, Sandidge, Scales, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wortendyke, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—125.

So the House refused to adjourn over.

The question recurred upon the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will withdraw that motion for a few minutes, and allow the committees to report private bills.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion, and allow me to move to discharge the Committee of Claims from certain memorials which have been referred to them, and have them referred to another and more appropriate committee.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I will cheerfully do that if I do not lose the floor thereby. If, by general consent, the committees can be called for reports, I cheerfully withdraw the motion.

The SPEAKER. The question then recurs upon the motion that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion.

Mr. LETCHER. I would gladly accommodate my friend from Louisiana, but I want this question tested.

Mr. COVODE. I do not understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts has withdrawn his motion.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I withdrew my motion simply for the purpose of allowing the committees to be called for reports.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I renew the motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. HAWKINS called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SAVAGE and BLISS were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 70, noes 70.

The SPEAKER voted in the negative.

So the motion was not agreed to.

THE DEFICIENCY BILL.

The question recurred on Mr. LETCHER's motion.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DAVIS, of Indiana, and SMITH, of Tennessee, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 93, noes 30.

So the motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boveck in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 306, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, upon which Mr. LETCHER was entitled to the floor.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, knowing the universal anxiety to engage in discussions of an exciting character in this House, I really have felt some hesitation about occupying any portion of the time of the committee in the consideration of the merits of the bill which is now before it; but, sir, on further reflection and consultation with friends, it was deemed advisable that I should at least call attention to some of the more prominent features of the bill, with the various recommendations from the several Departments of the Government, upon which its provisions are based. I propose to do nothing more now; and if I can get the attention of the House, I desire to call attention specifically to each document, so that it will be in the power of every member himself to procure the documents from his box and examine them, and to satisfy his own mind as to the propriety of the passage of this bill. This bill is a bill (No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

The first provision of this bill relates to the compensation of the officers, clerks, messengers and others receiving an annual salary in the service of the House of Representatives. Upon reference to Miscellaneous Document No. 36, of this session, the items which are intended to be embraced in this provision of the bill will be found on page 5, under classification No. 4. It provides for messengers, authorized by resolution of 23d December, 1857, which was the resolution adopted upon the report of my colleague, [Mr. FAULKNER,] in regard to the officers of this House, which made that number of additional messengers necessary, and which demands of us, therefore, that we should provide the means for paying them.

By the same resolution an additional number of laborers was also provided, and the appropriation for that purpose is $2,000.

"For furniture for Speaker's room, and committee's rooms, Clerk's offices, Sergeant-at-Arm's office, Doorkeeper's room, &c.," $30,000 more is rendered necessary by the removal of this body into the present building, and their occupancy of the committee rooms in this building.

The next item is an appropriation of $3,000 for newspapers, which is found necessary to make up the deficiency to that amount in the contingent fund of the House for that purpose. And so with the item of stationery.

Here, then, are five items embraced in the first clause of the bill; and the explanation for each of them will be found in the Miscellaneous Document to which I have referred, and which is accessible to members of the House.

The next item embraced in this bill is to pay the reporters of the House for reporting the debates of the present session in the Congressional Globe. If you will refer to the proceedings of the second session of the Thirty-Third Congress, Congressional Globe, volume 30, page 817, you will find that appropriations for that purpose were made at that time by the House. They were continued during the first and second sessions of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, as can be found by reference to the Congressional Globe, volume 32, page 1916, and Congressional Globe, volume 34, page 801. That item of appropriation is $800 for each reporter, being $4,000 for the five.

Then come the items of appropriation in this bill, about which, I apprehend, will be the subject of most controversy in this House—a deficiency for the supply of the Army. For that purpose $1,200,000 is asked for, under the first clause.

This deficiency has been growing up, as I shall probably have occasion to show in the event of a discussion upon the subject, for some considerable period of time anterior to the coming in of the present Administration. Several quarters, prior to that time, were short, in consequence of a deficiency which had occurred in those previous quarters, in part in consequence of demands upon the War Department in connection with the controversy now going on with the Mormons. It was found absolutely necessary to provide additional means in order to meet the various items of expenditure which are embraced in this clause of the bill. If gentlemen will refer to Miscellaneous Document No. 22, of this House, they will find on the 10th page of that document the reasons stated for this and the other items of deficiency in the War Department, amounting to the sum of $6,700,000. The Quartermaster General, in the report to which I have referred, states:

"It is ascertained that a deficiency existed at the close of last year, which has been a charge upon the present year of about one million of dollars: in addition to which the extensive operations against the Cheyennes and other Indian tribes, and the extensive arrangements for the operations in Utah, have exhausted the appropriations for the present year so far that there is not a sufficient balance in the Treasury to fill the estimates now on my table for December; and the whole balance in the hands of disbursing officers will not be sufficient for the service for one half of the present month. Appropriations will therefore be required to carry the service through the year, and to make the large outfit for the operations in Utah for the following objects, namely:

For regular supplies, including fuel, forage, straw, and stationery	$778,000
Mounts and remounts	252,000
Fiscial expenses	190,000
Baracks and quarters	80,000
Army transportation	5,400,000
Making	$6,700,000

deficiencies, and for the service in Utah, taking the Army as it is, and limiting the expenditures to operations already determined on, as they have been communicated to me. Should operations be carried on from the Pacific, or should a larger force be sent from this side, an increase in the appropriation in proportion to the increased force will be required."

The gentleman will find, by reference to the bill, the items which make up this $6,700,000, commence on the second page of the bill, and terminate on the sixth page. And the items which are embraced are predicated on this recommendation of the War Department, as presented in the report of the Quartermaster General and the other officers in charge of the various branches of the public service.

I refer gentlemen also to Executive Document No. 33, and Miscellaneous Document No. 41, for information upon the subject to which I have just been referring.

The next item is under the head of miscellaneous expenses, on the sixth page of the bill. It is:

"For contingent expenses of the northeast executive building, viz: for fuel, light, and repairs, $1,000."

By reference to Miscellaneous Document No. 23, the reason for this appropriation will be seen. General Cass, the Secretary of State, in asking this sum to supply the deficiency, says:

"I have the honor to state that, in consequence of the increased price of fuel, and the expense of lighting with gas, together with the extensive repairs necessarily made, the annual appropriations for the contingent expenses of the northeast executive building will be insufficient. These appropriations, originally $3,350 per annum, were, for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1844, reduced to $3,300, at which sum they have continued."

"I therefore have the honor to request that the appropriation for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858, may be increased to $4,300; and that an appropriation of $1,000 may be made for a deficiency in the appropriation for contingent expenses of the northeast executive building for the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1855."

The next item is:

"For the erection of stables and conservatory at the President's House, to replace those about to be taken down to make room for the extension of the Treasury building, $3,005."

It will be recollected that at the last session of Congress an appropriation of $20,000 was made for this purpose. After the work was commenced, and had been in progress, it was ascertained that the old stables could not be taken down and the new stables built for the sum of $20,000; and the Secretary of the Interior, on the report of the Commissioner, (Dr. Blake,) sends in an estimate, asking $3,905 to pay the amount of bills due to two or three parties. Executive Document No. 42 furnishes full information in regard to the item.

Now, in regard to this matter, I take occasion to say, as I have said heretofore in this House, that I do not very well see how we can get over the paying of balances contracted to be paid to these parties, for work which they have faithfully executed. But it does seem to me that the officers of this Government, when money is appropriated for a specific purpose, if they ascertain that that purpose cannot be accomplished for the sum appropriated, should not undertake to apply any portion of it till they come to Congress, report the sum deficient, and ask the House to provide the full amount of means necessary for the purpose. But, in this case, these parties, who are mechanics about the city, have faithfully executed their contract. These bills are outstanding and due to them, and it is not their fault that they have been contracted with and that their labor has been performed.

A MEMBER. Who made the contracts with them?

Mr. LETCHER. They were contracted with by the Commissioner of Public Buildings, Dr. Blake. It is proper they should be paid.

The next item is a pretty large one. It is:

"For surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incident to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, being the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000 for that period, $20,000."

At the last Congress, I believe, $50,000 was appropriated for this purpose; but the surveyor general, then in office, not confining himself to the amount of money appropriated for the purpose, continued his surveys on a large scale, and contracted debts with surveying parties and others to the extent of $20,000, which is now asked for to discharge the obligations which he thus incurred. The Government disapproved of his course, and he was not reappointed to office, or perhaps he was dismissed before the close of his term. I am not sure about that; but I know that, if he was not dismissed, the President declined to reappoint him, and that he has gone out of office in consequence, as I understand, of his having incurred these liabilities exceeding the appropriation made by Congress for the service committed to his charge. The Secretary of the Interior recommends this appropriation in Executive Document No. 41. He says:

"In the estimates of this Department, submitted to you with my letter of the 7th of November last, was an item ($220,000) for surveying the public lands and private land claims in California, including office expenses incident to the survey of claims, and to be disbursed at the rates prescribed by law for the different kinds of work, being the amount of surveying liabilities incurred by the surveyor general during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1857, over and above that authorized under the appropriation of $50,000 for that period."—(See printed estimates, pages 119 and 150.) As this item appears not to have been included in the estimates communicated by you to Congress at the opening of the present session, I have the honor now to invite your attention thereto, and to request that the oversight may be corrected."

The next item is:

"For payment to clerks temporarily employed in the Post Office Department, on account of the extraordinary labors connected with the lettings of new contracts for the term commencing on the 1st July, 1858, $3,311 89."

The explanation of this item will be found in Executive Document No. 51. The Postmaster General states, as the reason for asking this sum:

"In the first place, the advertisement of three thousand two hundred routes had to be prepared; then these routes, with the names of all the post offices supplied, must be carefully registered, for which purpose fifteen folios are required. After the time for receiving bids expire, they must all be indorsed, carefully examined, and recorded—numbering many thousands. Then separate acceptances are sent for each route, and duplicates filed. Duplicate contracts must also be prepared and sent out, making six thousand four hundred, which, upon being executed, are all again examined and recorded. And all this work must be done by the 1st of July, in addition to the ordinary current business, which is sufficient to occupy the regular force of the Department."

The next item is a sum of $1,469,173, to supply deficiencies in the revenue of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1858.

I refer gentlemen to Executive Document No. 43, for information on this subject. On the second page of that document will be found a statement which shows the revenues and expenditures of the Department, and which shows the precise balance that is embraced in this item of the bill.

The Postmaster General says:

"The aggregate sum appropriated by the act of Congress, approved March 3, 1857, (Statutes, third session Thirty-Fourth Congress, p. 188,) for the regular expenditures of the Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, exclusive of the transportation of foreign mails, of payments for foreign postages, and to letter carriers, was $11,173,247 00

For transportation of the mails across the Isthmus of Panama, Statutes, third session Thirty-Fourth Congress, p. 249.....	135,000 00
For the transportation of the mail between Charleston and Havana, Statutes, third session Thirty-Fourth Congress, p. 249....	50,000 00
For the transportation of the mails between New York and Havre, and New York and Bremen, under the new contracts authorized by the acts of July 2, 1856, section 83, Statutes, vol. 5, p. 86, and March 3, 1845, Statutes, vol. 5, p. 748, a sum not exceeding.....	230,000 00
For payments to letter carriers, act March 3, 1851, section 10, Statutes, vol. 9, p. 591; estimated at.....	165,000 00
For payments for foreign postages, act 16th September, 1850, Statutes, vol. 9, p. 461; estimated at.....	300,000 00

Total of expenditures..... $12,053,247 00

"The means relied upon to defray the foregoing expenditures consist of—

1. The balance standing to the credit of the Department on the Auditor's books on the 1st of July, 1857..... $1,163,886 00
2. The estimated gross revenue of 1858, including foreign postages and receipts from letter carriers..... 7,795,188 00
3. Balances of appropriations remaining in the Treasury subject to the requisition of the Postmaster General.... 1,625,000 00

"Estimated deficiency year ending June 30, 1858..... $1,469,173 00

"Since this Department has been made to depend upon the Treasury for a portion of the means necessary to defray its expenditures, it appears to have been the practice in estimating for the deficiencies of a coming fiscal year, to ask only for an amount deemed sufficient to pay expenses until the meeting of the next session of Congress, and then to submit an estimate for such further sum as the service of the year may be found to require. Following this rule, the sum of $2,500,000 was asked for and appropriated for deficiencies in the year ending June 30, 1858, Statutes, third session Thirty-Fourth Congress, p. 189; and the estimate now presented is for the means which will be needed for the remainder of the year."

The last item of this bill, I have no doubt, will give rise to a good deal of objection, and probably a good deal of controversy, when this bill comes to be considered by sections. It is this:

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That the accounting officers of the Treasury be authorized and directed to allow credit to the Clerk of the House of Representatives for such payments out of the contingent fund as have been or may be made under the authority of the House of Representatives, during the last Congress: Provided, That said allowances shall have been duly approved by the Committee of Accounts: And be it further provided, That said allowances be paid out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

Just here, before it escapes me, I will remark, that when this section comes up, I propose to move to strike out the words, "allowances authorized by the House of Representatives," and to insert "resolutions passed by the House of Representatives;" and to strike out the word "allowances" where it occurs afterwards, and to insert "resolutions."

My reason for this is, that I am inclined to think, from an examination of the facts in connection with the matter, that the chairman of the Committee of Accounts of the last Congress, not by virtue of any resolutions passed by this House, or laws passed by Congress, seemed to have considered it his duty and his right to pass upon all accounts presented to the committee. He did pass upon such allowances as I have mentioned, which were subsequently paid by the Treasury. I come to this conclusion from an examination of the reports on the finances of 1856-57.

It will be recollected that, at the close of the last session of Congress, sundry resolutions were passed giving compensation to various officers and various employes about the House, some specific and some general. These resolutions, numbering some four or five, embraced different classes of employes, to whom was given twenty per cent. extra compensation. Now, sir, while I do not know the fact, I say, from the best information I can get, from an examination of the statements made in the reports of the Secretary of the Treasury, that there are some allowances here made, which are not justified by any resolution which has passed this House, or by any law which has passed Congress. I notice here, in the first place:

"For additional compensation for settling and adjusting the outstanding bills under the book resolution, found on file in the office which belonged to my predecessor, $750."

Now I find that wherever an allowance is made under a resolution of the House or law of Congress, the authority is always referred to specifically by its date in the statement which precedes the receipt. In this case, I find no such reference, either to the law or to the resolution of the House directing the payment of this money out of the contingent fund, or any other fund to which it is chargeable. This is only my conclusion. I do not know how the facts may be; but, from the information I have, I think I am warranted in drawing this conclusion from the manner in which these items are stated in this report. I refer gentlemen to this report from page 82 to page 89, for information on this subject. Now in the very next item for Mr. Barclay, it reads:

"For compensation allowed by the resolution of the House of Representatives of March 3, 1857, $5,706 97."

But in the next item, there is no resolution referred to. Then I refer to the item for Mr. Ingram:

"For services as clerk to the Committee of Accounts of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, $650."

Now, sir, there is no law or resolution authorizing the Committee of Accounts to pay Mr. Ingram for this service.

Then is an item for Mr. John Bailey:

"For compensation for additional service as clerk in the office of the House of Representatives of the United States, twenty-five dollars a month, from the 1st of May, 1850, to June 30, 1853, being thirty-eight months, $950."

Now, sir, I see no reference to any resolution or law authorizing this money to be paid; nor have I been able to find any resolution or law of Congress which authorizes the payment of this money to Mr. Bailey. I understand he is a mere assistant clerk in the Clerk's office, and entitled to no additional compensation for any services.

Now, sir, unless I can get some information which shall satisfy me that these allowances were properly made, I cannot vote to give them credit for these allowances. Now, sir, I know there will be objection upon the part of many of our friends to this section of the bill, but, sir, it strikes me the objection ought to have been made at the time the resolutions were passed in the last Congress giving the extra compensation. I opposed those resolutions; but now I concur with the Secretary of the Treasury in recommending an appropriation for the payment of the parties embraced in the resolutions. Besides these claims, there are, I understand, others which have been authorized by resolution, which have not been paid.

The Secretary says, on the eighty-fifth page:

"There are other claims, as I am informed, which have not been presented, of a similar character."

"A portion of these payments were made under resolutions of the House, directing the Clerk to make them. The others were made under the direction of the Committee of Accounts of the House; all of them were made out of the contingent fund of the House. Upon this statement of facts, the question arises, shall the Clerk be allowed credit for them by the accounting officers of the Treasury in the settlement of his accounts?"

And then again: after going on to examine the various laws now in force, and having satisfied his own mind that those laws prohibited him from allowing the extra compensation provided under these resolutions, the Secretary closes his report in these words:

"The greatest reluctance I have felt in coming to this conclusion arises from the apprehension that injustice may be done to the persons whose claims have thus been recognized, and the officers of the Senate and House, who have acted in good faith in complying with the directions of their respective Houses."

"I have no doubt that these officers have so acted, and in refusing to settle their accounts no imputation is intended to be thrown upon their official conduct."

"In paying these accounts, they have only done what they were required to do, and what long-established usage justified them in doing. Under such circumstances, they should be protected from any loss or injury, and I have no doubt Congress will do it. The accounts must be suspended, however, until the meeting of Congress, when I will recommend the passage of a law authorizing the Department to pass them."

"In this way, these officers can be amply protected, a wise and good law vindicated, and a bad practice corrected."

Mr. MASON. I will ask the gentleman whether he undertakes to say that these have been paid?

Mr. LETCHER. I undertake to say that I have made an inquiry of two I have fallen in with this morning, both of whom say that they have been paid. I undertake to say further, that this record contains, upon its face, the receipt of these parties for the money, and the Secretary of the Treasury avers that these receipts are on file in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MASON. In opposition to that, I have to say this: when I was last in the Committee of Accounts there was a large number of applications from employes of the House asking for the payment of this money, because it had not been paid by the Clerk of the House. In deference to the opinion expressed by the Secretary of the Treasury, that the claims were illegal, we did not pay them. Some had been paid, but the Clerk subsequently deducted the amount paid from the monthly pay. These parties, too, are applicants for repayment.

Mr. LETCHER. Who were they?

Mr. MASON. I do not recollect. The clerk in the Sergeant-at-Arms's office was one. Mr. Buck has also been before the committee for the allowance of his claim. It was rejected. He filed an argument for a reconsideration, but it has not been granted. I understand that the Clerk declined to pay these claims, because he was afraid that if he did so he would lose the amount.

Mr. LETCHER. What was the amount of that of Mr. Buck?

Mr. MASON. It was $340. I can send to the committee room and get that, and also his argument.

Mr. LETCHER. The gentleman is after a horse of another color.

Mr. MASON. It was under a resolution of the last House, passed on the last night of the last session.

Mr. LETCHER. I refer to the receipts that the Secretary of the Treasury sends here. On page 83, there is a receipt from Mr. Buck for $43 20, in full of the above account; and that is one of the suspended items.

Mr. MAYNARD. What is the date of that receipt?

Mr. LETCHER. The 31st of March, 1857.

Mr. MASON. All these men made out their accounts and sent them to the chief clerk, accompanied with their receipts. That is the usual way in which the thing is done. They do not get the money then. The Clerk waits until they pass the Committee of Accounts. He did not pay these until that committee acted on them; and he very properly waited for the action of that committee. They have never been indorsed, and they remain in that committee yet. It is considered that the amounts asked for are not legally due to these men. It is only a pretext that the Clerk has paid them, and will lose the amount paid if this appropriation be not granted.

Mr. LETCHER. These accounts I have referred to are certified to by the Committee of Accounts, and they have been paid and receipted for, if there is any faith to be placed in the public documents. Here is "B. B. Thurston, chairman of the Committee of Accounts," attached to each of them, showing that they were allowed by that committee. They were paid by the Clerk after that allowance, and they are now suspended in the Department because the Secretary of the Treasury came to the conclusion that the resolutions under which they were paid were in violation of a previous act then upon the statute-book. They were paid under a resolution of the House, passed when the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. JONES] and myself were here; and beside that, we came into the last Congress, and neither the gentleman nor anybody else raised a question about it to stop the payment at that time or to prohibit the Clerk from getting credit for the amount. Why is it that the thing is now stirred up? It has been going on ever since I have been here. I have voted against it uniformly. The money has been appropriated, and it has been applied. Why did not these gentlemen raise the question then? Why is it raised now when the Secretary of the Treasury brings it up here for the purpose of enabling him to adjust the accounts of one of the parties who has accounts outstanding in his Department?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make an inquiry. I understand the gentleman to say that these accounts and receipts have been allowed and are indorsed by the Committee of Accounts. I wish to ask him this question: was there any House of Representatives in existence, or any Committee of Accounts in session in this Capitol, on the 31st of March, 1857?

Mr. LETCHER. There is one allowed on the 7th of March.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was there a House then?

Mr. LETCHER. There was not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Was there a Committee of Accounts?

Mr. LETCHER. There was not. Now, as one good turn deserves another, let me ascertain from the gentleman from Tennessee whether he has ever known, in any previous Congress, of allowances being made by the Committee of Accounts after the close?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not know of any.

Mr. LETCHER. If they were not made after the close of the Congress, when were they made? Here were the resolutions passed on the last night of the session, when the very last sands of an expiring Congress were running out, authorizing these payments to be made; and if they were not to be allowed then, when were they to be allowed?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am not asking when they were to be allowed. I asked the gentleman if there was any Committee of Accounts in session at that time?

Mr. LETCHER. I tell him there was not.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then who allowed these accounts?

Mr. LETCHER. They were allowed by the chairman of the Committee of Accounts, as you can see upon reference to the books—

Mr. HOUSTON. But he was not a member of Congress at that time.

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir, who was not a member of Congress at that time.

Mr. RUFFIN. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Clerk actually paid them?

Mr. LETCHER. I do say he has paid two whom I have inquired of, and I understand that he has paid all the others. It so appears in this book.

Mr. RUFFIN. Can the gentleman show it?

Mr. LETCHER. Here are the receipts, and the Secretary of the Treasury avers that the receipts are filed in the Treasury Department.

Mr. MASON. They are either paid, or not paid—one or the other.

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly.

Mr. MASON. And the gentleman is either mistaken, or not mistaken.

Mr. LETCHER. Certainly; that is so.

Mr. MASON. The gentleman makes his argument upon the ground that the Clerk will suffer loss unless an appropriation is made to pay them. If the Clerk will not lose, will the gentleman back down from his appropriation?

Mr. LETCHER. Yes, sir; I say so, distinctly and unequivocally. I have no secret here or elsewhere about such matters. If the receipts have been sent to the Treasury Department, and no money has been paid by the Clerk in discharge of them, I say frankly that I will not stand up and ask a single dollar to pay them. And now I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether it is the fact that they have not been paid?

Mr. MASON. The fact is, that the Clerk will not lose a single dollar, if you do not make an appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. Where is the evidence of that? I have none. The gentleman says he entertains opinions which would do to bet upon; but still such opinions may be very erroneous opinions, notwithstanding. Now, I would like to know where is the evidence of the fact that these receipts have been taken improperly, and that they have been sent there without any payment having been made?

Mr. MASON. Do not understand me to say that the Clerk has acted improperly.

Mr. LETCHER. If they have been sent to the Treasury Department and filed as vouchers for so much money actually paid, is there nothing improper in it—nothing improper in their remaining there twelve months in that condition? It strikes me there is a very decided impropriety, and that it is calculated to make a very unfair impression upon the mind of the Secretary of the Treasury, in regard to the obligation upon the part of the Government, to indemnify that officer for money disbursed. Well, I want the facts, and the evidence of the facts.

Mr. MASON. I say it is so.

Mr. LETCHER. You say it is so; but the Secretary of the Treasury says otherwise in his report. Show to me in any satisfactory manner that none of this money has been paid by the Clerk of the House of Representatives, and I will not vote to give him a single dollar of it. It is upon the presumption of the action of this House in directing the Clerk to make the payment, and upon the presumption raised by these receipts presented to the Secretary of the Treasury, that I am for allowing to the Clerk the amount which will enable him to square up his accounts. That is my only reason. I am as much opposed, as everybody knows, to extra expenditures and to extra compensation as is the gentleman from Kentucky, or as any member of this House. I have voted against all of them; and I imagine that the gentleman cannot, in the six years I have been a member of this House, refer to a solitary vote which I have given in this Congress, or any preceding Congress, in which I have undertaken to apply any portion of the public money, in the way of extra compensation, to the employees about the House. I do not want to do it now. I disapproved of these resolutions then, as I do now. I voted then as I shall vote hereafter, in the event of such a proposition being presented. And I say now, if the gentleman will furnish the evidence to show that this money has not been paid, and that the Clerk is not liable for a dollar of it, I am ready to go with him, and strike this section from the bill. I am not going to stickle upon words. I want the evidence to show that the money has not been paid. If the gentleman from Alabama, or the gentleman from Tennessee, or any other gentleman, will furnish me with evidence to show that what appears upon the face of this paper, declaring that the Clerk has paid the money, is not true, I will vote to strike out this provision of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I say to the gen-deman from Virginia that his side has the affirmative, and he has the men in the Capitol who gave those receipts. There are two of them in the Clerk's desk now. Put them under oath to say whether they have been paid the money or not.

Mr. LETCHER. One of them says he has. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY obtained the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I have been trying to get the floor for some time. I understand that there is some sort of a system by which gentlemen are allowed to get the floor. I have been promised it from time to time, but have not succeeded in getting it; and I desire to say that I do not wish to be postponed simply because I am a new member, or because I may not be able to say much to interest the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is out of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor. The Chair will state that he has promised nobody the floor. It is true there are certain rules observed by all Chairmen—one to alternate between the different sides of the House. But if any gentleman takes the floor decidedly before anybody else, no matter who he may be, the Chair will recognize him. Where two or more gentlemen rise about the same time, the present occupant of the Chair will consult various considerations in assigning the floor, which he thinks are based upon just and proper principles.

Mr. REAGAN. I have no objection to the exercise of a sound discretion, but I solemnly protest against the exercise of a power which excludes me from the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. As to any promises that may have been made to the gentleman from Texas heretofore, the present occupant of the chair knows nothing about them. Unless the gentleman rises to a question of order, the Chair rules him to be out of order. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is entitled to the floor.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not rise to a question of order. I only rise to insist that I shall not be postponed for the benefit of other gentlemen. I was upon the floor as soon as the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. By what right does the gentleman ask the floor if he was upon it only as soon as the gentleman from Pennsylvania? The Chair did not hear him until after he had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REAGAN. I must submit to the decision of the Chair, but I do it with a sense of injustice.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I was upon the floor as soon as either of the gentlemen, and I would propose a compromise—that both gentlemen retire, and that the floor be awarded to me. [Laughter.]

Mr. REAGAN. If the floor is a matter of privilege, I would like now publicly to enter my name upon the privileged list, for I do desire to speak, and think I ought to have the floor.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to defend the right of the white man to govern himself. We have frequently, in the past, discussed the question of the right to hold the negro in slavery, but never before has the right of the white man to self-government been disputed. Our forefathers, who framed the Constitution of the United States, made concessions to, and compromises with, the institution of negro slavery as it then existed, and those concessions and compromises the Democracy of the North are willing to abide by and carry out. The terms of partnership arranged by the Federal compact must be faithfully fulfilled by the several copartners. But when any portion of our people demand of us to take from the white man the right of self-government, and to substitute the act of a convention for the will of the people, we, as Democrats, indignantly refuse obedience. No such concession is in the bond of Union.

Conceal it under the most specious pretexts; disguise it by legal quibbles and technical quibbles; yet you never can deceive the people into the belief that you are not attempting to impose a government on the white men of Kansas against which they have protested, and still protest, in every form in which they can legally speak. When we consult the Leecompton constitution itself, we learn that it has never been submitted to the people for their approval or disapproval. We turn from the constitution to the legal authorities of the Territory; we ask the Delegate on this floor if he approves this instrument; and, in the name of his constituency, he indignantly answers no. We turn to the legally-elected Legislature, recently in session, and they point us to our Journal, on which stands the most solemn protest against this high-handed usurpation. We turn to the people, and learn that a majority of ten thousand have already spoken its condemnation with a voice so loud that it must be heard, and so decided that it cannot be mistaken.

The issue between us and those who contend for the admission of Kansas is radical and fundamental. We contend that the constitution must be the work of the people, express their will, and speak with their authority. On the other side, it is contended, that a convention, no matter how constituted, binds the people by its action. We contend that the people shall rule the convention; our opponents, that the convention is above the people, and that the people must be ruled by its edicts. We contend that although the convention can frame a constitution, it cannot put it in operation against the consent of the people. The advocates for the admission of Kansas contend that the power of the convention, like the power of Parliament, is omnipotent, and that they can frame a constitution and put it in operation, not only without the consent of the people, but against the solemn protest of every man, woman, and child in the Territory. This is the question for consideration; this the issue presented. For the first time in the history of our country has the great principle of self-government been openly attacked; for the first time we are called upon to stand up in the Halls of Congress to defend the right of white men to frame their own institutions and regulate their own government.

It is vain to seek to disguise the issue. It cannot and shall not be done. The question presented for consideration is a plain one. It admits of no equivocation. No ingenuity of argument, no combination of high sounding words will conceal it.

The Lecompton convention either had the power to frame and put in operation a constitution, without the consent, nay, even against the wish of the whole people of Kansas, or it had not. If that convention could impose a constitution on an unwilling people, then Kansas should be admitted. If, on the contrary, that convention was not clothed with this almost omnipotent power over the freedom of the people, then that constitution should be rejected. If the convention had not the power to force the whole constitution upon the people, they had no power to force a part of it upon them. If it is admitted that it was necessary to submit any part of the constitution to the approval of the people, it was necessary to submit all parts of it. The parts of a constitution are all equally important, and if any part is invalid until it has been approved by the people, it is clear that all parts are equally invalid until they have been approved in the same manner. If the power given by the Legislature of Kansas authorized the convention to frame a constitution and put it in operation, it authorized them to put it all in operation; not to put a part in force and leave another part dependent on the will of the people. Either the grant made by the Legislature to the convention "to form a constitution," included and carried with it the power to ratify and put it in force without the consent, or even against the consent, of the people, or it did not. The grant of power was as ample in reference to the slavery clause as it was in reference to any other subject. The convention was clothed either with absolute or with qualified power. If absolute, it was absolute in all respects. If qualified, it was qualified in every respect. I am determined the friends of this Lecompton constitution shall not evade the issue; that they shall be held to the responsibility of the measure they advocate. The people of this country shall understand that you admit Kansas on the principle that the Lecompton convention had power to force a constitution on the people of Kansas, even if every voter in the Territory had opposed it. It will not do for gentlemen to contend that a part of the constitution was submitted to a vote of the people. If the power to put the constitution in operation belonged to the convention, then it gained no additional force by being submitted to a vote of the people, and such submission was an idle ceremony. If, on the contrary, it was necessary to give validity to the constitution that any part of it should be submitted for the approval of the people, it is an indisputable sequence that it was equally necessary to submit the whole constitution to the people. The argument is, that the power to "form a constitution" carries with it the power to ratify and put such constitution in operation without the consent of the people. The power is not to put one clause, but every clause which the convention may think proper to incorporate, in operation; so that the man who predicates his advocacy of the Lecompton constitution on the submission of a part of the slavery clause to a vote of the people, is acting inconsistently with his own doctrine, for if it was necessary to submit the slavery clause, it was necessary to submit the whole instrument; for the power over the slavery clause was as ample as it was over any other part of it, and no necessity could exist in the one case which did not exist in the other. If the vote of the people gave validity to the slavery clause, the balance of the instrument was invalid, because it did not receive the approval of the people.

The President of the United States, in his very able message, delivered at the beginning of this session, felt the full force of this argument, and attempted to show that there was a distinction made in the Kansas-Nebraska act which rendered it necessary that the slavery clause should be submitted to a vote of the people, whilst the other provisions could be put in force without such submission. The President says:

"In the Kansas-Nebraska act, however, this requirement, as applicable to the whole constitution, had not been inserted, and the convention were not bound by its terms to submit any other portion of the instrument to an election, except that which relates to the 'domestic institutions' of slavery. This will be rendered clear by a simple reference to its language. It was 'not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way.' According to the plain construction of the sentence, the words 'domestic institutions' have a direct, as they have an appropriate reference to slavery. 'Domestic institutions' are limited to the family. The relation between master and slave and a few others are 'domestic institutions,' and are entirely distinct from institutions of a political character."

I think there is not a man on this floor bold enough to follow this interpretation. The "domestic institutions" of a State—what are they? The domestic institutions of a house refer to the internal affairs of such house. The domestic institutions of a State mean its whole internal polity; the home institutions as contradistinguished from those outside relations which States have with each other. The domestic institutions of a State have reference to the internal relations of the citizens of such State to each other, in the same manner as the domestic institutions of a family have reference to the relations which the members of such family bear to each other. When we use the term "domestic institutions" in reference to a family, we confine and limit the meaning of the term to those relations which exist in a family. When, however, we use the words in reference to a State, the meaning is enlarged by the connection, and it embraces the relations which the citizens of such State bear to each other. Used in this sense, a bank is as much a domestic institution as the relation of husband and wife, or parent and child. This is the clear meaning of the terms used in the Kansas-Nebraska act. The term "domestic institutions," as used in that act, had reference to the domestic institutions, not of a family, but of a State; and the domestic institutions of Kansas are the provisions for its government found in its constitution.

If we were to admit that the term domestic institutions referred only to the family relations, it would include a great many things besides slavery; and if the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act required the provisions of the constitution of Kansas relating to her domestic institutions to be submitted to a vote of the people, then the Lecompton convention most clearly violated this part of the organic law, for nothing but the slavery clause—and that only in part—was submitted. The President admits that the term "domestic institutions" includes "a few other relations" besides those of master and servant. We all know that it includes a great many more, and those of the highest importance. The relation of husband and wife, parent and child, guardian and ward, are universally admitted to be "domestic institutions," in the most confined sense in which the terms are ever used. Yet no submission of the legislative power in reference to any of these relations was made. These are the most delicate and important relations which we sustain. Why, then, were they not submitted? The President says the Kansas-Nebraska act required the provisions relating to the "domestic institutions" to be submitted. It was not done; and, therefore, on his own showing the constitution is clearly in violation of the organic act. But it may be argued that I have given a more enlarged significance to the term "domestic institution" than the President did, and that therefore my conclusions are unjust to him. I intend no injustice, and will be guilty of none where I know it, and more especially to our Chief Magistrate, whom I honor and respect. But I do not intend to let this matter pass from me until I have shown that even in relation to slavery, the Lecompton convention has not complied with the President's interpretation of the organic act.

The President contends that it was the duty of the convention to submit the slavery question to a vote of the people. Was this done? If it was not, then the action of the convention is in violation of the law of Congress, and is therefore void. Was the slavery clause submitted to a vote of the people? No one dare contend that it was. The only question submitted to be voted upon was the importation of slaves from places without the Territory. Slavery, as it existed in the Territory, was not only not submitted, but, on the contrary, it was fixed and established, so that all who were slaves at that time, and all their descendants, throughout all time to come, were to be and remain slaves. And not only was this true, but the voter was compelled to vote for this continuance of slavery before he would be allowed to even vote for prohibiting the importation of slaves; for it is to be remembered that the tickets were "For the Constitution," or "For the Constitution without Slavery." The ticket was all the time "For the Constitution"—never against it. "For the Constitution," with all its slavery clauses, was the ticket. Now, if the President's construction is correct, the question of slavery should have been submitted to a vote of the people. Not a part of the question, but the whole question of slavery. Not simply whether any more slaves should be imported, but whether slavery should continue to exist. The law provides that the State is to be admitted with or without slavery, as the people should determine. Notwithstanding this provision of the organic law, slavery was fastened upon them by the Lecompton constitution without their consent, and no opportunity was afforded them to vote on that question. Is this what you define "leaving the people perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way?" Is this your interpretation of the meaning of that boasted law extending popular sovereignty? Let us examine this question still further.

Not only was the slavery question not submitted, but before the voter was permitted to deposit his ballot on the future importation of slaves, he might be required to take an oath to support the constitution if adopted. He was required to swear to support what he might desire to vote against. The history of the Old World furnishes instances where oaths of allegiance have been required from a conquered people, but never before in our free land has an American citizen been insulted, when he approached the polls to deposit his ballot, with a demand to swear allegiance to a constitution which was not adopted, and which he might not desire to have adopted. If I had been a citizen of Kansas, I would have regarded such a demand an accusation against my patriotism, and an insult to my manhood. I would not have taken it, and I would therefore have been disfranchised. But I will waive the implied charge of treason, which lies in the demand to take such an oath, and which was intended to drive high-minded men away from the polls, and I will take it for granted that the voter was willing to secure his rights by such degradation. The next question is, was the oath one which a man could safely take? Follow me, whilst I examine this question. The first section of the seventh article of the Lecompton constitution reads as follows:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and is as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Is this the declaration of a legal and constitutional truth? Is it true that the right of property in a slave rests on the same foundation as that of a horse or a cow? We are told in that great good Book, that when God had deluged the earth and destroyed the antediluvian race, except Noah and his family, he made a solemn covenant with Noah, as the representative and father of the tribes and nations of men that were to live in the countless ages of future time; a part of which covenant is in this beautiful and impressive language: "And the fear of you, and the dread of you, shall be upon every beast of the earth and upon every fowl of the air; upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes in the sea; into your hand are they delivered." Upon this grand and glorious covenant with the great Creator of the universe, we predicate our title to property in animals—but man is not included. The right to the "beasts of the field, the birds of the air, and the fishes of the sea," is derived from the covenant of the rainbow; and wherever its triumphal arch spans the heavens with its web of brilliant beams, the right of man to such property is acknowledged and respected. This right of property does indeed stand above human laws and constitutions—it comes from Deity; and it will remain above human constitutions as long as the bright bow in the clouds shall gild the heavens "when storms prepare to part."

Now, I will not dispute the right of our southern brethren to their slaves, but that right comes from the local enactment of the State; it is not derived from the law of God, but is the creature of human legislation. The right to hold a slave is a matter of positive enactment, and, being but a human law, can be repealed by the legislative authority of any country where it exists.

I am as willing to carry out the compromises of the Constitution on this subject, in good faith, as any other man. I respect the right possessed by Virginia and all the southern States over slavery, within their limits, and I would not interfere with it. The jurisdiction over the subject is in their hands. But when I am asked to support it as a fundamental truth, that the right to hold a "slave and its increase" is a right above the reach of law and constitutions, I cannot do it. It is not so. There is no statesman who will dare contend for such a doctrine. If it be true, then slavery never can be abolished; and if we admit Kansas into the Union on the Lecompton constitution, slavery must continue to exist there through all time to come. The Legislature cannot abolish it, for it stands above the law. Constitutional conventions cannot overthrow it, for the voter in Kansas is required to swear to support it as "higher than any constitutional sanction." Think of it, my Democratic friends who vote for the admission of Kansas on the Lecompton constitution. You say that it was a fair submission of the slavery question to require a voter to swear to support it as a fundamental truth, that the right of a slaveholder to his "slave and its increase" stands on the same basis as the right of the farmer to his ox. "Go home, if you can; go home, if you dare," and tell your constituents that you supported a constitution which required the citizen to take an oath to support such doctrines before he was permitted to vote, and that you called that a fair submission of the constitution. Yes, go home and tell them that you have forced Kansas into the Union with a constitution which declares slavery above the reach of constitutional prohibition, and that, although the people may change the constitution, they never can abolish slavery, for the right of the master to the "slave and its increase" is higher than all constitutional sanctions. Tell the people who elected you that you have given up all the Territories to slavery; that the slaveowner has the right, according to the Dred Scott decision, to take his slave property into any of the Territories of the Union, and that you have established it as a fundamental truth, that constitutional conventions and Legislatures have no greater power to abolish it than they have to abolish the title of an owner to his ox or his horse. Yes, tell them that slavery is universal, and that they must submit to it.

My Democratic colleagues from Pennsylvania who vote to force the Lecompton constitution on Kansas, go home and tell our people that slavery yet exists in Pennsylvania—that the title to slave property has been declared by you to be above legislative enactments and constitutional provisions; that the gradual emancipation bill passed by the patriotic and philanthropic fathers of the glorious old Keystone is void; and that slavery yet exists in full vigor in the land of Penn. My northern Democratic friends from the old original thirteen States, if this doctrine is true as enunciated in the Lecompton constitution—and you say by your votes that it is true—then slavery exists in the northern part of the old thirteen States as completely as it does in Alabama or South Carolina. If it is true that constitutions cannot prohibit, nor Legislatures abolish, then slavery is universal, and exists everywhere.

Nor was this all. Not only was the voter required to take an oath to support the clause I have quoted, but the whole constitution. Now, the fourteenth article of the schedule of the Lecompton constitution provides as follows:

"After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention, and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives. Said delegates, so elected, shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

The Legislature may provide for any amendment they may deem proper, except the right to amend the constitution so that slavery could be abolished and Kansas be made a free State. Slavery is to be fastened upon them forever. Not only was the voter to take such an oath, but every officer of every class and kind who might be elected through all time to come, is required to swear to support this and every other clause of this extraordinary constitution. Will my Democratic friends still contend that the slavery clause was fairly submitted? Let me ask whether there is a northern man on this floor or elsewhere, who would swear to support a constitution which fastened slavery upon the people of Kansas forever, and which prohibits its abolition through all time to come?

But I have not done with this branch of the case. We have been told that the Lecompton constitution is a legal instrument; that it is made in conformity to law, and in obedience to the provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska act? What will my Democratic friends say, when I assure them that not only is this not so, but that the Lecompton constitution not only violates, but actually repeals, the Kansas-Nebraska act? I desire the attention of the committee to this matter; for, of all the infamous devices ever contrived by cunning and unprincipled men to deprive the people of their right of self-government, I consider this the most adroitly arranged and deeply laid. And, here, I must call the attention of members to the dates of these transactions. I will raise the curtain and give them a peep at the actors behind the scenes. The delegates to the Lecompton convention were elected in June—the Legislature had repealed the test oaths—and the intention of the free-State party to vote in October had been openly proclaimed, and was well understood throughout the Territory. The convention assembled in September, and although their labors could have been completed in a week, they appointed committees, and adjourned until the 19th of October.

The object of this long adjournment is obvious to every mind—the convention desired to know the result of that election, as it would demonstrate which party was in the majority in the Territory; they could then see whether it would do to submit the constitution with its slavery provisions to a fair vote of the people. They could also take proper precautions to deprive the free-State Legislature, if that party succeeded at the election, of all power. The October election was held, and the free-State men swept the State, and elected all the officers. Since the organization of the Territory, they had been deprived of all political power; they had been driven from the polls at the first election by armed bands; they were afterwards disfranchised by test oaths, so odious, and so clearly in violation of the Constitution of the United States, that every Democrat on this floor, and every Democrat in the Senate, voted for Toombs's bill, which declared them void. Now, that party had succeeded in electing their officers at a fair election, and the power to repeal the unjust and oppressive laws of which they complained, was in their own hands. We, as Democrats, rather regretted the result of this election, as it was looked upon as a Republican triumph; but the election was a fair one, and we were perfectly willing to submit. Not so the Lecompton convention. Let me turn the attention of members to the second article of the schedule to the Lecompton constitution. It provides as follows:

"All laws now in force in the Territory of Kansas, which are not repugnant to this constitution, shall continue and be of force until altered, amended, or repealed by a Legislature assembled under the provisions of this constitution."

The free-State Legislature elected in October is thus blotted out of existence. It might assemble and adjourn, but it could not change the laws—its power of legislation was gone. The only way the laws in force on the 7th of November, 1857, could be "altered or repealed," was by a Legislature elected under the provisions of the Lecompton constitution. The October election was treated as though it had never taken place; and the existence of the officers then chosen was completely ignored. Now, permit me to ask, what right did the Kansas-Nebraska act secure to the people? We must answer, the right of electing their own law-makers, and making their own laws. And this right was guaranteed to them so long as they remained a Territory. Now, a legally and fairly elected Legislature has assembled since the 7th of November last; that Legislature has passed many important laws; those laws have been signed and approved by Governor Denver—are now on the statute-book. If you admit Kansas with this Lecompton constitution, those laws are thereby repealed. And the right of legislation secured by the Kansas-Nebraska act is negated and nullified. This, gentlemen, is the constitution which we have been so often and triumphantly told was a legal instrument, made in obedience to that "enabling act," the Kansas-Nebraska bill. This provision, too, the voter was required to swear he would support. My Democratic friends, will you dare to tell me this was a fair submission of the slavery clause, hedged around, as it was, by the most monstrous enunciation of startling principles, which voters were required to swear they would support as an equivalent for the privilege of voting?

The slavery question has never been submitted to a vote of the people. The President says the organic law required such a submission, and, therefore, the Lecompton constitution is not, on his own showing, a legal instrument.

I have run this matter out in detail, for the benefit of that very respectable body of Democrats on this floor who, with the President, base their support of this measure on the submission of the slavery question. Gentlemen, you cannot stand on such a platform. It is too narrow. If you admit that the slavery question should have been submitted, it has not been done; and the failure to do what you say was required under the organic law, should compel you, on your own principles, to oppose the admission of Kansas on the Lecompton constitution. You have two horns of a dilemma. You must either construe the law to mean that the convention had power to force the constitution on the people whether they were willing or unwilling, or you must, with the President, contend, that the organic law, which he construes into an "enabling act," required the submission of the slavery question to a vote of the people. If you take the former, then you give mere delegates despotic power. If the latter, the constitution is in violation of your "enabling act," and is most clearly void. The choice is before you—take which horn you will.

The extraordinary power claimed for the Lecompton convention is derived from the mere election of the delegates. We are told by honorable gentlemen that, by the election of delegates, the people ratify the constitution which the delegates may afterwards form. I must beg to dissent from this monstrous doctrine. At the time of such election no constitution has been formed, and, consequently, none is before the people for consideration. How, then, can they be said to ratify that which is not in existence? The election of delegates determines only who shall be delegated to draw up a constitution, and nothing more. It settles whether a Democrat or a Republican shall be chosen; or, to apply the rule to Kansas, it determines whether pro-slavery or free-State men shall be delegates. It determines nothing else and nothing more. The constitution which is not in existence is not in issue; its provisions are not known, and cannot be passed upon.

But it is contended that when we delegate the power to a convention to "form a constitution," this includes not only the power to "form," or draw up, the instrument, but also to ratify and put it in force. I regard this as a monstrous doctrine; one that cannot be sustained on any fair and legitimate construction of the terms. To "form a constitution" means to draw up and arrange the provisions of such an instrument in methodical shape. The agents employed are mere clerks or attorneys, clothing the contract between the members of society in legal phrases and set terms of art.

We may gain great light on this subject by first determining upon a proper definition for that technical word constitution.

We hear the term in courts and Congress—in the pulpit and the press; but it is not an easy matter to find a true and exact definition of its meaning. We have in our country a great many kinds of written constitutions; but an exact idea of the import of the word is, perhaps, not very generally had.

Some years since, in the Senate Chamber of the United States, two of the intellectual giants of the last generation struggled for the mastery. They were endeavoring to give a definition to that word constitution. Webster and Calhoun have passed away; but, thanks to the art of printing, their thoughts still live. Mr. Calhoun, in his speech in reply to Mr. Webster, on the 26th of February, 1833, defined the Constitution of the United States to be a "compact" between the several States.

Mr. Webster admitted that the "Constitution was founded on a compact" between the whole people of the United States, and not between the several States as States. I refer to these definitions, not to renew the controversy as to whether our Constitution is a confederation of the people or a compact between the States, but only to show what these enlightened statesmen defined it to be. I have always concurred with Mr. Calhoun in his definition of the term. I think none other could be properly given.

Mr. SINGLETON. I would like to know who it is that the people make the compact with? Who is the other contracting party?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I will tell you. According to the definition of Mr. Calhoun, the Constitution of the United States was a compact between the States; according to Mr. Webster's definition, it was a compact between the people of the whole country. The gentleman asks whom the people of a State compact with? Why, each man compacts with all the rest. A constitution may be defined to be the compact or contract made by the citizens of a State, each one with all the rest, defining the principles on which the association is to be conducted. The citizens of a district of country agree to form themselves into a body politic; the individual members compact or agree to give up certain portions of their individual rights, to take upon themselves certain burdens in consideration of the mutual advantages of security, protection, and power, which flow from the association.

This is the highest and most important compact that ever has or ever can be made by the race of man. None other is exactly like it or can compare with it in the importance of its objects or the greatness of its results. In every other compact, after the agreement is drawn up, it must be ratified and confirmed by the contracting parties. It matters not how learned the attorney, agent, clerk, or delegate employed to put the contract in form, nor how greatly he may be celebrated for his wisdom and integrity, after he has completed his part of the work the instrument is of no validity, it remains a mere blank until it receives the approbation of the parties.

Is it possible that we will be told the agreement, contract, or compact of a sovereign State does not require as great solemnities as the most trivial agreement between man and man? No, the mere power to draw up a constitutional compact gives no greater validity to the instrument drawn than is given by contracting parties to a mere clerk who embodies the terms of their agreement in legal form. They are but agreements, unexecuted, until they have received the approbation of the high contracting parties—the one at the ballot-box, the only way in which the people signify their consent; and the other by the signature of the parties. Here permit me to embody the language of "the god-like Webster." Speaking of the Constitution of the United States, he says:

"It is to be remembered that the Constitution began to speak only after its adoption. Until then it was but a proposal, a mere draft of an instrument. It was like a deed drawn up, but not executed. The convention had framed it, sent it to Congress, then sitting under the Confederation. Congress had it transmitted to the State Legislatures, and by the latter it was laid before the conventions of the people of the several States. All this while it was inoperative. It had received no stamp of authority; it spoke no language. But when ratified by the people, then it had a voice, and spoke authentically. Every word in it had received the sanction of the popular will, and was to be received as the expression of that will."

It can matter nothing whether we agree with Mr. Calhoun or Mr. Webster in their definition of the nature of our Federal Constitution; all I desire to show is, that, after it was drawn, it had to be ratified by the contracting parties. It matters not whether it is considered as a compact between the several States, or as a compact between the people of the whole Union, still it was invalid until it had the sanction of the people, whose compact or contract it was.

Mr. SINGLETON. Then I wish to know if it be a compact, unless it be sanctioned and approved by all the people, is it binding on those who refuse to give it their sanction?

Mr. MONTGOMERY. It is a fundamental principle of society that the majority shall rule.

The Constitution of the United States was a compact between the several States, and the States ratified it. A State constitution is a compact between the people of the State, and the people must ratify it. I trust the honorable gentleman from Virginia [Mr. BOGGS] will notice how easy it is to answer his ingenious argument, that the Constitution of the United States was not ratified by the people.

There are several kinds of compacts, but I know of none which does not require the consent of the high contracting parties after it is drawn. Leagues and treaties are both international compacts, yet after the terms of the instrument have been agreed upon, and signed by the commissioners or delegates of the contracting powers, the league or treaty has no validity, until it is approved and sanctioned by the sovereign power of the several nations interested. A constitutional compact is a branch of the same family, but higher in authority and greater in importance. What satisfactory reasons can be urged why delegates cannot bind the nations for whom they compact in leagues and treaties, that will not apply with greater force, and more convincing clearness, to a constitutional compact? I confidently say there is none. The right of the people to ratify their constitution is such an important power, so indispensable to good government, and such a safeguard to national freedom, that I regard it as inalienable.

But it would not weaken my position if I were to admit that the people might delegate away this right; but in such a case, the terms of the grant should be made in the clearest language, and the most unquestionable form. Such a power is never to be derived from mere inference. It could not arise from a grant of the power "to form a constitution." This is clearly shown in the case of the Constitution of the United States. The power was given to the convention "to form a constitution;" yet, the delegates, composed of the greatest men our country ever produced, decided that after the instrument was drawn up, it should be submitted to the people for ratification. I know it may be said that the Constitution of the United States was not submitted to a vote of the people; but it was, under the direction of Congress, submitted to a vote of delegates chosen by the people for that purpose; and the concurring action of the convention and of Congress shows incontestably that they esteemed the power to form, and the power to ratify, as entirely distinct and separate. Nor will it do to say, as the honorable gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] did, in his manly and eloquent speech, that State constitutions and the Constitution of the United States are different in character. They are both constitutional compacts, differing slightly in their provisions, but exactly identical in character. Mr. Webster, in the great speech to which I have already referred, says:

"We do not need to be informed in this country what a constitution is. Is it not an idea perfectly familiar, definite, and well settled? We are at no loss to understand what is meant by the constitution of one of the States; and the Constitution of the United States speaks of itself as being an instrument of the same nature."

This is the language of the greatest constitutional lawyer our country ever produced, and I place his opinion against that of the honorable gentleman from South Carolina.

Constitutions may differ in their provisions, but still they are none the less constitutional compacts; and being the basis on which the law-making power rests, are properly called fundamental laws. The power of the Legislature to pass laws must always be in subordination to the warrant of attorney contained in the constitution. The law-making power must act in strict subordination to the limitations of the constitution; and, like all other agents, when they exceed the powers granted, their acts are not binding on the people; hence it is called a fundamental law.

But, beyond this there is no resemblance between a constitution and a law, and the arguments founded on such a resemblance have no solid foundation. The consent of the people to the laws passed by their Legislature is express, and not implied, and is found in the warrant of attorney contained in the constitution, which authorizes the Legislature to pass laws. A law is from its very nature an act of sovereignty. A law is defined to be a rule of human conduct "prescribed by the supreme power of a State." If the Legislature was not supreme their legislation would not be binding, and would want the essential requisite of a law. If the Legislature were to pass a law which was made dependent on the approval of the people for its validity, such law, although afterwards approved by the people, would be void, because the power of legislation must rest with, and be exercised by, the Legislature. Will any one contend, however, that, if a constitutional convention were to make the legal validity of the constitution depend on the approval of the people; it would therefore be void? No man will say so. And therein consists the difference. Legislation is the act of a supreme power, their act is a finality; but a constitutional convention has only the power to draw up the provisions of a compact; but its ratification belongs to the contracting parties—the people. The distinction is clear and obvious, and no unprejudiced inquirer can be misled by reasoning founded on analogies drawn from the acts of a Legislature.

I will conclude my remarks on this branch of the case with the following quotation from the Federalist, No. 43. Speaking of the old Articles of Confederation, the writer says:

"Resting on no better foundation than the consent of the State Legislatures, it has been exposed to frequent and intricate questions concerning the validity of its powers; and has, in some instances, given birth to the enormous doctrine of a right of legislative repeal. Owing its ratification to a law of a State, it has been contended that the same authority might repeal the law by which it was ratified. However gross a heresy it may be to maintain that a party to a compact has a right to revoke that compact, the doctrine itself has had respectable advocates. The possibility of a question of this nature proves the necessity of laying the foundations of our national Government deeper than in the mere sanction of delegated authority. The fabric of American empire ought to rest on the solid basis of the consent of the people. The streams of national power ought to flow immediately from that pure, original fountain of all legitimate authority."

I have thus shown, both by reason and authority, that the constitution framed at Lecompton should have been submitted to a fair and full vote of the people of Kansas.

It is, however, contended that there are precedents where constitutions have been formed and put in operation without submission to the people. It might be a sufficient answer to say, that I have established the rule for which I contend from principle, and precedents can never change principles. Precedents are changed and molded by circumstances; but principles are eternal and unchangeable. But I will admit that instances of this kind may be found, but they prove nothing. In those cases, the people waived their rights, and are estopped by their acquiescence; but the people of Kansas have never waived theirs. The Lecompton constitution has never been ratified by the people, and they protest against it going into operation until it has been approved. Constitutions have been put in operation in several States without a submission to a vote of the people, but those were cases where the constitution met with the approval of the large body of the people whose contract it was. But I here defy the production of a precedent of a constitution being forced upon an unwilling people, who have repudiated it by every means in their power. When such a precedent can be found, then I will look into it; until then, I desire to hear no more of precedents. But even if we were to consider it as a question to be ruled by precedent, the force of authority is greatly in favor of submission. I think there is not a single State now in this Union whose constitution, either as an original or amended instrument, has not been submitted to a vote of the people. I here give a table, showing the dates at which the constitutions of the several States have been voted upon. I have seen it frequently published in the newspapers, and have never seen it contradicted; and so far as I have any personal knowledge, it is correct:

I have shown that there is nothing in the mere authority "to form a constitution" which authorizes the convention to put such constitution in force, without a submission of the instrument to a vote of the people.

Now the question recurs as to the intention of the people of Kansas when they elected the delegates to the Lecompton convention. It will be remembered that only one party participated at that election. The pro-slavery party in the Territory elected all the delegates. Now, what was their intention? Did they intend that the convention should "form" a constitution, and put it in force without submitting it to a vote of the people? That no such intention was entertained, is incontestably shown, by a variety of circumstances. Previous to the election of delegates, pledges were required by the party from many of the candidates, that the constitution when formed should be submitted for approval or rejection to a vote of the people. Upon these pledges the party voted. Amongst others, Calhoun gave a pledge, that "the constitution"—not a clause or section of it, but "the constitution"—should be submitted to a full and fair vote of the people. I do not refer to these pledges for the purpose of arraigning these delegates for a violation of their plighted faith, as was claimed by my colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS:] that is a matter between them and the people whom they deluded and betrayed. I merely mention it to show that no party in Kansas ever understood that the constitution should be put in operation without a vote of the people. But I may be permitted to say, in passing, that the man who violated his solemn pledge given to his own party; who betrayed the constituency by whom he was elected, who, if we may rely on the testimony recently taken in Kansas, is a party to the most disgraceful and outrageous frauds ever perpetrated upon a free people, is hardly a fit person to carry the election returns of this distracted Territory in his pocket, and when Kansas has been admitted, give certificates of election to whom he pleases.

In July last, a pro-slavery convention of delegates from all parts of the Territory assembled at Lecompton. A resolution was offered pledging the support of the party to the constitution which might be formed, whether it was submitted to a vote of the people or not. But a single delegate voted for that proposition in all that large convention, and every other delegate voted against it. Governor Walker, as is well known, was an open advocate of the submission of the whole constitution. That convention called upon him to address them, which he did in his usual clear and convincing style, and when he had closed his remarks the convention indorsed his principles and pledged him their zealous support.

There, now, is the declaration of that party, after the election of delegates, but before the convention assembled at Lecompton, in favor of submitting the constitution to a vote of the people, and an unequivocal indorsement of the course of Governor Walker. Here, then, we learn, that neither party in Kansas ever intended that the constitution should be put in force without it was first approved by a full and fair vote of the people.

Let us now go outside of the Territory and see the opinion entertained on this question by the Democratic party. The Kansas-Nebraska bill, passed by that party, declared as a legal and fundamental truth, "that the people"—not a convention of delegates—but "the people should be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." The Cincinnati convention, representing all parts of our mighty Confederacy, declared in most emphatic terms, "that we recognize the right of the people of all the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and whenever the number of inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without domestic slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States."

This is a recognition, not of the rights of a convention, but of the people, to form a constitution; and, as if in prophetic anticipation of the events which have subsequently occurred, the resolution declares the manner in which this recognized right of the people shall be exercised. It was not only to be the "legally," but "fairly, expressed will of a majority of actual residents."

If we were to believe the statements of gentlemen on this floor, the question is not whether the constitution reflects the will of the "majority of the actual residents," nor whether that will has not only been "legally" and "fairly" expressed in its favor, but simply whether the Lecompton constitution was the work of the convention. The Cincinnati convention thought that the will of the majority of actual residents should be consulted. I think so too. That convention thought that the election at which this will of the people was expressed should not only be a legal but a fair election. I think so too; and in the name of that convention, and by its authority, I demand an investigation into the frauds attending the formation of the Lecompton constitution.

Upon this platform, with this interpretation, we went into the great contest of 1856. The people relied on these solemn pledges and we triumphed. I gave a part of those pledges to the people of my home amongst the hills, hundreds of miles away; that part shall never be forfeited nor violated. I told the companions of my childhood and the friends of my maturer years, that those were the principles of my party, and they confided in me; and although they cannot hear me now, I confidently repeat the declaration in the face of the American Congress. I stand now, as I then stood, on the Cincinnati platform, and contend now, as I contended then, for the inalienable right of the people to govern themselves.

The President of our choice was triumphantly elected on this platform; and deeply impressed with these truths, he said in his inaugural message:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure to every resident inhabitant [of Kansas] the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved."

This language is too clear to need comment. "It is the imperative duty of the Government to secure to every resident inhabitant"—not to a convention of delegates—"the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote." Not a right to speak through delegates, but "by his vote," directly, freely, and independently.

But I must pass on. A Governor was to be appointed to rule the Territory. A southern gentleman, with a national reputation, eminently distinguished for his ability as a statesman, had been selected for this place. General Cass, communicating to Robert J. Walker his appointment, by the direction of the President, gave him the following instructions:

"The regular Legislature of the Territory having authorized the assembling of a convention to form a constitution, to be accepted or rejected by Congress under the provisions of the Federal Constitution, the people of Kansas have the right to be protected in the peaceful election of delegates for such a purpose, under such authority; and the convention itself has a right to similar protection in the opportunity for tranquil and undisturbed deliberation. When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

Here, then, we have the interpretation given by the President and his Cabinet to the Kansas-Nebraska law and the Cincinnati platform. The language is not equivocal, doubtful, or conditional; it is not if the convention submit the constitution, but it is undoubting, unhesitating, having in view a fixed event. "When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of voting for or against that instrument." It was not the right of the people to vote on the slavery clause, nor on the "domestic institution," but "for or against the constitution."

Governor Walker accepted the appointment in the following bold, clear, and explicit avowal of his understanding of the requirements of the law and of its interpretation by the President and his Cabinet:

"I understand that you and all your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions."

Nor is this all. In his inaugural message, Governor Walker put the matter beyond all controversy. No man can mistake it. There is no room for equivocation or denial. The message was published, at the time, throughout the whole length and breadth of the land. It was forwarded to the President, and filed in the archives of the nation with the Secretary of State, and remains there now. The Governor says:

"With these views, well known to the President and Cabinet, and approved by them, I accepted the appointment of Governor of Kansas. My instructions from the President, through the Secretary of State, under date of the 30th of March last, sustain 'the regular Legislature of the Territory' in 'assembling a convention to form a constitution,' and they express the opinion of the President, that 'when such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument; and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence.'

"I repeat, then, as my clear conviction, that unless the convention submit the constitution to the vote of all the actual resident settlers of Kansas, and the election be fairly and justly conducted, the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress."

The Governor declares his clear conviction that the convention must submit "the constitution," not "the slavery clause," nor any other isolated clause, to a vote of the people. The vote must be "for or against it," not "for the constitution," or, "for the constitution without slavery." The people were to be secured the right to vote against the constitution; and, if this right was not secured, the Governor declares that "the constitution will be, and ought to be, rejected by Congress." If this was not the intention of the President; if he never meant to oppose the admission of Kansas if the constitution was not submitted to a full and fair vote of the people, then was the time to speak. Free-State and other voters might well stand aloof from the election of delegates, confidently relying on this promise of the Chief Magistrate, made through his official representative, that the constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people; and, if not submitted, that it would be rejected by Congress. It is monstrous injustice to the people of Kansas that this declaration should now be repudiated, when their rights under it have been denied. The great Democratic party of the North anchored their hopes for the final and eternal settlement of this angry controversy in the faithful fulfillment of that declaration. It was what we had always understood as the true interpretation of the Kansas-Nebraska law. We took our stand upon it, and we cannot be driven from it now. Others may abandon the doctrine of popular sovereignty; but I pledged myself to my constituents to adhere to it, and that pledge shall be redeemed.

Governor Walker adhered to this doctrine of submission, and resigned his office rather than desert the principles which he had been instructed to support, and which he had pledged his party to carry out. Secretary Stanton clung to this inalienable right of the white man, and was dismissed from office for his devotion to the people. The author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill insists that its provisions shall be fairly interpreted and honestly carried out, and Douglas is proscribed. Governor Wise, Governor Packer, and the great historian, Bancroft, refuse to strike the flag of popular sovereignty, and they are denounced as renegades. The Democracy of New Jersey, New York, all New England, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Wisconsin, Iowa, and California, devotedly and persistently adhere to the principles of the Cincinnati platform, and demand that the Lecompton constitution shall be rejected, and they are read out of the party as deserters from the great Democratic army. Thank God, the people of the North are true on this question, and although they may be betrayed and deceived, they will never abandon their devotion to the principles of self-government, nor strike the Democratic flag.

I have thus shown that the Lecompton constitution can be supported on neither principle nor precedent. I have shown that it should have been submitted to a full, fair vote of the people, and that such submission was not had. I have shown that we, as a party, were pledged to this submission by the Cincinnati platform; and that this pledge was recognized by the present national Administration in every act and declaration concerning Kansas, until after the Lecompton convention had refused to submit the constitution to a vote of the people. I have shown all this from the record, and from the constitution itself. I have not gone behind the constitution, but I speak from the record, and by the record. The constitution shows on its face that it never was submitted for adoption by the people. I hope, therefore, I may hear no more about going back of the record.

But even if I were to admit that the election of delegates to a convention conferred on such delegates the power not only to form a constitution, but to force it on an unwilling people, still the Lecompton constitution would not be a legal instrument. Now, I freely admit that, where the people have an opportunity to vote, and a part of them refrain from voting, that they are bound by the action of those who do vote. Nor is it material whether those who refuse to vote are a majority of the people or not. This doctrine is disputed by nobody on this floor, or elsewhere. Yet it has been repeated, by every speaker on the other side of this question, with a triumphant confidence in its power to overthrow the whole opposition to the Lecompton constitution.

Permit me to say, once for all, that no man predicated his opposition to the Lecompton constitution on the refusal of the free-State party to vote—nothing of the kind. Our opposition stands on higher and broader grounds. We say, that if all other reasons should be abandoned, and were we to admit your premises, still you cannot sustain that instrument, because the whole people of Kansas were not represented nor permitted to vote. Nineteen of the thirty-eight counties were not registered—had no delegates apportioned to them, and were not permitted to vote. Some weeks ago we were told by gentlemen on this floor, that a part of these counties were annexed to other counties for election purposes, and it is true that they were so annexed for some election purposes, but not for the election of delegates. No man could vote unless he was registered. No registry was made in nineteen counties, and therefore no votes could be given in those counties; they were all disfranchised. Four of these counties were comparatively old and thickly settled, and gave at the election in October over nineteen hundred votes, nearly as many as were cast at the June election, for the Lecompton delegates, in all the rest of the Territory. The people of Kansas were not permitted to vote for delegates. The sixty delegates were apportioned amongst nineteen counties; the other nineteen counties had no delegates and no right to vote. It is idle mockery to say that the people of those counties did not desire to be registered. It was the duty of the Legislature to have them registered. All the officers of the Territory, it must be remembered, were appointed by the Legislature; they were not elected by the people, and were not responsible to the people. They were the creatures of the Legislature, and it should have seen that they discharged their duty faithfully.

The question presented is not whether the people voted or did not vote, but whether they had the privilege of voting; and the record shows that they had not. We are asked to decide that one half the counties of the Territory of Kansas can disfranchise the other half, and can elect delegates and force a constitution, not upon themselves, but upon the people of the whole Territory. We are told that the constituent is bound by the act of the representative; but nineteen counties had no representatives. Were they bound? If a portion of the counties of the Territory can bind the rest, where will your principle stop? If one half of the counties of a Territory can act for themselves and the other half, why cannot five or ten counties act for the whole? Such a principle once recognized, then farewell to all free government. Nineteen counties are not represented in the convention, and yet we are told that they are bound without representation, or even the right of representation. If this is not despotism I do not understand the meaning of the term. You tell me that the Lecompton constitution is a legal instrument. What legislative power exists in our Government to deprive the people of representation, and bind them by the act of the representatives of others? If that is legal, then we do not live in a Republic, and our revolutionary fathers braved the dangers of battle in vain. Nor is it an answer to say that the number disfranchised was not large. The principle is the same, whether the number was small or large. If we concede the right to disfranchise two thousand voters in four counties, we concede the principle on which our Government rests. If we can deny two thousand men their rights, we can deny the same to ten thousand, and free government is at an end. Then, if we were to concede to the Lecompton convention the power to form and put in operation a constitution, such constitution could only extend to the nineteen represented counties, and not to the nineteen unrepresented. So much for the legality of the proceeding.

It is claimed, as a kind of an apology for forcing this Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas, that the whole constitution, or any of its objectionable features, may be changed at any time by the people. If this were even true, it would furnish but a poor excuse for depriving the people of their rights. If the people possess this power to "make and unmake constitutions" at their will, it belongs to the people of Kansas now, and we cannot deprive them of it. If such an extraordinary, supreme, and inalienable power exists, why deny its exercise at this moment to the people of Kansas? If the people of Kansas had the right to draw up and adopt a constitution, and the power to change or abolish it belongs to them, they have a perfect right to exercise that power now.

The right which is claimed is, that the people who form a constitution have an inherent right to alter or abolish such constitution whenever they determine to do so, even if the constitution provides that it shall not be changed.

Admit this doctrine to be correct, and what becomes of the Lecompton constitution? Let us examine that question. The Lecompton constitution was adopted, as it is claimed, on the 21st of December last. Before that date the legally elected Legislature of the Territory passed a law, submitting this constitution to a vote of the people, to be adopted or rejected, on the 4th of January, 1858; the election was held, and a majority of near ten thousand votes were cast against it. The people abolished it. Now, if they have this right to alter or abolish the constitution, for which the President and a very few southern members contend, the Lecompton constitution has been abrogated and has no legal existence. I cannot conceive the mode in which the ingenious advocates of the admission of Kansas will extricate themselves from the difficulties which attend this position. It will not do to contend that the power to alter or abolish only arises after the State is admitted; for if the people have the power to form and adopt a constitution, the right to amend or abrogate it, if it exists, must arise at the same time. There is nothing in the act of admission which gives any power of amendment. All the advantage which they derive from being admitted into the Union is that they are placed on an equality with the sister States. But "the power to frame and regulate their domestic institutions" existed before their admission as full and ample as it does afterwards. And if we construe the Kansas-Nebraska bill into an enabling act, and derive the power to form a constitution from the language I have just quoted, then the word "regulate" can have no other meaning than to change "their institutions" after they have been "formed." They are to be "formed" first, and then "regulated" afterwards. I defy the ingenuity of man to show a reason why this power to alter or abolish a constitution, if it exists, is not possessed by the people as fully before their admission into the Union as a State, as it does afterwards. And if it exists, then the Lecompton constitution has been abolished by the people of Kansas in a legal and formal manner, and in subordination to, and with the full approbation of, the legislative power of the Territory.

If we admit Kansas into the Union, and thus give validity to the Lecompton constitution, can that constitution be changed previous to 1864, or in any other manner than that pointed out in the instrument itself?

I entirely concur with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT,] that no such power exists.

If the Lecompton constitution is a legal instrument, I have not the slightest hesitancy in saying, that no authority to change it will exist until 1864; and then only in the method pointed out in the instrument itself. If the constitution is a compact, then most clearly the people who made it are bound by its stipulations, and have no power to change it except in the method pointed out in the instrument itself, unless the change were made by unanimous consent of the people. But I am told that there are precedents for such a change. Precedents are of little value where they are in violation of well-settled principles. Where, however, various precedents can be found consistent with each other, and generally acquiesced in, they have almost the force of a law; but where they are contradictory, they lose their importance as elements of proof.

In 1846, the people of New York undertook to change their constitution, in violation of its provisions. Very recently, a case came before the court of appeals, the highest legal tribunal in that State, which involved the validity of one of the provisions of this amended constitution—and the court decided that the limitations imposed on the Legislature by the constitution of 1846 were not binding. So much for that precedent. I am not familiar with one other case which has been quoted, and I therefore will not discuss it.

I have been told that the constitution of Pennsylvania was changed by the people. I admit it; but in that case the constitution of 1790 had no provision prohibiting nor limiting the power of amendment. The constitution of 1790, in the progress of time, had been found defective in many respects. The garment that once fitted the boy was found to be much too small for the full-grown man. Amendments were almost indispensably necessary; and after a great deal of controversy amongst the best lawyers on the subject, a convention of the people assembled at Harrisburg, and a memorial was drawn requesting the Legislature to provide by law for the election of delegates to a convention to amend the constitution. The Legislature passed the law; the delegates were chosen; the constitution was amended; and the amendments agreed upon were submitted to a vote of the people, and ratified.

Now let us apply this precedent to Kansas. In the first place, a convention of the people must be called. Now, will any one tell me what number of members of that convention took the oath at the election on the 21st of December to support the Lecompton constitution? It will be remembered that the constitution provides the manner and fixes the time in which it shall be amended.

After 1864 the Legislature is authorized to submit the question of calling a convention to a vote of the people. Most clearly the intent of the instrument is, that until 1864 no amendment shall be made. Now, every man in the convention, who has sworn to support the constitution, is clearly bound by his oath to oppose any amendment until 1864, and thus may prevent a memorial to the Legislature from being agreed upon. But we will suppose that it does not. When the question is presented to the Legislature, every member of that body has sworn to support the constitution; and, surely, it will not be contended that he supports the constitution when he expressly violates one of its provisions. The constitution provides that the question of amendment shall not be submitted until 1864; if the member votes to submit it at an earlier period he violates his oath. I have heard members say that this oath to support the constitution only means to support it as long as it remains in force; but this does not free us from the difficulty; for, at the time the member of the Legislature is called upon to vote, the constitution is in force. How, then, can the man who votes against its provisions avoid committing perjury? But, for the sake of argument, I will admit that the legislators consent to commit perjury. Now, will some of your constitutional lawyers oblige me by stating the number of votes it will require to pass the bill? After 1864, the constitution provides that it shall require two thirds to pass a bill providing for a vote on this question of amendment. But, previous to that time, what number will it take? Time and experience may demonstrate the imperfections of the constitution; and the older the instrument the smaller should be the number of votes required to change it. Does it require a less number to change the Lecompton constitution previous to 1864 than it would after that period? When gentlemen break loose from all legal restraints in their anxiety to advance a favorite theory, they are sure to be brought up by unforeseen troubles. But I will suppose that the law has been passed. That bill must contain a clause prohibiting the convention from the introduction of any amendment which would "affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves;" for so the constitution provides, as we have already seen; and no member could refuse to vote for this prohibition in the bill providing for the call of a convention without disregarding his oath.

But I will suppose that the convention is called. It must be remembered that the constitution provides that "every person chosen or appointed to any office under this State, before entering upon the discharge of its duties, shall take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States and the constitution of this State, and all laws made in pursuance thereof," &c. Each of the delegates to that convention must take this oath. I desire to ask how those delegates can observe that oath if they make amendments directly in conflict with its provisions? The constitution prohibits any amendment being made which destroys the relation of master and slave. The President says that the slavery question is the only one in controversy, and the delegate is prohibited from amending the constitution so that it may be abolished. My colleague, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] who destroys constitutional barriers by a breath of air, may do this easily enough; but those who regard the provision of a constitution as binding on the people, might have more trouble. But I will suppose that the amendments are made: what then? Simply this: if there is one single citizen in the State who chooses to object to the amended constitution, he has nothing to do but to carry the question into a court, and the court will decide the whole matter invalid, because the Legislature had no power to provide for amendments until 1864. And here would end this miserable delusion by which men are deceived into the support of the Lecompton constitution.

The object of those who seek to fasten this constitution on the people of Kansas is to permit the minority to rule the majority. The constitution fastens slavery upon the people. That constitution can only be amended by a vote of two thirds of the Legislature; and thus one third of the people will continue slavery against the will and wish of the other two thirds. This trick is too transparent, and no sensible man should permit himself to be deceived by it.

The admission of a State into the Union is a contract between the people of the State admitted and all the other States previously admitted. This contract, like all others, requires the consent of the contracting parties. Congress has no power to force a State into the Union. If a State is admitted as a member of our Confederacy, such admission must be predicated on the consent of the people. She must become a party to our national compact. Now, this is a very simple matter, and can be understood by everybody. Congress cannot force Kansas into the Union without her consent. Nor can such consent be inferred from the adoption of a constitution. A Territory may intend to apply for admission—may form and adopt a constitution, and afterwards it is discovered that it would be detrimental to the best interests of the Territory to apply for admission at that time, and they signify their determination to Congress not to become members of the Union—no one can deny their right to do so. Now, let us apply those plain principles to the case of Kansas; and for the sake of the argument, we will admit that the Lecompton constitution has been regularly adopted. Subsequently to its adoption, the people of Kansas have the question of their admission into the Union submitted to them, and by an almost unanimous vote they determine that they will not be admitted with that constitution. The legally recorded votes of ten thousand men have spoken the disapprobation of that constitution. The Legislature of the Territory have placed on our Journals their solemn remonstrance against the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. The legally elected representative of the Territory, clothed with her authority, and speaking her voice, stands on this floor, and in her name earnestly protests against this act of usurpation and tyranny upon the rights of her constituency. Admit, then, all you can ask in reference to the Lecompton constitution, and still, unless you override all precedent and act in flagrant, open violation of the Constitution of the United States, Kansas cannot be dragged into the Union like a thief to a prison. She must come, if she comes at all, voluntarily, freely, and with the consent of her people and representatives. She must knock at the door of Congress, and be received into the bosom of the sisterhood of States upon her own petition.

Thank God we live in a land of liberty, and the broad shield of the Constitution is between Congress and the freedom of the people. When Kansas comes into the Union, let it be like a young bride approaching the altar, with light step and buoyant hopes, with her young heart's virgin affections freely bestowed, and the dearest desires of life all centered in the solemn contract which unites her destiny with ours forever. Let her not be dragged in like a beautiful, unwilling orphan, forced by a tyrannical and mercenary guardian into a union she loathes and despises; who approaches the altar with tears upon her eyelids, entreaty upon her lips, and despair in her heart.

But we are told that the people of Kansas are rebellious, and that therefore we should bring them into the Union. I never learned before that admission into the Union was a panacea for lawlessness and rebelliousness. Admission into the Union should be looked upon as a great blessing, and we should be careful to bring into it no discordant elements. If rebellion exists in Kansas, let the rebellious be punished. The President has taken an oath to see the laws faithfully executed; let him look to that matter in Kansas. Can we, because a part of the people of Kansas are rebellious, disfranchise them all, and force upon them, at the point of the bayonet, a government which they have never adopted. If admission to the Union is a remedy for rebellion, why not admit the Mormons, who at this moment have repudiated our authority over them, and have assembled armies to repel all attempts to enforce our laws, and invite us to reason on the field of battle, and to settle our claims by the edge of the sword and the point of the bayonet?

Mr. Chairman, I have no wrongs to right—no grievances to complain of. I am actuated by no sinister motive—impelled to the course I have taken by no impulse of blind passion. I was the early and steadfast friend of Mr. Buchanan, and when others in my own district, who are now claiming to be par excellence his peculiar friends, were waging an unrelenting warfare against him,

I was his advocate and defender. When the Democratic thousands were gathering in their might for the great battle of 1856, I was with them and of them, whilst the cold-hearted sycophants who now come here to ask offices and honors, then sat calmly in their houses, and refused even their presence to swell the great Democratic councils assembled under the very shadow of their dwellings. James Buchanan was not worth fighting for then, when a single vote might have determined the result of the election; but now, when he has honors to bestow and offices to grant, these men can come forward to denounce those who fought the battle which made him President.

I have seen the same men, in former years, when the dark spirit of bigotry and intolerance gathered their sworn forces in their secret places and secret dens, fraternizing and encouraging those who were banded for our overthrow. And when the Know Nothing force had swept the land like an avalanche, these men were loudest in their shouts of exultation at our defeat. But I can afford to treat with cold contempt the opposition of those who denounced the immortal Jackson, and who only come into the Democratic party to share its spoils.

I have calmly and patiently investigated this question. I have taken no steps without deliberation and careful reflection. I stand now where I stood in 1856—on the platform reared for us by the grand council of the Democratic party which assembled at Cincinnati. I acknowledge the right of no man, or set of men, to alter or amend that creed until that national council shall again assemble. I have not changed, and I will not permit those who have, to charge me with inconsistency. I have attempted the discharge of my humble duty in a feeble way, with a singleness of heart and a purity of purpose. I would rather have the confidence and respect of those amongst whom I began the journey of life, and who have never wavered in their devotion, nor faltered in my support, than to win the smiles of power or the glittering honors of ill-gotten place. I am now, and have been from the beginning of this controversy, the steadfast and unwavering friend of compromise and conciliation. If I have spoken boldly, it was because I felt deeply. If I have fearlessly laid bare the monstrous deformities of the Lecompton constitution, it was that my fellow members might be the more ready to aid in adopting some honorable and satisfactory scheme by which these unjust provisions might be corrected and adjusted.

I have already introduced a bill which I intend for this purpose. As I intend to discuss my bill hereafter, I propose now only to call attention to some of its prominent features. But before I do this, it may be more satisfactory that I should give my reasons for opposing the amendment now pending in the Senate, offered by the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.] That proposition is, that Congress shall incorporate a declaration in the act admitting Kansas, that the people of that Territory have the right to amend their constitution at any time. Now, what is that declaration worth? I say emphatically—nothing. It is a mere opinion of Congress, not worth the paper it is written upon. No court would look at it; it is binding on nobody; and is of advantage to nobody. It will only operate as a delusion and a cheat; be a sort of shelter to those northern Democrats who disobey the will of their constituents by voting for what the people do not approve. It is also intervention; for it attempts to give an interpretation to the constitution of Kansas, which should be, and must be, its own interpreter. There is only one other proposition of compromise matured, so far as I have heard; and that is, to insert a condition in the act of admission securing the right of amendment to the people. That kind of intervention can only be justified on the ground that the right of amendment is inalienable; and that, as the fourteenth section of the schedule of the Lecompton constitution denies this inalienable right to the people of Kansas, that section is therefore anti-republican. And it is certainly true, whatever denies the inalienable rights of the people is most clearly anti-republican; and as the Constitution of the United States guarantees a republican form of government to every State of the Union, that clause in the Lecompton constitution must be stricken out. This proposition is, however, much less objectionable than the other

There is substance in this, for it is a positive condition. I will not stop to examine whether the section in the constitution I mentioned is anti-republican or not. All those who agree with the President must admit that the fourteenth section is an attempt to deprive the people of an inalienable right. I, however, object to the proposition, because the condition, even if it is obligatory, does not secure the power to amend in a practicable shape. The returns of the election for State officers are held in the pocket of a man in whom I have no confidence. No one can certainly predict which party will receive the certificates of election.

The representatives are elected for two years, and the senators for three. If Calhoun declares the pro-slavery ticket elected, of what value is your condition? The Legislature will not pass an act to call a convention, and there the matter ends for years to come. Disguise it as we may, there is hardly a doubt now that the intention is, not only to force a constitution on the people of Kansas which they never adopted, but to place over them rulers and law-makers who were never elected by their votes. The uncertain result, not of the election, but of the future decision of John Calhoun, is the chief obstacle to amicable adjustment of the whole Kansas difficulties. To avoid this my bill has been especially framed. I provide that Governor Denver, an honest man, who has the confidence of all parties, shall be required to call an extra session of the Territorial Legislature, a legally-elected body, whose term of office does not expire until next October, and that the Legislature shall provide for the election of delegates to a convention, who shall assemble at a time and place fixed in the act; and to this convention the Lecompton constitution shall be submitted for amendment. If the convention refuses to amend the constitution it shall go into operation as it is. If, however, the convention propose amendments, such amendments shall be submitted to a vote of the people, in such manner that the several amendments can be voted for or against by each voter separately. Those amendments which have a majority of the votes in their favor, shall be incorporated in the constitution; and from and after the termination of these proceedings, Kansas shall be one of the States of this Union.

This avoids all the clumsy machinery provided for in the Lecompton constitution, and places the representatives under none of the terrors of violating the oaths required by its provisions. This bill is formed in exact conformity to the suggestion of the President, as contained in his late message. The President says:

"The will of the majority is supreme; they can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. It would be absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove. If this is true, they might tie their own hands for a hundred as well as ten years. These are fundamental principles of American freedom, and are recognized, in some form or other, by every State constitution. And if Congress, in the act of admission, should think proper to recognize them, I can perceive no objection to such a course."

This right to alter or amend their constitution, as contended for by the President, is recognized in my bill. It secures the people no right they do not already possess, according to the President's argument, and, therefore, there can be no objections on the grounds that we are conferring extraordinary privileges, and intervening in the affairs of the Territory. There is not the slightest intervention. We do not add to or take from the constitution. We neither interpret its provisions nor fetter it with provisos, but we recognize, in an unquestionable form, the power of amendment, and then leave the people "perfectly free" to amend the constitution or not, at their pleasure. Pass this bill, and in ten days thereafter peace and prosperity will prevail throughout Kansas; and in ninety days her member will fill a seat on this floor. If gentlemen desire a safe, satisfactory, and speedy settlement of the troubles in Kansas, let them help to pass this bill, not because it is mine, but because it is right. It rests on correct principles; does injustice to no section of the Union. It obviates all the difficulties I have pointed out in the Lecompton constitution; it frees us from the charge of forcing a constitution on an unwilling people, and unites and harmonizes all discord in the great Democratic party of the North. Reject this bill, drag Kansas into the Union, and the most fearful consequences may ensue. Civil war may deluge the Territory with blood, and the brow of the future may grow dark with fearful events, the end of which none living now may see.

Permit me to ask southern members what they hope to gain by forcing on the people of Kansas a constitution which has never received their approbation, and which almost one third of the delegates of the Lecompton convention repudiated and refused to sign? Slavery never can exist long in Kansas. Public opinion, the soil, climate, and productions, all combine to drive it out. You may continue, by the extraordinary provisions of the Lecompton constitution, to fasten it there for a time, but it will eventually die out like a sickly exotic. The violence of the agitation occasioned by the convulsive efforts of the people to cast out the offensive intruder, may shake the foundations of our great Confederacy. Sectional hate and party hostility will destroy the last vestige of that fraternal feeling which should bind together the people of the North and the South. You will break down and destroy that great national party which in all the years of the past has, with its strong arms, held the national Union together.

In the name of that glorious Democracy, let me implore you to pause before it is too late. Think of the hallowed memories which crowd around the past history of that party. There is no event of which we feel proud as a nation, or which excites the admiration of our own or other people, which was not the achievement of a Democratic head or hand. Go to the battle-fields of the Revolution; and as you stand on the sod once crimsoned with the blood of brave and true hearts, remember that the men who fought and died there were the sturdy Democracy of the revolutionary time. Turn to the Declaration of Independence; and as you read its solemn truths, you will remember that its author was the first great apostle of American Democracy. Take up the Constitution of the United States; and as the wisdom, justice, and liberality of its admirable provisions and generous compromises challenge your admiration, the name of James Madison, its Democratic draftsman, will come back with its rich inheritance of fame. Elevate your vision and look abroad over our glorious country—see on the map the contracted limits of the old thirteen States, and behold it now extending from ocean to ocean; and remember that every acre of that vast domain was secured by Democratic wisdom, foresight, and legislation. The broad sweep of the boundless prairie, the swelling hillside, and the mountain summit, are each proud monuments of Democratic wisdom, whilst the

"Meanest rill, the mightiest river, Roll mingling with its fame forever."

The battle-field is red with Democratic blood shed in defense of our country's honor. The deep sea has heard the roar of Democratic cannon, but has never seen our country's flag go down in equal fight.

Permit me, then, to implore you, with the memory of the past so fresh upon us, that by no act of folly and injustice, by no measure of tyranny and oppression, you stain the hitherto untarnished reputation, and paralyze the power, of that proud old party. Oh! let it stand in the future as it has stood in the past, like a rock in the sea, against which the waves of fanaticism will break in vain. And when we have given the inheritance we received from our fathers to those who come after us, its strength will be unimpaired, its glory unstained, and its freedom unshaken.

Mr. REAGAN obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAY. With the permission of the gentleman from Texas, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire to speak, and am willing to speak this evening. I trust, therefore, that the committee will not rise.

Mr. CLAY. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. ADRAIN. I hope the committee will not rise. There are several gentlemen wishing to speak this evening, and I hope the gentleman will go on.

The question was taken; and the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to discuss the right of the people of Kansas to admission into the Union; nor do I propose to discuss the question as to whether the people of Kansas have been guilty of frauds or not. It is enough that I feel satisfied that great irregularities have existed with both the contending parties in Kansas. It is enough for me that the result of the action of the people of Kansas before us in the form of a constitution which I deem republican in its character. But I propose rather to speak of the general question of the anti-slavery agitation; regarding this Kansas struggle; as I do, as one of the acts in that great drama. I propose, before I take my seat, if I can accomplish what I desire to accomplish, to meet as plainly as I can and as distinctly as my poor abilities will permit, what I regard as the great paramount issue fairly tendered to the people of the South by an all-pervading and all-controlling sentiment that exists in the free States of the Union.

Gentlemen who represent the free States, the people of the free States, the governments of the free States, have their action controlled, as I humbly conceive, by a set of principles violative of the Federal Constitution, revolutionary in their character, and destructive of the sovereignty and equality of the States. These principles of action of the people of the free States have caused the deepest apprehensions on the part of the people of the South: In view of the new phase of the anti-slavery excitement, resulting from the proposed admission of Kansas, a few of the southern States have, through their Legislatures, taken action. I have the honor to represent, in part, one State which has taken action on this question. The action of the Legislature of my State has been called in question more than once on the floor of this House; but I apprehend that those who have called it in question misapprehend the true character and object of that action, or desire still further to press us to the wall. To this I shall try to call the attention of the committee hereafter. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BURGESS,] in a speech which he made some weeks since, made allusion to Texas, and to the resolution of the Legislature of that State. I desired then to have replied to his argument, not so much because of any intrinsic merit in the argument, not so much because of anything that was calculated to mislead the minds of members here, as because it was one of that delusive character of arguments resting upon a false basis, which was calculated to urge a fanatical people at the North on to the destruction of our Government.

I shall refer to some statistics before me, in order to reply to those remarks in reference to Texas; and some of them in reference to the South generally.

It was charged by that gentleman that Texas had cost the Union $200,000,000, and that now Texas proposes to leave the Union unless Congress admits Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. Now where the gentleman obtained his figures that Texas cost the Union $200,000,000 I am at a loss to know. Why, sir, Texas, after throwing off the power of a despotism which disregarded constitutional liberty, after she had thrown off the fetters which had been intended to bind her from the assertion of her civil and religious liberty, after having stricken down the tyrant who would have enchained her in slavery, and erected a government, and after having passed through the trials of infancy for nine years and more, she came here with three hundred and eighteen thousand square miles of the finest country the sun of heaven ever shone upon, with the finest productions of earth, and with a people who appreciated constitutional liberty—a people who had imbibed the spirit of American independence—a people who had learned its value from suffering from the powers of despotism: they tendered you an empire of three hundred and eighteen thousand square miles of territory without price—without any $200,000,000.

We surrendered this territory, and we did more than this. We surrendered our national existence; we surrendered our national banner, around which, in its short history, had been thrown a halo of glory unsurpassed by that of any other nation of the same age; we surrendered a territory nearly as large as one half the original thirteen States.

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman certainly does not intend to say that the State of Texas has ever surrendered her lands to the United States?

Mr. REAGAN. Of course I do not say she surrendered to the United States the fee to the lands. I only intended to say that her national existence was merged in that of the United States. She brought her commerce, her industry, and her resources, and made them a part of the commerce, the industry, and the resources of this Union.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I want to inquire of the gentleman a little further. Has the State of Texas ever contributed one half as much to the revenues of the Government since she came into the Union as she cost the Government?

Mr. REAGAN. I am not prepared to answer the question propounded by the gentleman from Ohio, because I have not attempted to make the calculation. I might answer it in this way: by asking if it is expected that any State shall contribute, as it goes along, the exact amount of expenses which the Federal Government is driven to incur within its limits? Whether the cost of its defense and of the mail facilities for Texas has been greater than the revenues contributed from that State, I am not prepared to say. But, sir, the prospective resources of that State, its advantages in the future to this country, are incalculable.

If, in order to make out the cost of Texas, the gentleman includes the cost of the Mexican war, he must include, on the credit side, the results of that war.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Did not the United States assume the debts of Texas when she came into the Union? If they did, then Texas did not come into the Union costing nothing.

Mr. REAGAN. I beg the gentleman's pardon, but I am a young member of the House, and these interruptions break up the line of my argument.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I do not wish to interrupt his argument.

Mr. REAGAN. I was proceeding to say that if the cost of the Mexican war is to be charged to Texas, then the results of that war should be placed to her credit. As the result of that war, you acquired California, which, as was stated the other day by one of the members from that State, [Mr. SCOTT] has furnished the city of New York alone, within the last two years, $74,000,000 in specie. You have that great golden State with 155,980 square miles; that must go to the credit side of this account. You have acquired New Mexico, with 207,007 square miles; which must also go to the credit side of the account. You have acquired Utah, with 269,170 square miles; which must go to the credit side of the account. You have acquired altogether by that war 632,157 square miles of territory, in addition to the territory of Texas; which, if the cost of that war was $200,000,000, would entitle her to a credit of nearly one hundred and fifty million dollars, being nearly three times as much territory as is included in the State of Texas.

This sort of calculation, indulged in by the gentleman from New York, is designed not to satisfy the House, but to be thrown before the people to excite their jealousy and fanaticism against the people of the South. It is in this point of view I have been led to expose this fallacious argument. I regret the gentleman is not here to hear what I have to say.

Then the gentleman from New York went on to argue that the territory acquired by the United States, since the cession of Florida, in 1819, for the benefit of the South, had cost $800,000,000; and that three fourths of this amount was paid by the North for southern territory. I was astonished to hear such a statement coming from a member of this House. I do not reply to it now because I believe that it has the sanction of this House, or that confidence is reposed in it by Congress, but because such statements are calculated to mislead the people, and to engender in their minds a prejudice against the South; to create the belief that the people of the North have conferred benefits upon the South which they really have not conferred. When the gentleman made that statement had he so far forgotten the history of his own country? Does he not know that the only territory acquired by the Federal Government since the acquisition of Florida, in 1819, was that of Texas, and that part of northern Mexico which was acquired from Mexico by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, in 1847. He has already charged us $200,000,000 for that territory. What a statement to go before the country from a member of this House! The gentleman must have intended to include the acquisition of Florida, the acquisition of Louisiana, the acquisition of Texas, the acquisition of northern Mexico, and added to these the cost of all our Indian wars. He says that nearly all these wars have been in the South; but I believe that he did have the grace to admit that the Black Hawk war did not occur in the South.

I have taken great pains to look into the statistics on this subject; and I am inclined to give a more liberal construction to the gentleman's statement than he has given it himself. I say that he certainly intended to embrace the acquisition of all territory since the organization of the Government. In the acquisition of Florida and Louisiana, we secured 1,334,531 square miles. By northern Mexico and Texas we acquired 840,955 square miles. This would make all our territorial acquisitions amount to 2,174,486 square miles. Our territory before these acquisitions amounted to 820,680 square miles. So, adding these two amounts together, we find the present territory of the United States to contain 2,995,166 square miles. Of this 2,174,531 square miles of acquired territory we have the slave States of Florida, Louisiana, Missouri, Arkansas, and Texas, containing 457,605 square miles, and the unquestionably free territory of California, Wisconsin, Iowa, Minnesota, Dacotah, Nebraska, Washington, and Oregon, containing 1,070,775 square miles. Then we have in Kansas, and the Indian territory to the south of it, and in New Mexico and Utah, 662,102 square miles, which may become free or slave territory, but which northern men regard as already secured as free territory. If they are right in this, then we have acquired of free territory 1,732,877 square miles, and of slave territory 457,605 square miles, which shows a balance in favor of free territory of 1,275,172 square miles, a larger amount by one half than the size of the original thirteen States. And this is the territory which the gentleman says has cost us $800,000,000, and which has inured entirely to the benefit of the South. But here, sir, is the fact staring him in the face that the North has more than three fourths of this territory. While this is so, the gentleman comes here and charges that all the money spent for the acquisition of territory has gone for the benefit of the South. Such statements may delude the unthinking and the unlettered fanatic, but they will never mislead the man who calmly reviews the history of the country.

The gentleman goes on to say that $600,000,000 of this $800,000,000 has been paid by the free States. Here is another evidence of the exceeding kindness and generosity of my friend's argument. Has he forgotten that the southern imports come through the free-State ports? Has he forgotten that the commerce of the South is building up the commercial cities of the North? Has he forgotten that the patronage of the South has done much to build up the literary institutions of the North? It is building up the manufactures of the North, as he cannot forget. Yet the North avails itself of our patronage; it receives our commerce; has the benefit of our trade to make it rich, and then turns round and insults us because we have made it rich and great and powerful. Is not there something in this, in connection with the issue tendered to us that another slave State shall not be admitted into the Union, which is calculated to make the heart beat quicker, to excite the mind, and to awaken the South from its lethargy to a knowledge of the spirit of equality and independence? Is there not in this that which should demand of us to give a warning to our friends in the North not to press us too far? We know, sir, that our commerce will build up our own cities when you drive us to it. We know that our products will command friendly overtures from every commercial nation upon the globe. We know that, if it comes to that extremity, we have the power to strike down your commerce, to bankrupt your manufactures and in every way to diminish your greatness. We feel a pride in the city of New York. It is our city as well as yours; its commerce is ours as well as yours. We are proud of it because it is the great commercial metropolis of this Union; we are proud of it because, if your fanaticism does not prevent it, it may be not only the commercial mistress of the whole western continent, but of the whole world. It lies with you to say whether it shall be so or not; it is not for me or for the South to decide.

But, sir, we are told that the North has paid three fourths of this amount; and this is said in view of the fact that nearly all of our imports come through your northern cities. We first give you our commerce; we pay the duties upon that commerce in your cities; and then you, after receiving those duties, as a tax upon our imports, resulting from the vast amount of our exports, have the modesty to turn round and charge the South with the very money which she has paid out to build up your cities, and to defray the expenses of the Federal Government. What a representation to come from a Representative of a proud State! Is that the sentiment of New York? Is that the feeling of New York? Is that the conviction of New York? Is that the passion for fraud and injustice of the proud State of New York? I would go into the gentleman's own district, and take this evidence of injustice to the South, and appeal to his people, to their sense of justice and fair dealing, and ask them to repudiate those sentiments, if not to repudiate the man.

As I said in the outset, it is not my intention to present these arguments for the purpose of refuting them. That refutation is made by the history, by the condition and relations of this country. I would that my remarks could go into the gentleman's district to incite inquiry, and induce them to tell him, when he comes back again—for I think he is a worthy man—not to try to make capital by doing injustice to his fellow-countrymen, by attempting to incite ill blood amongst them, by trying to induce them to think that they have been oppressed and wronged for the benefit of the South. You have the territory, you have the commerce, you have everything; you command the South, and I am ashamed, or rather sorry and ashamed too, to say that the South is but one of your customers; and yet you come here to insult and defy and deride that customer which has made you all rich. I cannot think that such a sentiment prevails in New York, in Pennsylvania, in Massachusetts; nor do I think it prevails even in Ohio.

Now, sir, having disposed of these statistics, I desire, for a moment, to perform a still more painful duty; and I do it because, after a little, I shall have something to say about the position Texas has occupied—something to say in reference to the amendment proposed by the Representative from Chicago [Mr. FARNSWORTH] to the Army bill.

The same gentleman, the honorable gentleman from New York, who presented these statistics, went on to make some other statements; and I allude to them to show that all-pervading feeling which exists to strike down the rights of the South. While I believe my heart is as faithful to this Union, as long as it is a Union under the Constitution, as that of any other man North or South, I want my people to know what sort of feeling is prevailing here, and what sort of feeling pervades the National Legislature; and, so far as my feeble voice and efforts are concerned, they shall know it. I am not one of those who are prepared, by compromises and expedients, to yield up the last hope of my country. No, sir, the issue is tendered boldly, and I call your attention to it. It is tendered in such a way that there is no longer mistaking what that issue is, and if the representatives of the South are worthy of themselves, worthy of the chivalry of the States from which they come, worthy of the confidence of those who sent them here, they will meet that issue, and they will place themselves as distinctly upon the record as gentlemen upon the opposite side have done. I will tell you, before I take my seat, what that issue is. I say we are better prepared for that issue to-day than we will be a year hence, and I wish to meet it upon the very threshold. There is but one way in which men can deal fairly with each other; and that is, to tell the truth, just as it is.

And just here let me say what I ought to say, lest I should be misunderstood. Some gentlemen upon the opposite side have expressed very strong anti-slavery feelings, which perhaps were unpleasant to us; but, sir, I do not come here to speak harshly of those gentlemen at all. The day was, in my opinion, when in the history of the country anti-slavery fanaticism was under the control of the politicians. In that day I would have denounced them. The day has now come, in my humble judgment, when politicians themselves are under the control of the people, and when this question is under the control of the people. I believe that those gentlemen who utter these strong sentiments against the South, and against her institutions, who have branded us as infidels, as tyrants, as slave-drivers, and as guilty of almost every crime in the catalogue, are the representatives of the feelings of their constituents, and that they are sustained by the sentiments of the masses of the North. So believing, I prefer to meet the issue by a dignified and equally explicit declaration of the views of the people of the South. And when we have met and compared opinions, let us act as statesmen. Denunciation is unnecessary; epithets and insults are unnecessary. I care nothing about hard words, for, as it is said, they break no bones. It is action, the action of political parties, the action of States, and the results of anti-slavery movements, as developed in action, that we have to meet. So far as I, an humble Representative of the South, am concerned, I shall try to place myself correctly and distinctly on this issue.

The great question now agitating the public mind is whether Kansas shall be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution—a constitution recognizing the existence of slavery. Her admission is resisted on the ground that this constitution does not embody the will of the people of the Territory. But then, when the interrogatory is presented to those who take that ground whether, if all the people of Kansas approved of slavery, and placed it in the constitution, they would vote for her admission, some of them have answered that they would not. Many of them do not like to answer the question, if they can help it, but some have volunteered their answers. Honorable members on this floor, and honorable members in the other wing of the Capitol, declare, that if it was the clear will of the people to have slavery in their constitution, they would have voted against the admission of Kansas into the Union. With what consistency does it come from those who resist the admission of Kansas because her constitution is not the declared will of her people, to say that if the will of the people were clearly expressed in favor of the existence of slavery, they would still vote against her admission? They are ready to trample on the rights of the people in obedience to fanaticism. That is all the answer I want. That illustrates the object of every speech they make. Kansas is not the great question. The great question is, shall another slave State be admitted into the Union? The opponents of the admission of Kansas are determined on their part to carry out that deep and dark and portentous threat made to the nation in 1847, that no other slave State should ever be admitted into the Union. It is that threat that has caused apprehension in the South. It is the fact, that since that threat has been made, the party which made it has grown from a small and unimportant party into a great party, contending for the political mastery of the nation, and well-nigh electing a President of the United States at the last presidential election. I do not like to make an unfortunate prediction; I do not like to predict the misfortunes of the country; but in view of the history of the past, and of the influences that control human actions, that party is sure to give this country a President, if the Union stands; and that President will be elected in 1860.

Therefore let us not blink these facts. Let us not shrink from the truth because it is unwelcome to us. Let us take these facts into consideration, and say what our action is to be. A party that rests on principles destructive of constitutional liberty, destructive of the equality and sovereignty of the States, destructive of the rights of the people, revolutionary in its character, purely sectional in its organism—that party is to elect the next President, if this Government lasts so long. In view of its history, what are we to expect from it?

But I have been digressing; and now I come back to my line of argument. The gentleman from New York [Mr. BURROUGHS] said in his speech the other day:

"Now, sir, I have not time to-day to present the careful calculations by which I arrive at the fact that the northern fifteen States of this Confederacy have paid three fourths of the entire amount expended for the purchase of these lands. Eight hundred million dollars have been paid in the form of indirect taxes for that purpose."

And again:

"Now, sir, I propose, in a spirit of all kindness, to ask gentlemen who make this charge of sectionalism against us, to tell us where this money—this eight hundred millions—came from? Where did the money come from? I have facts and figures here to satisfy any gentleman where it came from. Look to the importing and tax-paying States of this Confederacy."

Well, I have answered that, and I pass it by. Again, the gentleman says:

"Well, sir, I now come here with the complaint that the northern States have not quite half the territory you of the southern States have; and I say further that our land is not as good as yours."

Well, I have shown that the North has three fourths of the territory, and I will not go over that ground again.

The gentleman further says:

"I expected, when Texas came into this Union, that she would have had the kindness to bear with our section of the Union a little. Twelve years ago, when Texas was young, and needed our help, we bought her lands and fought her battles; but now she has grown to be a Hercules, and says that, unless we admit slavery into Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, she will not live with us any longer. That would be a nice job for her, to get us to expend $200,000,000 on her account, and then to back out."

I have referred to that before; but I may say here that Texas fought her own battles, and proved herself equal to the emergency, and helped to fight the battles of the United States after her proud empire was annexed to the Union.

The gentleman goes on:

"Texas, I was going on to say, has passed resolutions; I will not say they are defiant, I will not say they are threatening, I will not say that Texas will not come down on us with an avalanche of some sort, if we do not admit Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Texas will do—I know not what. Certainly, she has adopted resolutions, and is going to be represented in the southern convention, (if held.) What that southern convention is to do, I do not know."

And again, he says:

"We have got twice the amount of population that you have, and have got but half the quantity of land. This land was bought by the common treasure, North and South; and should be fairly divided. I might rather say that the earth belongs to the people on it; and that no one section has a right to monopolize and keep it to the exclusion of every other class. You have in the single State of Texas territory equal to six times that of the State of New York. On that territory you can support no less than fifteen million human beings. You have got there territory enough for four States, on which there are comparatively no white settlements; and yet you now stand in your place in the Halls of your Legislature and say that you cannot live in the Union with the North unless we consent to let Kansas come in as a slave State."

"I cannot make any comment on this. It does not tally with my notions of justice and propriety, and I believe that when you come back to the sober second thought you will agree with us in our opinion, and you will say that we are entitled to these lands."

I will not comment on this at this moment. It is proper that I should remark here that the resolutions to which the gentleman from New York referred, did not emanate from the Texas Legislature at all. They were resolutions proposed in a State Democratic convention, recommending action upon the part of the Legislature of Texas. That Legislature has acted; but before I refer to their action, I desire to call the attention of the House to some expressions which have fallen from gentlemen on this floor in relation to the Kansas question. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. BURROUGHS,] in a speech made the other day,

"A gentleman now in my eye has several times asked members on my side of the House whether they would vote to admit Kansas as a slave State if it was well ascertained that a majority of her people were in favor of slave institutions. I can answer that question without any difficulty. I would not vote to admit Kansas as a slave State under any possible circumstances, and I place my justification on the ground that that country belongs to the North."

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr.

TOMPKINS,] in a speech made in this House, used this language:

"I am opposed to the admission of Kansas as one of the States of this Union with her present constitution. The paramount reason is, this constitution establishes and sustains slavery. I shall oppose her admission with her present constitution. It is wholly immaterial to me whether that constitution has been submitted to the people of the Territory for their sanction or not. I will not, at this time, stop to inquire whether it meets the approbation of the present inhabitants. The time was when I would have felt justified in voting for the admission of a State with a slavery constitution, if it was formed out of Territory south of 36° 30' north latitude, that belonged to this Government at the time the Missouri compromise was adopted."

I now quote from the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY:]

"What, then, is the source of this moral strife, which at times wears an aspect so threatening and terrific?" "Not the discussion, not the agitation of the subject of slavery, but the existence of slavery itself."

And he denounces, with the greatest bitterness, slavery, and those who sustain it. The venerable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GIBBINGS] regards and argues this as purely a religious question. I quote the language of his speech made here a few days since:

"Under these circumstances, I have thought that the best service I can render the people on the present occasion would be to analyze the subject which now absorbs the popular mind; and, so far as able, to define the issue now pending before the nation."

"That issue is founded upon fundamental religious truths, which are maintained by one political party and denied by the other."

"Immediately after the last Congress adjourned, the men who wield the judicial and executive powers of Government publicly denied the great primal doctrine of our Government, 'that all men are endowed by their Creator with inherent, equal, and inalienable rights.' They essayed to obliterate the line of demarcation drawn by our patriot fathers between the despotisms of a darker age, and the rights of mankind as understood in this nineteenth century."

He would thus make the Government more a theocracy and the Congress more a place for the settlement of religious dogmas than the disposition of the purely political duties with which they are charged.

I come now, sir, to the resolutions of the Legislature of Texas, which I will read. They are as follows:

"Whereas, there exists, and has existed, a violent determination on the part of a portion of the inhabitants of the Territory of Kansas to exclude, by force, the citizens of the slaveholding States from a just, equal, and peaceful participation in the use and enjoyment of the common property and territory of the members of the State; and whereas, this determination, owing to the state of political feeling in the northern States of the Confederacy, operating upon the Federal Government, may become effectual, and the exclusion perpetual: Therefore,

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Texas, That the Governor of this State is hereby authorized to order an election for seven delegates to meet delegates appointed by the other southern States in convention, whenever the Executives of a majority of the slaveholding States shall express the opinion that such convention is necessary to preserve the equal rights of such States in the Union, and advise the Governor of this State that measures have been taken for the appointment of delegates to meet those of Texas; and that the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as is necessary, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated to pay the mileage and per diem of such delegates, which shall be paid at the rates paid to members of the United States Congress, according to the law in force in the year 1854."

"2d. That should an exigency arise, in the opinion of the Governor, in which it is necessary for the State of Texas to act alone, or by a convention representing the sovereignty of the State, he is hereby requested to call a special session of the Legislature to provide for such State convention."

"3d. That the Governor is requested to transmit copies of these resolutions to the Executive of each of the slaveholding States, and to our members of Congress."

These resolutions were adopted by a vote of 23 to 5 in the Senate, and by the unanimous vote of the House of Representatives.

These resolutions are not defiant, they are precautionary; not aggressive, they look to defense. They comprehend more than Kansas; they look to the whole anti-slavery excitement. They are not merely the reflex of a transient feeling; they look to the decision of a great question, elemental and paramount in its character. They rest upon the Constitution and theory of our Government, and look to the revolutionary principles by which anti-slavery men propose to destroy that Constitution and subvert the Government. They look to the decision of the question by the nation, of whether the Constitution shall be preserved, of whether the States shall remain coequal sovereign parties of that Constitution; and whether the citizens of all the States of this Union have equal rights in the Territories of the Union. And if these be decided against the South, they look to the decision by the people of the South for themselves of the question of whether they will remain degraded inferiors, bound to the car of destiny of the colossal power of the North, under a violated Constitution, whose guarantees afford them no protection or security; or whether they will preserve their rights, their honor, their equality, and their independence, under a separate government.

I shall not discuss these questions with a view of dodging the real issues, or concealing the dangers which surround us. Honorable gentlemen on the other side speak out, boldly and plainly, their position. We cannot misunderstand them any longer; and we of the South would be unworthy of ourselves and of the people we represent, if we failed to define, with equal clearness and precision, the position we occupy.

Now, sir, I have said that these resolutions were precautionary. They were not adopted as a hasty act. The South has made some flashes and the North has taken advantage of them. Texas, I am proud to say, has taken a position which involves the necessity of consulting with her sister States of the South; not depending upon the action of politicians, but resting on the will of her people; for it is a question which involves the welfare of the whole South. The great issue tendered to us by gentlemen of the North is, that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union. Kansas is now but a mere pretext for this agitation. Southern men, in my opinion, make a great mistake when they express the opinion that the admission of Kansas into the Union at the present time will prove a finality of this slavery agitation. I have heard of finalities before. I believed, in 1850, that the passage of the compromise measures would be a finality of this agitation, because it decided the great principle of congressional non-intervention with slavery in the Territories.

But if I could have looked forward to what has transpired since that time, I would, for myself, have gone out of the Union before I would have consented to surrender eighty-four thousand square miles of land belonging to Texas to the grasp of anti-slavery men. I was in favor of that compromise, because I thought it would be a finality to the slavery agitation. Experience has shown how delusive are these finalities. And, sir, when the question arose on the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill, we were told again that that would be the end of the slavery agitation, by the establishment of the principle of congressional non-intervention with the subject of slavery in the Territories. The proposition was so reasonable, so constitutional, and so perfectly removed every ground for agitation, it seemed to me so just and so right, that again I believed we had found a finality.

But we were disappointed in that just expectation. Agitation goes on, increasing in volume and virulence. We are told now that the control of the Government is to pass from Democratic hands into the hands of a sectional majority. We are warned in advance that we are to have the intervention of the Federal Government against the South. We see the action of northern Legislatures. We see a disregard of the fugitive slave law in many States; it is not universal, I admit. We see that there is a determination to exclude our people from the Territories. We see a determination to resist the admission of any more slave States. We see all this; and do gentlemen suppose, with our convictions of what the Constitution is, and our understanding of the character of the Federal Government, that the States are coequal sovereigns and the Territories common property, that there is no ground for the action of the Legislature of Texas? I think that action is amply justified by the facts, and I am proud that Texas has taken her position boldly. I hope she will never back down from it. We had better meet the issue while we have the power to do so.

All we ask, and it is not much, is to be let alone. Slavery in the States is a domestic institution with which neither the Federal Government, nor the free States, nor the people of those States, have the most remote connection, except in so far as the obligation rests upon them to carry out the compromises of the constitution. They are not responsible for slavery in the States where it is, and yet some of them complain that the constitution allows it. Some of them denounce the guarantees of the constitution, but say that they have no right to interfere with slavery in the States. If they have not, why this universal assault upon slavery in the States, why these violent harangues, why these denunciations of southern States? Why continue a series of acts which, if they were committed between foreign nations, would be constant cause of war?

The issue tendered us by the North, as presented by them, and as indicated by the representatives in this House and in the Senate, as shown by the action of the northern States through their Legislatures, as shown by the political press of the North, as shown by the platforms and avowed principles of the Republican party, as shown by every index to the political sentiment of that section, is, that no other slave State shall be admitted into the Union. And there can be no doubt that their fixed purpose is to continue agitation until they extinguish slavery in the States.

The issue, as accepted by us, is, shall the Federal Constitution and the sovereignty and equality of the States be preserved, and shall the Territories be recognized as the common property of all the States?

The Republican party stand pledged to maintain their side of this issue, at whatever hazard; and no member of that party dare deny this without endangering his position and influence in his party.

Are we of the South prepared to maintain our side of this issue? This is the question.

For one, I am prepared to pledge myself to maintain it; and, maintaining it, to ride out the storm in the proud ship of State, the Constitution, freighted with all the hopes of the Union; or, failing, to go down with the wreck.

I will conclude by the expression of the belief that, if the people of the South would with one united, defiant, and unfaltering voice, demand their rights under the Constitution, they would receive them at the hands of the North, and the Union would be preserved. But if we continue to temporize and resort to compromises and expedients, the Constitution will soon cease to protect our rights, and constitutional liberty be numbered with the things of the past.

Mr. FARNSWORTH obtained the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. As my colleague is not in good health, I will, if he will yield the floor for that purpose, move that the committee rise.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. COLFAX. If the gentleman is not ready to go on now, I will speak this evening, with his consent, and he can have the floor for to-morrow morning.

Mr. KELLOGG. If we are to alternate speeches from the different sides of the House, it strikes me that this yielding the floor is not the way to get on.

Mr. STANTON. Is it in order to move that the committee take a recess until seven o'clock?

The CHAIRMAN. As an original question the Chair would rule the motion out of order; but he has been informed that such a motion has been entertained heretofore.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. By unanimous consent.

Mr. STANTON. I make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. With the consent of my colleague I have moved that the committee rise. I have no objection, however, to a recess, if it be agreed to by others. My colleague is willing to go on with his speech at seven o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the motion for a recess?

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. So do I.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers on the motion that the committee rise.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FLORENCE and ADRAIN were appointed.

The committee commenced dividing, when Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, said: I withdraw the motion that the committee rise.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I think the gentleman cannot withdraw the motion when the committee is dividing.

The CHAIRMAN. There has been no decision on the question, and the rule is, that until there has been some decision, the gentleman has a right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. LAMAR. I submit, as a point of order, that the question has been decided. The question was first taken before the tellers were demanded; and the committee is now proceeding to ascertain what that decision is. The committee is voting to ascertain whether the decision was for or against.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order on the ground that no vote has been taken, and until the vote is announced the gentleman from Illinois has the right to withdraw his motion.

Mr. QUITMAN. If the gentleman from Illinois will yield to me, I will move that the committee rise, and I will not withdraw the motion.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I yield for that motion.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. OWEN JONES called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAIR and HASKIN were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 42, noes 28.

So the motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose, and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOGOCCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. CLAY. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

Mr. COVODE. I move that the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Kentucky must be first put.

Mr. STANTON. I call for tellers on that motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MORGAN and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 24.

The SPEAKER. That is not a sufficient number to adjourn over.

Mr. CLAY demanded the yeas and nays.

Fifteen members voted for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Eleven members sustained the call for tellers.

The SPEAKER. Tellers are not ordered; it requires a particular number to order tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Did not fifteen vote in favor of the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn over?

The SPEAKER. Fifteen only.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Is not fifteen more than one fifth of those present?

Mr. LETCHER. We have got beyond that point, and we are now upon the question of tellers.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that there was not a sufficient number to order tellers. The Chair decides that the yeas and nays are not ordered, from the fact that fifteen is not a sufficient number to order the yeas and nays on this motion, as it requires a quorum to adjourn over, and fifteen is less than one fifth of a quorum.

Mr. CLAY. Does the Chair know whether there is a quorum present or not?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not.

Mr. CLAY. It is to ascertain that fact that I desire the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. There are not enough voting for the yeas and nays in any point of view.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Cannot one fifth of those present order the yeas and nays on any question? It is a constitutional provision.

Mr. LETCHER. I have a point of order to raise upon that. The Chair took the vote upon the call for yeas and nays, and announced that fifteen only had voted for them. Tellers were then called for, and eleven gentlemen rose, and the Chair announced that there were not enough, and then a division was called for.

The SPEAKER. A division upon what?

Mr. LETCHER. A division upon tellers, I suppose. It could not have been upon the question of yeas and nays, for that was passed.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman knows that it requires one fifth of a quorum to order tellers.

Mr. LETCHER. So I say; but the gentleman from Tennessee is raising a question in reference to the yeas and nays. He contends that fifteen members can order the yeas and nays. Now, I say we have passed that question; and now another question has arisen, upon which the Chair has acted.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. What was the call for tellers for?

The SPEAKER. Upon the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And consequently, the question of yeas and nays was not decided; and, if there were fifteen gentlemen in favor of the yeas and nays, they were ordered, if that was more than one fifth of those present.

Mr. COLFAX. I call the gentleman from Tennessee to order. When a motion is pending, which is not itself debatable, no question of order arising out of it is debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman as debating it. He is only stating his point of order.

Mr. CLAY. I propose to submit a proposition which, if it is in order, will obviate all this difficulty. The question seems to be, whether there is a quorum present; and, to ascertain that fact, I move a call of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is already pending.

Mr. CLAY. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER. No business has intervened since that question was decided adversely.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. Is it not in order to have a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion to adjourn must be first put.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays upon the motion to adjourn.

Mr. COVODE withdrew his motion to adjourn.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Many members have business before the Departments which they desire to transact to-morrow. Many others desire to discuss the general policy of the country, and particularly the Kansas question. I propose that, by general consent, we agree to adjourn with the understanding—

Mr. CLAY. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CAMPBELL. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union may take a recess till to-morrow at twelve o'clock; and I propose that the House do now resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with that view.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. STEVENSON called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 68, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bocoek, Brayton, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Colfax, Conins, Covode, Cox, Dawes, Dodd, Dowdell, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gilman, Gooch, Grow, Haskin, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Lamar, Leach, Leiter, Letcher, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Parker, Pike, Potter, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Seales, Searing, Aaron Shaw, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Tompkins, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Bryan, Campbell, John B. Clark, Clay, Cockrill, Davis of Indiana, Dewart, Dimmick, Faulkner, Florence, Groesbeck, Owen Jones, Maynard, Pendleton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, and Talbot—17.

Thereupon the House (at half past five o'clock, p. m.) adjourned till to-morrow at twelve o'clock, p. m.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, March 20, 1858.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BAYARD. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a message of the President of the United States, communicating a letter and decree of the Commissioner of the United States in China, made on the 4th of March, 1857, for the regulation of the consular courts of the United States in China, have instructed me to report a resolution declaring that no revision of these regulations is requisite. As the attendance of Senators is quite thin at present, I shall not ask that the resolution be adopted now; but I presume it will be agreed to as a matter of course when a statement is made of its object. It is of some importance that the opinion of the Senate should be expressed as to the propriety of the regulations made by the United States Commissioner.

The resolution was laid on the table for the present.

KANSAS LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) to admit the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. WILSON. By an understanding among ourselves that we have all entered into in regard to this debate, it was arranged that the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Rhode Island would speak before to-day, and that I was to speak this morning. I took the floor last evening, but I have concluded to yield the floor to the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Rhode Island who have not spoken on this subject, and to postpone any remarks I may wish to make, until seven and a half or eight o'clock, after others shall have had an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. FOOT addressed the Senate in opposition to the bill.

Mr. SIMMONS also entered into an argument on the same side.

Mr. BRIGHT sustained the policy involved in the course pursued by the friends of the measure, and urged the immediate admission of the State of Kansas.

The Senate then took a recess until seven o'clock. Upon reassembling,

Mr. WILSON addressed the Senate, chiefly in reply to the speech of Mr. HAMMOND, of South Carolina, on the free labor of the North, which he contrasted with the slave labor of the South.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

The Senate then adjourned until ten o'clock on Monday morning.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, March 20, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by the Rev. A. HOLMEAD.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The question was taken on the latter motion; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. LETCHER's motion; and it was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bocoek in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 306, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, upon which Mr. FARNSWORTH was entitled to the floor.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to the subject on which I propose to address the committee this morning, as allusion was made to me last evening by the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN,] as having proposed an amendment to the Army bill, in reference to the volunteers of the State of Texas, I wish to say that I did give notice of that amendment in good faith, with the intention of asking for a vote upon it, it not being in order at that time to offer an amendment; but, the previous question being subsequently seconded, I had no opportunity of doing so. This notice I gave, not with any purpose of injuring the feelings of any gentleman from Texas, but because I had understood, from the resolutions of the Legislature of that State, that that State had taken preliminary steps towards secession from the Union in case Kansas should be admitted under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say that Texas does not desire to secede from the Union; and she only fears that the Union will secede from her.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Well, if Texas does not intend to secede from the Union—and I do not suppose she does—I am very well satisfied that the amendment was not offered.

In the month of January last, at the city of Moscow, in Russia, there were gathered together a large number of the nobles and great men of that great Empire, at a banquet in honor of the abolition of serfdom in that despotism; and on that occasion, in response to the first toast—"The health of the Emperor"—the respondent said:

"The Emperor has struck at the roots of this evil. The glory and prosperity of Russia cannot rest upon institutions based on injustice and falsehood. The Emperor has ceded this great reform, which he might have accomplished by his own powerful will, by asking the nobles to take the initiative. Let us, then, hail this noble idea, inspired by the sole wish for the welfare of his people, with that enlightened heartiness which may now be expected from Russia."

Thus the strange spectacle is presented of one of the most absolute despotisms which ever existed emancipating its slaves, while the project is hailed with "enlightened heartiness" as a "noble idea" by the nation; whilst at the same time, in this free and enlightened Republic, the Congress of the United States is engaged from day to day, and week to week, yea, and, I may say, from year to year, in excited and fierce discussions of the rightfulness and propriety of the extension of a system of slavery a hundredfold worse in its nature and effects than Russian serfdom.

For, after all, this Kansas question, whatever may be said about the regularity of the formation of the Lecompton constitution, or of its being the constitution of the people, is really a question of the extension or non-extension of slavery; as such it is discussed, and as such it will be determined. And such has been the character of this controversy ever since it was first proposed in the Senate of the United States to repeal the Missouri compromise by the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. In the remarks which I may now have the honor of addressing to the House, I do not expect to be at all singular in this respect.

I propose, briefly, to give some of the reasons why I oppose the extension of the slave power, by the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution; and first, I oppose it because it is contrary to the genius and spirit of our declaration and Constitution, and the designs of the fathers of the Republic, as exhibited in the history of the Government, until a recent period. I know it is now roundly asserted by the Democratic party, that Congress has no rightful authority to interdict or prohibit the introduction of slavery into the Territories of the United States; that to do so would violate the principle of the equality of States; and that party has recently invoked the aid of the Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case—a tribunal which sits yearly, in an appropriate dismal room in the basement of this Capitol, where one can easily realize Dickens's description of the Foggy high court of chancery; and they have obtained the side bar dictum of a majority of those judges to sustain this doctrine. The President of the United States wonders that a doubt could ever have existed, that the Constitution carries slavery into the Territories, and declares that Kansas is as much a slave State as Georgia.

I know that in those opinions in the Dred Scott case, made for political purposes, to aid a corrupt party in subverting the principles of the Constitution, some of those judges contended that the Declaration of Independence does not mean that all men were endowed with the inalienable rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, as it reads; but that our fathers only meant all white men then in this country; that they were equal in rights with Great Britain, &c., and that when the framers of the Constitution inscribed upon the porch of that temple of liberty the purposes for which it was made, and declared that it was ordained to "establish justice, and secure the blessings of liberty," they did not exactly mean that in its general sense, but only meant it so far as they, the persons framing it, and their individual posterity, were concerned.

Now, sir, with all these sentiments and opinions I take issue. I insist that the signers of the Declaration of Independence meant to assert a fundamental truth, and to place before the world this truth as the great principle for which they contended. Why, they say that this declaration is made from "a decent respect to the opinions of mankind;" not a part of mankind, not Europeans, Americans, Englishmen, white men, or black men, but MANKIND. Did they intend to insult the mankind for whose opinions they entertained this decent respect, by declaring that a part of them had rights which another part had not? They were not then talking of political rights, or rights of government, but human rights; and they say that "governments are instituted among men to protect these rights."

After the close of the war, Congress issued an address; and, to impress this doctrine still more deeply and firmly upon the people, in that address they used these words:

"Let it be remembered, finally, that it has ever been the boast and pride of America that the rights for which she contended are the rights of human nature."

According to the Democratic party, they meant Anglo-Saxon, or white human nature! To show what Mr. Jefferson understood by the "rights of human nature," I quote from his Notes on Virginia. He says:

"In the very first session held under the Republican Government, the Assembly [of Virginia] passed a law for the perpetual prohibition of the importation of slaves. This will, in some measure, stop the increase of this great political and moral evil, while the minds of our citizens may be ripening for a complete emancipation of human nature."

And again, in the same book, when speaking of the corrupting influence of slavery upon both the morals and manners of the people, and of its baneful effects in destroying that reverence for the true principles of liberty and justice which ought always to exist, he says:

"And can the liberties of a nation be thought secure, when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction in the minds of the people that these liberties are of the gift of God? That they are not to be violated but with his wrath, &c."

But, without going further into the subject of the meaning of the declaration, in regard to "human rights," I propose to examine this most startling doctrine of the President—this new-fangled Democracy, that the Constitution carries slavery into the Territories, and that Congress has no right to prohibit its existence in them. There are several modes of meeting this proposition; one is by reasoning from the provisions of the Constitution itself; another is by showing that those who made and adopted that Constitution did not so intend or understand it. I propose, as it is not my purpose, and I have not time to enter largely into this constitutional argument, to present a few facts and considerations, showing what the understanding of the framers of the Constitution was upon this subject.

I said that this doctrine was contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, as exhibited in the history of the Government until a late period; and I propose to prove it by a few direct references. One thing is clear and self-evident; and that is, that if Congress may rightfully prohibit slavery in the Territories, then the Constitution does not carry slavery into them; as a law of Congress cannot be of higher authority than the Constitution.

The first example I will cite is the ordinance for the government of the Northwestern Territory which comprised the present States of Ohio, Indiana, Michigan and Wisconsin; every rood of organized Territory possessed by our Government when the Constitution was ratified. By this ordinance, passed by Congress on the 13th July, 1787, slavery was prohibited in all that Territory.

I am well aware that these latter-day Democrats are in the habit of attempting to avoid the force of this historical fact, by the answer, that the Constitution had not then been adopted. Well, true it is, that this ordinance was passed by the Continental or Confederate Congress, while the Constitution was not adopted until some two months afterwards. If this were all, it would furnish but a slim objection to my argument, for the Constitution was then being made, and slavery existed as much in the slave States, as it did two months afterwards. But the very first Congress under the Constitution, reënacted that ordinance, in order as they said that it "may continue to have full effect," and they made "certain provisions so as to adapt the same to the present Constitution of the United States."

And who were these men who were so wild and foolish as to assume the right in Congress to prohibit slavery? I will mention some of them, who were also members of the convention which framed the Constitution. There was Rufus King, Elbridge Gerry, John Langdon, Roger Sherman, George Read and Richard Bassett of Delaware, Daniel Carroll of Maryland, Hugh Williamson of North Carolina, Pierce Butler of South Carolina, Few and Baldwin of Georgia, James Madison of Virginia, and George Washington, the president of the convention, and the President of the United States who signed the law. Thus were our fathers in haste to prevent the curse of slavery from spreading itself over more territory, and provided for five free States. Nothing was heard then of "equilibrium," "balance of power," or, "a slave State for every free State," which we hear so much of now; already was it well understood that seven of the thirteen original States were to be free States, and here were to be five more, and yet the framers of the Constitution, slaveholders, even Washington and Madison, had no constitutional scruples about the prohibition, and no fears about the balance of power.

In December, 1789, North Carolina ceded to the United States the territory which forms the present State of Tennessee, which was accepted by an act of Congress of April 2, 1790. Slavery then existed in this Territory under the laws of North Carolina, and that State incorporated into the deed of cession an express provision that slavery should not be prohibited therein, &c.

If Congress had no power to prohibit or abolish slavery in the Territories, why this provision? Sir, it was inserted because it was well understood at that time that Congress not only possessed the power, but that it was the settled policy of the Government to exercise it.

So, when, in 1803, we acquired the Territory of Louisiana from France, Congress prohibited the importation of slaves therein, from beyond the United States; and yet, so far as the States were concerned, Congress had no right to prohibit the foreign slave trade until 1808; but, as to the Territories, this was another recognition of the right of Congress to restrict slavery.

When Missouri was admitted into the Union, Congress again exercised this right of prohibiting slavery in the Territories, by what is generally known as the Missouri compromise. That measure was brought forward, and principally urged and carried by the South. Its principal mover and advocate was Henry Clay; the free States were mostly opposed to the admission of Missouri as a slave State; and this was finally agreed upon as a "pacification," a "compromise." This measure was, less than ten years ago, pronounced by a distinguished Senator from my own State a "sacred thing," having an origin akin to the Constitution, which no ruthless hand dared to assail. Before signing this act, the President, Mr. Monroe, took the written opinions of his Cabinet as to its constitutionality, and they all agreed that it was constitutional—John Quincy Adams and John C. Calhoun among the number.

In 1848, in the act organizing a territorial government in Oregon, Congress again exercised this right by prohibiting slavery therein. This was generally voted for by the Democracy of the North, and the bill was approved by James K. Polk.

In 1848, Mr. Cass, being a little over anxious for the Presidency, wrote a letter, wherein he undertook to substitute squatter sovereignty for the Wilmot proviso, and he was overwhelmed by a perfect deluge of honest indignation.

In 1850, when Congress passed the "omnibus bill," or what are commonly designated "the compromise measures," it again recognized the validity of the Missouri compromise. I know, sir, that it is asserted in the Kansas-Nebraska bill that the Missouri restriction is "inconsistent" with the principles of the compromise measures of 1850; but let us see if that assumption is true. In that portion of the compromise measures of 1850 which provides for the boundaries of Texas, it is enacted—

"That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair or qualify anything contained in the third article of the second section of the joint resolution for annexing Texas to the United States, either as regards the number of States that may hereafter be formed out of the State of Texas, or otherwise."

Now, one of the provisions of the third article of the second section of that joint resolution is as follows:

"And in such State or States as shall be formed out of said territory north of said Missouri compromise line, slavery or involuntary servitude (except for crimes) shall be prohibited."

That was one of the provisions which was neither "impaired or qualified" by the compromise measures of 1850, and remains in full force, unreppealed to this day. Then, sir, is it not a bald assumption to say that the Missouri compromise was inconsistent with the compromise measures of 1850? I think so. Why, sir, when the Nebraska bill was reported to the Senate by the committee, in June, 1854, they had not made this discovery of inconsistency, for in that report the committee say:

"They do not feel themselves called upon to enter into those controverted questions, [referring to the power of Congress to prohibit slavery.] They involve the same grave issues which produced the agitation, the sectional strife, and the fearful struggle of 1850. As Congress deemed it wise and prudent to refrain from deciding the matters in controversy then, either by affirming or repealing the Mexican laws," &c., "so your committee are not prepared now to recommend a departure from the course pursued on that memorable occasion, either by affirming or repealing the eighth section of the Missouri act, or by any act declaratory of the meaning of the Constitution in respect to the legal points in dispute."

Yet, sir, in a few days after that, at the dictation of David Atchison, of Missouri, as he himself says, this committee did take their departure from the course pursued in 1850; and then pretended to have suddenly made the wonderful discovery that the two acts were in conflict; that there were more passengers in the omnibus than had paid fare.

I have thus referred to a few of the numerous instances where this power to legislate upon the subject of slavery in the Territories has been exercised and fully recognized. Webster, the great expounder of the Constitution, always recognized it. I have done this, Mr. Chairman, not that I expect to convince any of these wise, latter-day Democrats that they are in error, because, of course, they are much wiser than their fathers; but only to show how far they differ from the men who made the Declaration and the Constitution, who fought for their own and our liberties; how they differ from Washington and Jefferson, Madison and the Adamses, Monroe and Polk, Calhoun and Webster, and Benton and Clay; yea, and Douglas and the rest of them, up to the month of June, 1854.

Perhaps I can illustrate this point by an anecdote. A lawyer in one of the western States was arguing a point before a justice of the peace. The justice overruled him. The lawyer wished to read some law on the question from Blackstone. The justice very abruptly declined to hear anything further on the subject, saying that he had already decided, and that it was useless. The lawyer replied that he did not propose to convince the court that he was wrong, but he just wanted to show him what an old fool old Blackstone was.

So far from the Constitution carrying slavery into the Territories, I assert that slavery can only exist by positive municipal law; it must have actual, direct, legal protection; and here I will give my answer to the oft-repeated argument, that "unless the slaveholder can carry his slaves with him, from the slave States to the Territories, and hold them there, then there is an inequality of right; that the Territories are purchased with the common blood and common treasure of the slave as well as the free States, and that therefore they of the slave States should have an equal right," &c. This is the argument of "State equality."

Now, I answer, true it is, the Territories are the common property of the people of the slave as well as of the free States, and their rights should be equal; and I contend they are equal. By the common law slavery is not known; there is no such thing as property in man under that law; there is property in horses, cattle, in goods, wares, and merchandise; property in things personal and real; but no property in persons. We require neither constitution nor statute to hold our property, nor do you to hold yours, except your human property; for the Almighty made it property when he gave man "dominion" over it. This property the people of the free and the slave States alike may remove to the Territories, and hold it there. Thus we are equal. But you have under your State laws a "peculiar" kind of property, which is, so far as the common law is concerned, an outlaw, a species of property for which you cannot show a patent from the Almighty—a kind of property which we have not—which neither our State laws nor the common law will allow us to have; and you want the right to carry this peculiar property into the Territories—a right which we have not. I say, sir, that, instead of that being equal justice, it would be very unequal. This would be allowing the people from a part of the States of this Union not only the right to carry their property with them, but to transfer their peculiar laws and institutions also.

I presume that my proposition—that slavery is unknown to the common law and can only exist by virtue of municipal law—will not be disputed; but lest it should be, I will cite a few cases in point.

In giving his decision in the celebrated Somerset case, Lord Mansfield said:

"The state of slavery is of such a nature that it is incapable of being introduced on any reason, moral or political, but only by positive law."

In the case of Rankin vs. Lydia, (2 Marshall, page 479,) the supreme court of Mississippi say:

"We view this [the condition of slavery] as a right existing by positive law, of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature or in the unwritten or common law."

The supreme court of Missouri, of Louisiana, of Georgia, and, in fine, of every slave State in this Union, have decided the same. It is useless to multiply cases. (Harry vs. Decker, Walker's Reports, page 42, Missouri; Martin's Louisiana Reports, page 114.)

Why, sir, this equality of State doctrine, as now taught and construed by the Democratic or Administration party, (the slavery propagating party of the present time,) is, like the other discovery of that party, that all men who labor are slaves, a recent discovery. In December, 1837, John C. Calhoun introduced into the Senate of the United States some resolutions, one of which embraced that doctrine. It read as follows:

"Resolved, That the Union of these States rests on an equality of rights and advantages among its members; and that whatever destroys that equality tends to destroy the Union itself; and that it is the solemn duty of all, and more especially of this body, which represents the States in their corporate capacity, to resist all attempts to discriminate between the States in extending the benefits of the Government to the several portions of the Union; and that, to refuse to extend to the southern and western States any advantage which would tend to strengthen, or render them more secure, or increase their limits or population by the annexation of new territory or States, on the assumption, or under the pretext, that the institution of slavery, as it exists among them, is immoral or sinful, or otherwise obnoxious, would be contrary to that equality of rights and advantages which the Constitution was intended to secure alike to all the members of the Union, and would, in effect, disfranchise the slaveholding States, withholding from them the advantages, while it subjected them to the burdens, of the Government."

This was the last of a series of six resolutions proposed by Mr. Calhoun. Let us see what was done with it. By reference to the Congressional Globe, volume 6, page 98, from which I read, we find it was disposed of in the following summary manner:

"Mr. Preston moved to lay the resolution on the table, giving the reasons on which he founded his motion; on which a short debate ensued; after which, the question was taken by yeas and nays; and carried by a vote of 35 to 9; as follows: [Buchanan dodged the vote.]

"YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benton, Black, Brown, Clay of Kentucky, Clayton, Cuthbert, Crittenden, Davis, Grundy, Hubbard, King of Alabama, Knight, Lyon, McKee, Merrick, Morris, Nichols, Niles, Norvell, Pearce, Prentiss, Preston, Rives, Robbins, Smith of Tennessee, Strange, Swift, Talmadge, Tipton, Webster, White, Williams, and Wright—35.

"NAYS—Messrs. Calhoun, Clay of Alabama, Fulton, Lumpkin, Roane, Robinson, Sevier, Walker, and Young—9."

Such was the estimate in which those sentiments were held twenty years ago. It is strange, is it not, that they now constitute the chief plank—the chief principle of this Democratic Administration? Verily, "the stone which the builders rejected has become the chief stone of the corner."

I oppose the admission of Kansas as a slave

State, also, for the reason that slavery is a curse to any country, and to any people; it corrupts the morals and the manners of the people where ever it exists; it promotes poverty and ignorance; it degrades labor, and consequently banishes the free laborer from the land. You might as well prohibit by an act of Congress the emigration of the free laboring man of the North to that State, as to permit slavery to exist there. Slavery cramps and clogs the energies and progress of a State; retards improvements; wears out, and depreciates the value of the soil; in fine, sir, it is in, almost every conceivable light, a curse! In this connection I wish to refer to some of the sentiments which have been uttered by a number of gentlemen, members of this and the other branch of Congress, during the present session, and to reply to this threat of disunion, which has become so common of late, if we do not admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

A distinguished Democratic Senator from South Carolina declared, the other day, that "every man who sold his labor was a slave; that the whole hiring class of laborers and operatives [at the North] were slaves;" and argued that they were not so well off as their black slaves. He also insisted that the South had the best frame of society in the world; and that it was owing to the institution of slavery; and that the southern States would be much the gainers by the dissolution of the Union, &c.

The gentleman from Mississippi, in a speech on this floor, said, in substance, that "the system of slavery was promotive of the highest state of civilization." Another gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] in his speech upon this floor, recently, argued that the North was making war upon the institution of slavery; that there were only two million persons engaged in agriculture in the United States; who are chiefly in the southern States; and, therefore, the commercial and manufacturing interests of the North were seeking to "break down the political power of that portion of the Union which is engaged in agriculture," (viz: the South,) by opposing the extension of slavery. This gentleman also argued the probability of a disruption of the Union; and stated that the people of the South contemplated civil war and revolution with a calm, serene, and self-sustaining mind!

Another gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARRETT,] in a speech, a few days since, declared that, "in order to preserve this Union, we must admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, as a slave State;" "that the threat of dissolution was no idle threat, but that the people of the South meant it," &c.; "that the institution of slavery in the South was right in principle and practice; that it had developed the resources of the country to an untold extent, and, by its influence, had elevated the people of the South in the scale of morality, wealth, enterprise, and intelligence, to a point never attained by any other people."

Another gentleman, from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON,] who declared himself to be a Know Nothing, or Native American, and who thought the principles of this Administration harmonized so well with his own, also declared, in his speech the other day, in favor of slavery as a principle, as it exists in this country, &c.

Another gentleman, from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] declares that, "if Kansas is rejected under the Lecompton constitution, the sun of the national Democratic party will go down to rise no more"—that is a consummation devoutly to be wished—and he prays Heaven "that the State of Alabama may become a nucleus around which shall spring into existence a southern confederacy." That gentleman further told us that he had a "sovereign contempt for the memory of the Pilgrim Fathers;" which must make the descendants of the Pilgrims feel monstrous bad. He regretted that there ever had been a Plymouth Rock; had "rather be vassals of Old than New England;" and declared that Alabama could very well go it alone as the "independent Republic of Alabama;" and command the respect of the whole world, &c.!

Such, sir, are but a sample of the speeches and sentiments uttered in this Hall almost daily. A few words in reply to these menaces, these disunion threats. They have ever been most potent weapons for the slavery propagandist in carrying any measure, no matter how repulsive it might be to the people of the free States. It has always been used to frighten craven, faint hearts, and to mold doughfaces. "If you do not annex Texas, and thereby extend the area of slavery, we will dissolve the Union;" and forthwith the thing is done; Texas is annexed; we assume her quarrels; fight it through; pay her debts; give her $10,000,000 for a naked claim to territory which was very doubtfully hers; set her agoing flourishingly and swimmingly; and now Texas is going to dissolve the Union again! "If you do not catch our runaway human property, we will dissolve the Union!" and we all set to chasing their slaves—to save the Union. So with the repeal of the Missouri compromise: the Union was threatened, if it was not done. And now we are asked to force this damnable curse upon an unwilling people, and to drag that people into the Union under a constitution which is not of their making, or the Union must be dissolved. Well, sir, I tell you that we will not do this thing though you dissolve a hundred Unions. But we are not at all scared about the Union. It may be that this is the last straw, which breaks the camel's back. But I have no fears about it; and for one, I wish to test its strength a little. It has been saved a great many times. If we are to believe the stories which have been told about how the Union has been saved, one would suppose that it had passed more "hair-breadth escapes in the imminent deadly breach" than ever Othello did. And yet, sir, I do not believe that the Union has received much of a strain after all.

Sir, if these Democratic politicians of the South are going to dissolve this Union, I ask them to begin; do not stand there like empty braggarts boasting what you will do, but let us see how stout and valiant you are. Yet, before you begin, I would like you to tell me where the line of separation is to be; which are to become the border slave States of this "southern confederacy," and how much of the Mississippi and the other national arteries do you expect to take? Where are you going to divide the railroads, which, like muscles of steel, bind together this mighty Confederacy? How will you divide the Capitol and other common property of the nation? Will you cut in twain our country's bright history, the memory of the fathers, and all their noble deeds? and all that slavery may be extended and human bondage increased and perpetuated! I ask those gentlemen if they have contemplated the truth, for truth it is, that disunion would be the death-knell to all their hopes, not only of extending slavery, but of slavery itself.

Sir, the Republican party has been charged with being a disunion party. The charge is false. We are for the Union and the Constitution. We would maintain both, and when we get the power (as we surely will in 1860) we mean to preserve both in all their excellence.

In some of the southern States they raise hemp, I am told, an excellent article. Well, sir, there is a theory, I believe, of the botanic physicians, that every country and locality produces a vegetable remedy for the diseases peculiar to that locality. Now, sir, I have no doubt that southern hemp would be, if properly used, as sovereign a remedy for disunion as East India hemp is for the consumption, in the hands of "old Doctor James." So much for disunion.

But, Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a few facts, bearing upon the question of the relative merits of freedom and slavery, and in answer to the statements and assumptions of the gentlemen which I have alluded to. I take it that if slavery is better than freedom, if slave society is better than free society, its comparative excellence will be manifest in the growth, progress, and prosperity of the slave States, and the intelligence and education of the people where slavery exists. Now, let us see what the statistics show upon this subject. Take, for example, the States of Virginia and New York.

Virginia has something over sixty thousand square miles of territory, while New York has some forty-seven thousand square miles. Virginia had as good a soil, and a better climate than New York—and had much the start in settlement! I have prepared a table which I will give, showing the progress of the two States up to 1850:

Total population at different periods, including slaves.
	1790.	1800.	1830.	1850.
Virginia.....	748,398	880,390	1,311,405	1,421,661
New York.....	334,120	580,755	1,918,603	3,037,394

Again, sir, in 1850 there was invested in church property in New York $21,134,207, and in Virginia the sum of only $2,856,076. At that time there were published in New York 428 newspapers, with an aggregate circulation of 115,385,473; while in Virginia there were but 87, with a circulation of 9,223,068. New York expends $2,500,000 yearly for educational purposes, while Virginia expends about $700,000. In Virginia, taking the entire free white native population, there are 75,868 adults over twenty years of age who cannot read or write, while in New York there are but 23,241 of the same class. In New York it is about one in fifty of the adults, while in Virginia it is about one in five! Sixty years ago, Virginia ranked as the noblest and richest State of them all; she was then justly regarded as the mother of statesmen and of States; then she had ten Representatives, while New York had only six. Now New York has thirty-three, and Virginia thirteen. Why, sir, John Randolph said a good many years ago, "Virginia is so impoverished by the system of slavery, that the tables will sooner or later be turned, and the slaves will advertise for runaway masters."

Take another example: Kentucky and Ohio, nearly equal in area, Kentucky having the advantage in climate; and in all other respects as to soil, position, and natural resources equal to Ohio; and how do they stand in the race of progress? Kentucky had much the start, having, in 1790, 73,000 inhabitants, while Ohio had none. Kentucky was admitted into the Union by act of Congress of February, 1791. Ohio was admitted in 1803, with one Representative. In the year 1800 Kentucky had 221,000 inhabitants, and Ohio had only 45,365. In 1820 Kentucky had 564,000, while Ohio had 581,000! and in 1850, Kentucky had 982,605, while Ohio had 1,980,329! It will be borne in mind that this enumeration in Kentucky includes over 210,000 slaves, while in Ohio they are all freemen.

In 1850 Kentucky had 62 newspapers, with a circulation of 6,582,838; and Ohio had 261 newspapers, with a circulation of 30,473,407. Kentucky had 131,205 pupils and students attending schools, and Ohio had 514,809 attending schools. Kentucky has now 10 Representatives, and Ohio 21; and after 1860 the disparity will be much greater. Upon the adoption of the Federal Constitution, I think South Carolina had five Representatives. In seventy years this State, which, if we are to believe her statesmen, has such an excellent social and political system, and such a pure and genuine democracy, has managed, principally by the increase of her slaves, (who now number more than half her entire population,) to grow just one Representative.

Take one other example, Mr. Speaker, and I have done with this subject—Alabama, the most flourishing of all the slave States. In 1820 she had 127,900 inhabitants; while Illinois, at the same time, had but 55,200. They were admitted into the Union about the same time. I think Illinois was admitted in December, 1818, and Alabama in December, 1819. Well, there they are, fairly started in the race of progress. Alabama having more than twice as many people as Illinois, situate directly upon the Gulf of Mexico, with the harbor of Mobile, capable of accommodating almost the entire shipping of the world; her products of a much more valuable character than those of Illinois; whilst Illinois was a far western State, difficult of access, far away from the sea-coast and from an inviting market. Now, sir, let us see "what time they have made" in the race, and how they come out.

Population.

Alabama.....	127,900	309,527	590,756	771,623
Illinois.....	55,200	157,445	476,183	851,470

This includes slaves and all. The white population of Alabama in 1850 was only 426,514; and to-day, sir, whilst Illinois has more than a million and a half of freemen, there are not probably more than half a million in Alabama. In Alabama, in 1850, there were 60 newspapers, with an aggregate circulation of 2,662,741; and in Illinois there were 107 newspapers, with a circulation of 5,102,276. In Alabama there were 62,846 pupils and students attending schools, &c.; and in Illinois there were, at the same time, 182,292 attending schools.

Sir, I think it was the present Governor of Virginia, who, in Congress, a few years ago, thanked his God that there were no newspapers in his district. Now, sir, it is an occasion of much pride to me that there are in my district over forty newspapers at this time, regularly issued; and that district gave me more than 21,000 votes.

For this prosperity we in the North are apt to acknowledge that we are indebted, in great measure, to the Pilgrim Fathers and to Plymouth Rock; and while the gentleman from Alabama curses and contemns their memory, we bless their memory, and thank God for the old sea-beaten rock, and for the weary pilgrims who landed upon it. Sir, let me tell that gentleman from the "independent Republic of Alabama," that had there been no Pilgrim Fathers, there would have been no Alabama; had there been no Plymouth Rock, he would be the vassal of Old England to-day. Compare the intelligence of that New England, which the gentleman derides, with that of his own State; yes, with that of all the slaveholding States. In Massachusetts, in 1850, there were but one thousand and fifty-five native white persons over the age of twenty years who could not read and write; or about one to every seven hundred and seventy-eight of the entire white native population. At the same time there were of the same class in Alabama thirty-three thousand six hundred and eighteen who could not read and write, or one to every twelve and a half of the entire white native population; and that is about the average in the slave States. Why, sir, in the slaveholding States to-day, from eighteen to twenty per cent. of all the free white native voters cannot read the ballots they cast, nor sign their own names to a poll-book. Talk about the "independent Republic of Alabama," sir, setting up for itself, and going it alone! Why, how long is it since a man was driven from Alabama for selling Uncle Tom's Cabin, or some book of the kind? And when his wife sought to stay there to collect a few debts which that chivalrous people owed her husband, a public meeting was held, and it was resolved that she too must go. The institutions of Alabama were not strong enough to stand the presence of one poor woman! and yet the gentleman talks of the "independent Republic of Alabama!"

I do not make these remarks, sir, from any disposition to disparage any State of this Union; I would not do any of them an injury if I could; but it is proper that we should repel the assaults made upon the free States; and when it is sought to extend the slave power, by the addition of another slave State, under the pretense that it is right, and that slavery is better than freedom, or to maintain an equilibrium, or balance of power, then we are called upon to show the blighting, desolating, and retarding influence of the system; and that it is utterly impossible to preserve a balance of power between them; that freedom cannot be hemmed in, cramped, and finished, like a Chinese lady's foot; but it must, and will, burst its fetters and expand; while slavery produces palsy and stagnation and death.

The natural resources of the slave States of this Union are immeasurable; and, without slavery, they would have untold wealth and greatness; but now, so it is, this accursed system has shut out enterprise, has shut out the free laborer, and has spread itself like a pall over the land, with its enervating and baneful influence, like blight and mildew, wherever it falls.

Mr. Chairman, I am opposed to the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, because the people of Kansas never made that constitution, and do not wish to be admitted under it; but it is an attempt by the Administration to consummate a conspiracy begun nearly four years ago, to make a slave State, and which has been carried on by a series of frauds and outrages unprecedented and unparalleled in the history of any nation under the sun. During all that time, various agencies have been used to effect this purpose, of which the Lecompton constitution seems to be the crowning glory! I have only time to mention a few of these agencies.

The Territory of Kansas was carved out, and bounded, to make a slave State. Stuck in there behind Missouri, being almost inaccessible except through Missouri, slavery was given much the advantage in the outset.

From time to time forays were made by people from the State of Missouri, and other slave States, into Kansas, especially when elections were to be held, and the people of Kansas were forcibly driven from the polls; judges of election, of the invaders' choosing, were substituted, while they did the voting. A Legislature was in this manner chosen, the members of which, many of them, resided in Missouri; they went over when the Legislature convened, enacted the whole code of Missouri, and some additional statutes, and then returned again to their homes in Missouri. Murders and robberies were committed with impunity, provided the victims were only free-State men. Free-State towns, printing-presses, and hotels, were destroyed under the direction of United States officials, without ever being even asked why they did so by the Administration. Every man met upon the highway was asked if he was for a free or slave State; and if he had the temerity to answer the former, he had to run the gauntlet for his life.

Finding that the people from the free States would emigrate to the Territory, induced thereto by its excellent lands, and to provide homes for themselves and their families, these marauders and their abettors obstructed the travel upon the Missouri river, a great national highway, and day after day, in broad daylight, boarded the steamers which were bearing emigrants to Kansas, robbed them of their property, and compelled the boats to turn about and descend the river. When the free-State men of Kansas sought to make a little feeble resistance to this tyranny, and to defend their homes and families from these worse than savages, they were arrested by United States authority, and confined in a loathsome prison on charges of treason and other offenses, while their families could be plundered and robbed, or driven away; and then, ruined and heart-broken, they were discharged without trial.

During her brief history five Governors, and nearly as many Secretaries, have, by turns, governed the Territory; and if we are to believe the President and the Democratic party, a strange kind of fatality has attended them all. It would seem that there was something in the very atmosphere of Kansas repugnant and poisonous to Democratic Governors; or else the complaints of the free-State men are true, and they have been crushed and abused worse than ever were a people before, in any half-civilized country.

The first Governor of Kansas, A. H. Reeder, was one of the few honest Democrats left in the North, after the passage of the Kansas and Nebraska bill. He was weak enough to suppose, however, that nothing more was intended than was expressed in the Kansas bill, and that the people of the Territory were really to have the privilege of protection in a fair expression of their wishes at the polls. He tried to govern accordingly; but for this he was set upon by the ruffians in the Territory, and the rascals at Washington; he was persecuted with false charges for the purpose of disgracing him, and removed from the office to make room for another Democrat, of a different class, Wilson Shannon; a man who was bad enough when sober, and worse when drunk. He served his masters as well as he knew how; but (to borrow a saying from a distinguished Senator) he failed for want of capacity; though I have no doubt Shannon would have been continued, but just then it was thought necessary, in order to carry Pennsylvania for Mr. Buchanan, that a more respectable man, and, if possible, one from that State, should take the place of Shannon: whereupon President Pierce proceeded to appoint John W. Geary, another Kansas-Nebraska Democrat from Pennsylvania, who reached Kansas in September, 1856, with strong prejudices against the free-State men there; a strict Democrat, but, like Reeder, having some honesty mixed with his Democracy. Well, sir, he remained Governor of Kansas about seven months; when he was, like Reeder, obliged to flee for his life. He had got his eyes opened, while there, to the real state of the case. He could not be made to sink his entire manhood and honesty by the pro-slavery ruffians of Kansas, or a corrupt Administration at Washington. But he had served a purpose, and Buchanan had carried Pennsylvania. Now he, like Reeder, was denounced as an "Abolitionist," and contemptuously tossed over to the Black Republicans.

Now, Buchanan being elected, with a majority in both Senate and House, the slaveholders demanded that the governorship of that Territory should be turned over to them; they said that northern Governors were not to be trusted. The President, full of gratitude to the South, which had so well sustained him, and perhaps not having much of that excellent quality which was possessed in some degree by Reeder and Geary, said to them, "do with me as thou wilt;" and straightway appointed two slaveholders, from the States of Mississippi and Tennessee, Governor and Secretary of that ill-starred Territory. Now, everything seemed to be going on swimmingly for the slavery propagandists. Governor Walker was to have full sway, with an army to back him. General Harney, supposed to be an excellent butcher, especially where Abolitionists were to be disposed of, was sent for to command the army in Kansas, where the people were enjoying such sweet repose, under the quieting influence of the repeal of the Missouri compromise! Well, sir, the result is known to the whole country—how Walker and Stanton began, filled with bitter prejudices against the free-State men there; how they menaced the city of Lawrence while camped before it; how gradually their eyes became opened; and at last, like the messengers who were sent out by Saul to take David a third time, even they prophesied also.

After a service of a few months Walker was invited to resign; and Stanton was removed for calling the Territorial Legislature together, that they might provide some method by which the people could express their assent, or dissent, to the Lecompton constitution, which had been denied them by the constitutional convention. That did not suit this squatter-sovereignty Democracy, nor did it please his majesty James I.; for with all the obstructions which had been thrown in their way, notwithstanding the obstacles opposed to emigration from the free States, and the oppressions and outrages they experienced, still the great pulsations of freemen could not be suppressed; and when our emigrants to Kansas could not get in the front way by the ordinary channels of travel, their steady tramp was heard over the prairies and through the wilderness of western Iowa and Nebraska, and into Kansas they would get some way; and it was well established that the free-State men constituted the great body of the people of the Territory; and if the constitution should be submitted to a fair vote of the people, why, they would vote it down. So said the Democracy of Kansas; and what was the use of making a constitution if it was to be voted down?

It is said by the President that the slavery question was submitted to the people by the Lecompton convention. Now, sir, without noticing—for I have not time—the conditional submission of the slave-importation clause to a vote, (which was the only thing submitted,) I deny that the question of Kansas being a slave or free State was ever submitted to the people by that constitution.

Slaves are held in Kansas—some hundreds of them; I do not know how many, and it matters not for my argument how many; for if any are held there by constitutional authority, it is a slave State. Now, the Lecompton constitution provides, that even if the slavery article should be voted down, still "the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." And this the President, in his message, approves, and thinks it would be very wrong for the constitution to drive the slavery already existing in the Territory out of the State, or to deprive the masters already there of their slave property.

Sir, to this complexion has popular sovereignty come at last: first, deny the right of either Congress or a Territorial Legislature to prohibit slavery in a Territory; next, procure a decision of the Supreme Court that the Constitution of the United States carries slavery into the Territories; and then, deny the right of the people of a Territory, when they form a State constitution, to drive out the slavery already existing there, upon the ground that it is interfering with vested rights.

Mr. Chairman, I turn from this doctrine with disgust; and I tell you that I trust the last slave State has been added to this Confederacy. So help me God, none shall ever be admitted with the assistance of my vote; and whether here or anywhere else, wherever or whenever it is in my power to strike a shackle from a human limb, or from human progress, that power shall be exercised.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Chairman, I feel that an apology is due to you and to the committee, on my part, for presuming to trespass longer on their patience in the discussion of this subject, on which they have heard so much. I originally intended to take no part in it. My purpose was to cast my vote sans phrase, and to leave it on record to vindicate itself; but reasons of a personal nature, as well as of a nature affecting the few gentlemen on this floor with whom I have the honor to concur in sentiment, have induced me to seek an opportunity to state the reasons why, and the principles on which, I shall vote for the admission of Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution. It might be enough to say that, after a discussion of upwards of three months, I have neither seen nor heard assigned any sufficient phrase, the rule is on the opposition to show reason why I should not thus vote; for, in legal cause, if any they have or can show, why Kansas, with that constitution, should not be admitted. I take it, sir, that when the people of a Territory, being citizens of the United States, in numbers sufficient to give them a Representative in Congress, united as a body-politic, under a constitution republican in its form, come here and apply to us to be admitted as a State, their right to admission is complete. We might, as has been done in some instances in the history of the country, by factious opposition, deny that right; and the people so applying may have no legal means of enforcing it. The remedy may not be in their power; but, as I hold, their right is nevertheless complete.

I have been told by a gentleman having the best means of knowing, and having no interest whatever in misrepresentation, that the inhabitants of the Territory, at the present time, number upwards of one hundred thousand. That statement I have seen no one controvert. As to the numerical sufficiency of her population, I have not heard it seriously doubted. I think that you, Mr. Chairman, [Mr. BOGGS,] made the statement, the other day on the floor, and that statement remains uncontradicted in any of the speeches that I have had the honor to listen to. These people, Mr. Chairman, come here with a constitution that, I suppose, no one will deny is republican in its form, and ask to be admitted. Now, sir, why should they not be admitted? What is the reason?

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman asks why Kansas should not be admitted? I will assign the reason why she should not be. It is that they ask us to give them power in this body in the election of a President of the United States, and in the Federal Government, in proportion to the number of their slaves, allowing three slaves in that Territory to equal one such man as he [Mr. MAYNARD] and I. Now, I am unwilling to surrender my own dignity in this way.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am very glad that the gentleman has mentioned that point; and probably I shall allude to it before I sit down. That is an old idea, which has been repeated again and again, and which has been suffered to pass unchallenged and uncontradicted, to my utter surprise and amazement.

But I was going on to speak of the reason why we are told Kansas should not be admitted under this constitution. The reason is because her constitution does—what? Establish slavery? Not a bit of it. It does not do that. But because it recognizes a property in slaves that are already there. Because it provides that these slaves shall not be emancipated, except on one of two conditions: either that the consent of the owner shall first be obtained, or that the pecuniary value of the slave shall be paid him in money; and that so long as slavery is recognized in Kansas, the emigrant who comes there shall be permitted to introduce the slaves which he actually and bona fide owns.

That, sir, is the reason why the Opposition on this side of the House insist that Kansas shall not be admitted into the Union under the Lecompton constitution.

But, sir, what are the pretexts which they set up? One is, that the convention which framed that constitution had no authority to frame a State constitution. The second is, that after they had framed the constitution, they did not submit it for ratification or rejection at the ballot-box. The third is, that the constitution in itself does not contain any provision by which it may be changed until 1864. The fourth is, that because in the election, under the convention which framed the constitution, held on the 21st of December, frauds intervened at the ballot-box.

Now, sir, I shall not attempt to discuss these various pretexts, or either of them. They have been discussed, ably and ingeniously discussed, for the last three months; and if the discussion has advanced one step since the first arguments which were made in the other end of the Capitol at the very outset of the session, I confess I have not been able to see it. The arguments have been varied; the phraseology has been changed; form and variety have been given to illustration, but the discussion stands to the logic of the mind exactly where it did after the first week or ten days of the session. And, sir, we might stand here and refine and discuss the question of the sovereignty of the people; whether that sovereignty is subject to be delegated; whether it is divisible or indivisible; whether it is complete or only partial; we might dwell here upon the various questions of political metaphysics to our dying day, and we would never arrive one step nearer a result that would be either conclusive or satisfactory. And what is the use of it? What does it all amount to? Other gentlemen may differ with me in opinion; I speak only for myself. I would bind no man to my opinion. I profess to bind no man to my opinions, but, sir, in my opinion, let these questions be discussed as ably as they may be, and decided either the one way or the other, and it will amount to nothing in settling the great point which we have before us for our ultimate decision. I know that a man who wants to pursue a particular course for reasons best known to himself, who does not like to give the true reason, will sometimes be very ingenious in assigning false reasons, untrue reasons, reasons, I mean, which are not his real reasons. I do not intend by this, or by any other remarks I shall make, to be offensive; I mean not to be offensive to any one, and I hope that every gentleman will understand me, that if in the heat of debate, I shall use any language that shall jar upon the feelings of any member of this House, I shall be ready to make all due reparation.

We may just as well come right up to the question. There is no use in beating about the bush. We have been told repeatedly by gentlemen on this side of the House, when pressed for a reply, that if every man, woman, and child, in Kansas, were in favor of admitting her into the Union as a slave State, they would resist it. This is the very last expression of sentiment we have heard on this floor, from the honorable gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FARNSWORTH,] who has just taken his seat, and who closed with an enunciation. I understood him to make an appeal to God—to say with solemn emphasis, "So help me God! I will never vote for the admission of another slave State into the Union." There, sir, is the ground we have to stand upon, the ground we have to contest, and we might as well come right up to the point like true soldiers, and like men meet it. "When Greek meets Greek then comes the tug of war." But, sir, they must meet upon the plains of Helles, upon the shores of the Hellespont, or the tug of war does not come.

Mr. Chairman, I might, if I chose, commend to my Democratic friends for their consideration—just here, I might show them and point to them as a warning—how their principles and their policy, which they have been for years inaugurating upon the country, and which have greatly tended to change the Government from a pure republic to a simple democracy, have now returned upon them to plague the inventors. This idea of submitting a constitution to the people for the popular vote, is only one of them—perhaps the least objectionable. I have no time to discuss the subject as I conceive it should be discussed; but when gentlemen rise here, and insist that it is necessary, to give validity to a constitution framed by a convention of the people that it shall first be submitted to the people at the ballot-box, for their ratification or rejection, and approved by them, they announce a doctrine that would have startled George Washington, James Madison, Alexander Hamilton, Roger Sherman, Benjamin Franklin, Rufus King, the Morrises, and Pinckney, and the other sages who framed our American Constitution. Those great men unanimously recommended that the Constitution of the United States should be submitted "to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its Legislature, for their assent and ratification." The idea of submitting their handiwork to the test of the ballot-box to give it vitality and validity did not occur to them. They did not deem it expedient even.

Before I proceed to discuss the great question before us, I beg to be indulged in a single suggestion with regard to the Lecompton constitution. There is one feature of that instrument which, permit me to say, meets my most cordial approbation; call it "Americanism," "Know Nothingism," or what you please. It provides that the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of that State shall be at least thirty years of age, and shall have been citizens of the United States for at least twenty years, to be eligible to office. And it furthermore provides that those who are entitled to vote shall be citizens of the United States above the age of twenty-one years, and shall have resided in the State one year. That, sir, is one of the principles which has ever been regarded as among the fundamental principles of the American party. Compare that with another constitution which we are called on to ratify. I mean the constitution of the Territory of Minnesota, the getting up of which I have learned, indirectly, was by frauds, in comparison with which the alleged Kansas frauds amount to comparatively little. That constitution, sir, provides that foreigners, unnaturalized, who have been twelve months in the United States, and four months in the State, shall be entitled, at the ballot-box, to the same privileges as a citizen born here, who has studied our Constitution and our institutions until he is presumed to know something about them. Indians, too, are permitted to vote, provided they put off the garments of savage life and put on broadcloth or jeans made up in the form of coat, vest, and pantaloons.

Mr. Chairman, I have said that this slavery question is the great question which we are considering. It is the practical issue. It is another form of the same old question which for many years has come up in one shape or another for the consideration of Congress; and although it has often been attempted to bid it "down," yet it will not down at our bidding; and we are told that if we admit Kansas under the Lecompton constitution that the agitation still will not stop. We are told with taunt and sneer and jeer that that shall not stop this agitation. Perhaps not; but do you think the agitation will stop if we refuse to admit her? Let the final vote in this House be a rejection of Kansas as a State under the Lecompton constitution, and it will go with lightning speed, upon a thousand wires, to every part of the North, and you will hear an answering echo rattling along upon the same wires: "We have triumphed; we have crushed out these tyrant slaveholders; we have got the slave-drivers under our feet"—appealing to Black Republicans, in terms the most impassioned and denunciatory, to rush on and to subjugate them. It may be that admitting Kansas with the Lecompton constitution may not still this unhallowed, fratricidal strife. I fear, indeed, and the times are ominous and portentous, that it will not have that effect; but if it is stopped, that is the only mode, in my opinion, by which it can be stopped for a long time to come. Refuse to admit Kansas, reject her, keep the question open, keep the subject of strife still before the people undecided, and I feel justified in saying that I know this unhappy contest will not cease. It will wax fiercer rather.

Now, what is this slavery agitation? It is not a thing of to-day. It is not a thing of the year past, or even of the age just gone by. We have had it for a long time. It originated before the adoption of our Federal Constitution, and it has continued ever since; and it has raged since, perhaps, with more violence than before. Under that instrument, which we all know is a compromise—an agreement which our fathers mutually entered into for themselves, their heirs, and their representatives forever; under the Constitution, slavery was made an element of political weakness in every State where it existed. And I come now to answer the idea which was thrown out, not for the first time, by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] I say that, under the Federal Constitution, slavery is an element of political weakness in the States where it exists.

Let me illustrate. We have had comparisons instituted here between the State of New York and the State of Virginia, between the State of Kentucky and the State of Ohio. Whether these comparisons were fair and just, I do not undertake to say; but, suppose I should go back into the history of your proud old State, Mr. Chairman, and institute an inquiry of another sort. The greatest product of a civilized government is its men, said Mr. Burke, when shedding eloquent tears over the grave of his only and much-loved son: "At this exigent moment the loss of a finished man cannot easily be supplied." I might point to the scroll of history, written so plain that we may all read, and say, "There is Virginia; look at her names. There, too, is Kentucky—glorious old Kentucky; and there are her names;" and leave you to point to the glorious sons of New York and Ohio, and array them, for I would not make any invidious comparisons.

Let me institute a comparison illustrative of the doctrines which I enunciated just now, between, I may say, the State of my youth and the State of my manhood; the noble old State where I had the honor—for I do esteem it an honor—to draw my first breath, and the glorious State where, I hope, in the providence of God, I shall be permitted to lay down what shall be left of my mortal remains—Massachusetts and Tennessee. It appears from the census of 1850, under which was made the apportionment by which we are now representing those States in the national Legislature, that Massachusetts has a population of less than one million, whereas Tennessee is shown by the same authority to have a population of more than one million. The precise numbers, it is not necessary to state for the purpose of the argument. On this floor, Tennessee, with a population of upwards of one million, is represented by ten members only, while Massachusetts, with a population of less than a million, is represented by eleven members. This inequality occurs under the provision of the Federal Constitution referred to by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] in the outset of my remarks in connection with an idea repeated here and elsewhere, I will not say how many times.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman allow me to make a remark?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not wish to be discourteous, and I hope I am not discourteous when I decline to yield the floor. Owing to an indolent habit, I have not reduced my remarks to writing, as is often done by other gentlemen, and which, I admit, may be the better mode. Therefore I hope, as my time is fast running out, that gentlemen will not interrupt me, unless the interruption is necessary. If I may "guess," my friend from Maine [Mr. FOSTER] was going to state, that of the population of Tennessee three hundred thousand, or more, are negro slaves.

Well, sir, let me ask how many of the people of Massachusetts that go to swell the numbers in the census tables are convicts in their penitentiary and in their prisons? How many of them are paupers? how many of them are foreigners, unnaturalized and unamericanized? Why, sir, in one school they have there—and that is a fact I would commend to the attention of those who are fond of dealing in comparative statistics—in one institution, the details of which I happen to have, a sort of juvenile penitentiary—a reform school they call it: I believe an excellent and most necessary institution for that State—they have six hundred and more bad boys, to be reformed. I suspect that, Mr. Chairman, is a greater number of graceless lads than you could find in all your State whom your civil authorities would deem it necessary to take away from their parents at that early age, and to shut them up in a reformatory institution, in order to keep them from becoming rogues when they grow up to be men. And these unfortunate children are a part of the population of the State, counted by the poll in the Federal enumeration? Why should we not reckon our negroes, as well as Massachusetts her convicts? But you say negroes do not vote. That has been true, in fact, in Tennessee, since 1834, when, by a change in our State constitution, the free negroes who had previously enjoyed the elective franchise, were excluded for the first time from the ballot-box. But what does that signify? How many persons in Massachusetts vote? The whole number amounts to some one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty thousand, out of a population of something less than a million. So that among the whole people, only one in five or six can vote; and that one voter, by a political necessity, governs the other four or five. I am aware there has been some objection made to that state of affairs by an interesting portion of her population; that her fair daughters—and they are very fair and learned to a degree—have often petitioned the Legislature, and have held conventions without count, insisting that things ought not so to be; that the old-fashioned mode of petticoat-government and certain lectures are not exactly suited to the progress and refinement of modern civilization; that they desire a little more authority—something more effective than persuasion—which, under the present state of political privileges, they do not enjoy. But at present, less than one fifth of the whole population do the voting, exercise all the political power. For the purpose of this discussion, it matters little who compose the other four fifths, whether men, women, or children; criminals or the virtuous; black or white; freemen or slaves. They are not governors, they are the governed.

What else? We are told that our slaves are not people, not population at all; that they are mere property. "Why," they say to us, "would you let our property vote—our oxen, our horses, our mules?"—or to use an illustration which I would not venture upon in this presence, except that I borrow it from a distinguished son of Massachusetts, afterwards a distinguished citizen of Pennsylvania, Benjamin Franklin—"would you allow our 'jackasses' to vote?" meaning the four-footed ones, of course.

That brings us exactly to the point of practical difference upon this subject between the people of the North and the people of the South. The people of the South hold the slave to be a person. Northern men say he is merely property, a chattel, and nothing more. We were told the other day by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] that he could not admit this "guilty fantasy"—I think that was his expression—of property in man. My dear sir, where do you get that idea from? No property in human beings? Do you state that as a proposition of law, or an assertion of fact that can be maintained? What is property? What do we mean by it? Property, proprietas—what is it?

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Tennessee, I presume, refers to me. The gentleman asks me whence I get my authority for saying as I did say on this floor, that there could be no property in man; and the pretense of property in man was an atrocity, a wild and guilty fantasy. I am surprised that the gentleman should put that question. I tell the gentleman, in the first place, that I feel perfectly confident that the gentleman's own immortal spirit bears witness, in spite of his logic to the contrary, to the truth of the assertion that there can be no property in man; that his right to life and liberty is inherent and imperishable; therefore, I put the question to the gentleman, can he himself be rightfully reduced to a chattel and sold as a chattel? Can his wife be rightfully reduced to a chattel and sold as a chattel? Can his child be rightfully reduced to a chattel and sold as a chattel? Answer me that.

Mr. MAYNARD. It is that same immortal principle alluded to by the gentleman—the unanswerable logic of personal conviction—upon which I was proceeding to predicate my argument. But before doing so, I submit to his better judgment that it is, to say the very least of it, in questionable taste for a member standing here to put forth his particular opinions, then to throw them into the face of another, who, by position, if not otherwise, is his peer as long as he stands upon this floor, and cry "answer me that;" as if our opinions and convictions were not entitled each to the same respect. I assure the gentleman his question is not difficult to answer. I am happy to answer it.

I was proceeding to ask what property is. Why, sir, it is the peculiar right which one man has in some person or thing, paramount to, and to the exclusion of, anybody else. That is the idea, if not the definition of property. It is the right peculiar to myself, exclusive of all others, by which I hold my farm; the right by which I hold my horse. It is the right by which I hold the very clothing I wear as my protection. And, sir, I ask the gentleman from Ohio if he has not a property in his own wife? Has he not a property in his own child? has he not a property, as a guardian, in his own ward? has he not, as a master, a property in his own apprentice, which the law will protect, as well in his own State as in every other State in the civilized world? I imagine he thinks he has. Property in slaves a solecism! a guilty fantasy! Property in man a principle which you appeal to my immortal spirit to contradict! Sir, I have stated that, after all, the great difference between the people of the North and the people of the South, was in the mode of looking at the status of the negro, whether, in hiring a slave, he is not to be regarded as a person.

I am aware that anything I might say upon this point would probably be attributed to the heat of argument, to the pressure of circumstances, and to the force of this particular occasion, if it did not expose me to insinuations equally ungenerous and unfounded. I hold in my hand a legal decision made not long ago by one of the best of men, slaveholder though he be, a man candid and conscientious in his convictions, cool, calm, and deliberative in his judgment—Nathan Green—made when he adorned the bench of the supreme court of Tennessee, and announcing the opinion of the entire court. The question presented to their consideration was this—exactly the one I am now considering: whether a slave be a person, and as such can be a legatee and take under a will? Hear what he says on the subject, announcing, so far as the highest legal authority of my own State is concerned, the view that is entertained on this identical question:

"But we are met with the objection that none but free persons have a right to sue, and that the persons of color in this case are still slaves. A slave is not in the condition of a horse or an ox. His liberty is restrained, it is true, and his owner controls his actions and claims his services. But he is made after the image of the Creator. He has mental capacities, and an immortal principle in his nature, that constitute him equal to his owner, but for the accidental position in which fortune has placed him. The owner has acquired conventional right to him, but the laws under which he is held as a slave, have not and cannot extinguish his high-born nature, nor deprive him of many rights inherent in man. Thus, while he is a slave, he can make a contract for his freedom which our laws recognize, and he can take a bequest of his freedom, and by the same will he can take personal or real estate."—Ford vs. Ford, 7 Hump., 94.

Sir, I drop that portion of the argument. Such, I have attempted to show, is the effect of this provision in the Constitution of the United States; that by reason of it, the people of the free States have been enabled to encroach upon the southern or slave States, and that with the continual cry of "slave power," "property representation." This argument, predicated upon the "slave-power" idea, was thrown in my teeth at the very outset of my remarks by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS,] as though it was wholly unanswerable. And just in this connection, sir, for I may be permitted to refer to a speech which the venerable gentleman—venerable from his age, I mean—made on this subject a few days ago. I commend it to his further consideration; and I ask him to say whether he would, coolly and deliberately—for I know he is subject to undue excitement—approaching, as he is, almost to the verge of the other world, repeat it. I ask him to say whether, as he expects the solemn court, which I hope may be still remote—for I mean something more than mere compliment when I say to him, or to any other aged man, serius in calum redeas—I ask him to say whether he would ratify or approve it? He is denouncing the idea of property in man as rank infidelity, and says:

"Could I hope that my remarks would meet the eye of British ministers, I would in an especial manner invoke their official influence against this infidelity. I would beseech them not more to sanction, by their action, that blasphemy which seeks to transform the image of God into property; which degrades man, with his undying aspirations, his eternal destiny, to the level of the brute."

My God! has it come to this, that the oldest member honored with a place in this House, from which the lightest whisper is carried on the wings of the wind to that autocratic, overpowering, unfeeling domination, should utter such language?—such fearful invocation upon the most determined foe we have ever had?

Does he in his place call on the British power to crush out and put down the sons of the men who fought for his country's deliverance from the same power, at Yorktown, at Camden, at Eutaw, at King's Mountain, and who resisted that same British power at New Orleans, ay, the sons of the men who in former times, when the gentleman's own Western Reserve was in peril and in trouble, went from their distant homes, and resisted the same British power, aided, as it was, by the savage foe, to protect the settlements of his now flourishing State? Has it come to this?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him—

Mr. MAYNARD. I prefer that the gentleman should hear me a little further, before he undertakes to answer. Sir, is that all? Not only does he commend us to the tender mercies of that hateful Power—and I regret that he should have had some little pretext for the utterance of such a sentiment, in something said a few days since, as I would fain hope in the excitement of debate, by a gentleman on the other side of the Hall [Mr. SHORTER]—but he goes further, and says:

"I would also warn the Spanish Crown and other continental Powers, that our present Executive is seeking, by all the various means and arts of diplomacy, to detach Cuba from its allegiance, to annex it to the United States, in order to increase the influence of the slave power, and add strength to this American infidelity."

"I hope and trust that this conspiracy may be defeated; that all Christian Governments may exert their power against the further extension of this scourge of our race."

Sir, in history there have been two aged men, who have been conspicuous. One, we are told, sat day after day and year after year in the Roman Senate; and when called upon to speak, all that he said was "Delenda est Carthago." That is not the speech which my compeer from Ohio indulges in. No, no, no! He is not speaking of a foreign Power. He is not speaking of the enemies of his country. It is not Carthage, hated and feared, which he would destroy. No, no, no! There was another venerable man—venerable for his years—the jabbering, jibing old infidel of Terney, whose one speech was aimed at the Holy One, under whom we all hope for salvation—"Crush the wretch!" "Crush the wretch!" And, sir, I fear, I fear—I hope not, I will not believe—that "crush the wretch!" will ever be the exclamation of any who may ever come to have a place here. "Wretch!"—word of baleful omen, which should include the loved ones whom you and I have left in our far-away homes. What mean these things? I am speaking to gray hairs. I bow down to age, and do it reverence. But let me appeal to the gentleman, in a spirit of kindness, and say to him, "do not, although you bring your own neighbors, your own Black Republican hosts, to make war upon us—do not, do not, do not, I beg of you, invoke upon us British power or the Spanish inquisition!"

I would be glad to have gone a little into the history of the slavery agitation, to show how it sprung up in this country, and to show how it had its origin in a faction in the North; then, as now, actuated by hatred to the South, and everything southern, from the time when, during the revolutionary war, it tried to supplant Washington in his high command; how it attempted to prevent the formation and adoption of the American Constitution; how, in 1803, when we acquired Louisiana, it stated in this House that it was a cause sufficient to dissolve the allegiance of the States to the Federal Government; and that while it was the privilege of all, it was the duty of some, to go out peaceably if they could, forcibly if they must; how, when we were engaged in another war, with the same British power, they met in convention at Hartford, in that odorous land of the nutmeg and the onion; and how, worse than that, they hoisted blue-lights at New London, that this same deadly enemy might know where to strike us; how, in 1820, they resisted the admission of Missouri into the Union, for the simple and sole reason that they now resist the admission of Kansas; how they flooded this floor with petition after petition, for the most absurd and impracticable objects, apparently for the purpose only of aggravating and annoying the South; how they continued this aggressive and annoying system of policy until 1850, when we believed that the laws then passed were, in the language of a gentleman then representing a southern State, "a finality in their totality." And then I would like to have reminded our Democratic friends how, when we had got the snake scotched but not killed, at the commencement of the Thirty-Third Congress, now four years ago, in every department of the Government they held the reins in their hands, wielding a power deemed irresistible; they committed what, in politics, is said to be worse than a crime—a blunder—which again brought up the slavery agitation in a form more fierce and rampant than ever before.

Mr. Chairman, you know that one of the institutions peculiar to the South is the yellow-jacket, a very irritable little insect, whose nest, with the boys, is a practical noli-me-tangere. Sir, the boy who would deliberately put his finger into a yellow-jacket's nest might be admired as a model of prudence and sound discretion in comparison with the politician who would stir up the abolition element in our political affairs.

But, sir, I have not time to dwell upon any of these matters. I would like, if I had time, to follow that same element, this same abolition fury, for it is such, through all its ramifications in the Kansas troubles; I would like to follow it in the form of grave and learned professors, in the form of reverend clergymen—ay, sir, in the form of lovely woman; sending to that troubled land emigrants from public meetings, armed with the rifle in one hand, and, for a counterpoise, a Bible in the other. I would have liked to have shown, if I had had the time, how those rifles were used for the murder of some of my own neighbors, people who were not slaveholders—and there is a gentleman now in my eye, who knows very well to whom I allude—people who went into Kansas because they were poor, with the hope of providing for their children a condition better than their own. These men, I say, were shot down, shot down by free-State men, decoyed from their beds at the hour of midnight, under false and wicked pretenses—not only were their lives taken, but their bodies mutilated and mangled, in a manner that would have disgraced a troop of sepoys. And yet, the Administration is censured and denounced for sending an army into Kansas to preserve the peace!

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] the other day, if I understood him, took the ground that the army was sent there in violation of law, and that the people would have been justified in levying war upon them and driving them out by force.

I might pass on, and if I had time I would be glad to do so, until we come down to the very latest act in this great drama of fanaticism—an act which has just closed in that same State to which I have referred—the State of Massachusetts—and of which the slower progress of the mails has yet failed, I believe, to bring us the intelligence which has reached us by a shorter mode of transmission. I refer, sir, to the removal from the office of judge of the probate court of the county of Suffolk, in that State, of Edward Greely Loring. The mere removal of the man is a matter of little consequence. We see men go out of office every day without much, if any, feeling. When at the commencement of the session the little page boys were sent home to their widowed mothers under the stress of party discipline, I confess that my sympathies were affected tenfold more deeply than by the removal of this gentleman, who is known to me only in his public character. But the cause for which he was removed is matter of higher consideration, matter which it concerns us to notice. What is that cause? That he has been unfaithful in the exercise of his office? That widows and orphans have suffered under his administration of the affairs of his court? Not at all; not at all. But because, some four, five, or six years ago, he assisted, in the character of a commissioner of the United States, under the act of Congress known as the fugitive slave law, in restoring to a gentleman in Virginia a slave who had escaped and taken refuge in Massachusetts.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to correct him?

Mr. MAYNARD. My time is nearly exhausted.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I wish to correct a statement made by the gentleman.

Mr. MAYNARD. My time is nearly out and I must go on. I am very sorry indeed to seem even to be disobliging. I am not so. I wish I had time to hear all the gentleman has to say. If the removal of Judge Loring is susceptible of explanation I would be glad that it should be explained, but I cannot yield for that purpose now.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. I wish to correct him as to a point of fact.

Mr. MAYNARD. I cannot yield.

Mr. HALL, of Massachusetts. Judge Loring was removed for a violation of a State law.

Mr. MAYNARD. The State of Massachusetts has, through all the departments of her government, her Legislature, and her chief Executive, decided that the citizens of a slave State shall not have their constitutional rights upon the soil of Massachusetts. I care very little about that. I presume that there are few people of the South who care to go into Massachusetts, but I fear this is going to result in retaliation from the South. I fear it.

I have remarked privately to gentlemen who represent that State upon this floor, and I tell them publicly now, that before they are aware of it they may find their State out of the Union. The people of Massachusetts do not, like the people of the South, stay at home to attend to their business. The people of the South, when they go abroad, go for pleasure, rarely for business. The people of Massachusetts, on the contrary, are all over the world. They have business, and much business, in the South. How easy would it be for the people of the different southern States, as one of them has proposed to do, to pass laws disfranchising the citizens of Massachusetts, so that they should have no locus standi in curia, no legal remedy for the protection either of life or property; so that no Massachusetts vessel should be protected from pillage if she landed upon the southern coast by accident or otherwise; so that not a solitary article of Massachusetts manufacture should be sold there? I might go on and show that these measures of retaliation are practicable; that they can be done. But I should be sorry to see when they are done.

You may say that such a policy would be unwise, that it is impolitic and unconstitutional. I would be very sorry—and I say it here without hesitation—to see such a policy adopted, and I would resist it as unwise and injudicious. But, sir, I know very well that there are prominent men who differ from me in the matter of policy and the matter of propriety. These things, too, never stop with the act itself. There is always a result and a consequence which you cannot trammel up, which I, as a citizen of our common country, would deprecate and deplore. I am one of those who have no belief in a dissolution of the Union as a remedy for the evils under which we suffer. In my judgment, it is much wiser to —“bear those ills we have,

Than fly to others that we know not of.”

Mr. WALDRON. I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the discussion on the Lecompton constitution has been prolonged in this Hall until it has, to a certain extent, lost novelty and interest; and, if I consulted only my own feelings, I should content myself with a silent vote on the proposition which the President's message brings to our notice; but the vote that I cast here is the expression of men with whom this question is one of deep and engrossing interest; and, in justice to them, I would avow publicly the views and convictions which control that vote.

The special message of the President, and the constitution which it indorses, are documents in every respect worthy of each other. An instrument like this Lecompton contrivance ought to be accompanied by exactly such a message. There has been exhibited in the construction of that instrument a shameless disregard of even the appearances of honesty, which is paralleled only by the bold and reckless statements of the message. There has been in every movement of the framers of that constitution a cool and wanton violation of popular rights, which is appropriately followed up by a deliberate perversion of truth, and reckless suppression of facts. The conspirators at Lecompton treated the citizens of the Territory as slaves, and the Executive of the nation denounces them as rebels. It was not enough that these men should suffer wrongs at the hand of usurped authority, but there must be added to them opprobrium, accusation, and insult; and the Executive now steps in, so that no part is left unacted in this programme of outrage. There is symmetry in the design, as well as harmony in the execution. No trifling matters of form or fact are allowed to interfere where congenial tastes and a common purpose draw men together; and Buchanan and Calhoun strike hands in mutual admiration of each other's work.

The citizens of this broad land will peruse this message with varied emotions. A few will exult over it with exceeding joy. The men who indorsed its author in the last canvass as “one who had never, by vote, or speech, or act, pained the most sensitive southern heart,” will be delighted with it; for it establishes their political sagacity beyond doubt, and affords them renewed evidence that their confidence has not been misplaced. There are others who will join with them in admiration of its ability. The armed men who invaded Kansas in 1855, and elected, over the heads of its people, a Territorial Legislature, will be delighted at the earnestness with which the President rebukes the free-State men for attempting to establish a government by force; and they will breathe freer and easier when they find that there is at the head of affairs an officer who is so conscientiously the advocate of peaceful and legitimate suffrage. The President will also have his admirers among the past legislators of that Territory—the men who were kind enough to leave Missouri at the call of their neighbors, and take the interests of Kansas under their guardianship. These men will be horrified, in common with the President, at the usurpation which he charges upon the free-State men—the usurpation of men who would govern themselves! Then there are the disinterested patriots in that Territory, who manufacture poll-lists out of Cincinnati Directories. How sensibly will they appreciate the denunciations of fraud that are hurled by the President at the heads of the Topekaites, and how gallantly are they vindicated against the calumnies of their slanderers! And then, last of all, there are the southern apostles, who, under the lead of Atchison and Titus, undertook missionary labor in that Territory. With what holy unction will they roll their eyes heavenward, when they read the concluding paragraphs of this message, where the President so sincerely recognizes his obligations to his conscience and his Maker.

To these invaders and usurpers, Mr. Chairman, this message affords “aid and comfort,” with them it will find much favor; but there are others in the Democratic household who will not so readily subscribe to its reasoning and conclusions. There were, in 1856, men at the North who were so fervently devoted to the interests of freedom that they were thrown into spasms at the sight of “Dunn's bill”—men who denied with an air of virtuous indignation that slavery had a shadow of right in Kansas, or could acquire it without the consent of its people. What are these men now told by the President for whom they voted? Why that Kansas is just as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina, made so by the Federal Constitution and despite the wishes of its people; and this doctrine is now the standard of Democratic faith; the test of Democratic orthodoxy! And, then, there are the innocent mortals at the North who voted for Mr. Buchanan because they wanted to make Kansas a free State—the men who marched under the banner of “Buchanan and Breckinridge,” and kept step to the music of “Free Kansas.” What an air of injured innocence and misplaced confidence will these men assume when they read this message, abounding, as it does, in doctrines which forge and fasten upon the Territories the fetters of oppression. Well may these men ask, is this the feast to which we were invited? Is this the Democracy of which we were the advocates? Why, Mr. Chairman, the Democrats of my State were told during the last canvass that the nomination of James Buchanan was a virtual rebuke of the official conduct of Franklin Pierce; and they were assured that the Cincinnati convention had not indorsed his administration. When we prophesied that the election of James Buchanan would result in the very condition of things that we to-day witness, the answer was, that the Republicans were the men who by their acts endangered the cause of freedom in Kansas, and that the Democrats were the men to be relied on to save it for free men and free institutions.

A Democratic paper (the Adrian Watchtower) published during that canvass, and which I now hold in my hand, charges the Republicans as follows:

“To you belongs the honor of voting to extend over free territory the institution of American slavery, for the first time in the history of our country.”

“Do not attempt to dodge the responsibility and the glory! They are yours, and yours alone.”

And the same paper informs its readers that—
“If Kansas should now come into the Confederacy as a free State, its settlers may thank the United States Senate for the blessing; not the Republicans in the House, who voted in solid phalanx for Dunn's slavery bill.”

And at another time, in noticing the issues involved in the contest between my honorable opponent and myself for a seat on this floor, it warns its readers “that a vote for John S. Barry is a vote for freedom in Kansas, and a vote for Henry Waldron is a vote for slavery in Kansas.”

I also hold in my hand a copy of the National Democrat, a paper which carries at mast-head the names of Buchanan and Breckinridge, and immediately under them the following advertisements:

“Keep it before the people, that we will give the editors of the Dowagiac Tribune, or any other person, one hundred dollars, if they will show us a resolution in the Cincinnati platform indorsing the Administration of Franklin Pierce. We will also give one hundred dollars to any person who will show us a resolution, or even a sentence, in the Cincinnati platform, from which it may be inferred that the Democratic party is in favor of the extension of slavery.”

“Keep it before the people, that, at the last session of Congress, the Republicans voted to extend slavery into Kansas and Nebraska until 1858; the Democrats voted against the measure. The House passed the bill; the Senate defeated it. Here are the acts of the two parties—not mere empty professions.”

It was by such representations as these that votes were secured for James Buchanan. I might say that the men who cast them were cheated with their eyes open, and that they were duped no worse than they deserved to be; but I will not unnecessarily wound their tender sensibilities in this day of their humiliation; I leave them to settle with their betrayers, if any self-respect is left them, or submit to the swindle, if their manhood is “crushed out.” It is my purpose to address myself for a few moments to the question which this message introduces to our attention—the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

The Constitution of the United States declares that Congress may admit new States into the Union. The language used implies the exercise of a discretion on the part of Congress; not a discretion to be exercised arbitrarily and recklessly, without reason or judgment, but a discretion in accordance with well-settled rules and well-defined principles. In determining the question of admission, there are three considerations involved which demand the scrutiny of the national Congress. First. Does the Territory present itself with proper boundaries and the requisite population? Second. Are the people of the Territory satisfied with the constitution under which admission is asked? And lastly. Is that constitution republican in its provisions? I take it that these three questions are pertinent to the issue; that they cover the entire ground, and determine, by the facts they elicit, our duty in the premises. I pass by the first of these inquiries with the simple statement, that no question is raised, here or elsewhere, on the score of population or boundaries. It is conceded that the Territory of Kansas contains a population sufficient to bear the burdens of a State government at home, and to entitle it to its representative votes in this Capitol. In fact, a bill passed this branch of the national Congress nearly two years ago, admitting it into the Union as a State; and, although bitterly assailed and contested at the time, yet it was on other grounds than that which I have indicated; and, since the passage of that act, the steady current of immigration has thrown into that Territory thousands more of our fellow-citizens.

The second inquiry that commends itself to the attention of the American Congress is this: Are the citizens of Kansas content with the constitution that is here presented in their name? Is it their own free offering and the untrammelled expression of their will? This is a most material inquiry. In the determination of it, it becomes us to examine all the facts and circumstances that surround the inception, the framing, and the indorsing of this instrument, so that we may decide how far it meets with popular sanction and approval. For I take it for granted that no Congress should force into the Union a State with a constitution that its citizens abhorred and repudiated. I take it that such an act is an act of despotism, at war with the spirit of our institutions, and repugnant to every republican impulse. It is a most pertinent inquiry, therefore, how far this Lecompton constitution embodies and expresses the sentiments of the people over whom it is attempted to be ordained, and it requires the rehearsal of a few facts only to show most clearly that it was conceived in sin, born in iniquity, nursed in fraud, and can only reach the maturity of manhood in violation of every principle of justice, honor, and good faith.

It is not necessary here to go back to the organization of this Territory and note, step by step, the successive outrages and usurpations that stain its history. I shall only take time to recur to the proceedings more immediately connected with the framing and pretended ratification of this Lecompton constitution. I commence at the 19th day of February last; when we find a Territorial Legislature in session, claiming to exercise authority—a Legislature which owed its existence to bare-faced outrage and fraud—a band of usurpers, whose authority never was recognized out of sight of your soldiers. This bogus Legislature passes a law providing for a constitutional convention to be held on the first Monday of September, and the election of its delegates on the first Monday in June. The President of the United States, in his anxiety to indorse the action of a usurping Legislature, and to smooth the passage of another slave State into the Confederacy, tells the country, in his annual message, that this enabling act of the Territorial Legislature "was in the main, just and fair; and it is to be regretted that all the qualified voters had not registered themselves, and voted under its provisions." He states moreover, that "a large proportion of the citizens of Kansas did not think proper to register their names, and to vote at the election for delegates; but an opportunity to do this having been fairly afforded, their refusal to avail themselves of their right could in no manner affect the legality of the convention."

Now, Mr. Chairman, against these bold statements of the Executive, I place testimony that cannot well be gainsayed. I give the statements of the gentlemen who were sent there by the Administration as executive officers of that Territory—men whose antecedents and associations commended them to the Administration as fast friends of that peculiar institution which it is the province of the Democracy in these latter days to cherish. Governor Walker says:

"That [the Lecompton] convention had vital, not technical defects, in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken, and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters."

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties in the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention." * * * "Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for, wherever they endeavored by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect, occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention."

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no registry; and not a solitary vote was given or could be given for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one-tenth of the present voters in Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent."

And Secretary Stanton, a pro-slavery Democrat, confirms this statement in the following extract:

"The census therein provided for was imperfectly obtained from an unwilling people in nineteen counties of the Territory; while in the remaining counties, being also nineteen in number, from various causes, no attempt was made to comply with the law. In some instances people and officers were alike averse to the proceedings; in others, the officers neglected or refused to act; and in some there was but a small population and no efficient organization enabling the people to secure a representation in the convention."

In investigating, therefore, the regularity and fairness of this convention, we find that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four there was no census, and in fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and consequently there could not be a vote in them for delegates to the convention; and it appears moreover that this failure to take a census or make a registry, disfranchising as it did a majority of the counties, was chargeable to the territorial officers; men who were the creatures of this usurping authority, and who denied the people of these counties the privilege of an election, because that election would result contrary to the wishes of the conspirators who were plotting and scheming to defeat a fair expression of the popular will. Nor does this record of wrong stop here. The citizens of one county, whose officers had refused to make a registry, met and elected two delegates to the convention, being the number to which they were fairly entitled, and when these delegates present themselves, they are rejected by the convention because they were not elected under the territorial law. And yet, in defiance of these facts, which are blazoned forth to the scrutiny of an intelligent people, in the face of the evident truth that the failure of these men to vote was no fault of their own, we have the President of the United States assuring us that an opportunity to vote has been fairly afforded, and that it is to be regretted that all qualified voters had not registered themselves, and done so. To what humiliating expedients do not the necessities of slavery drive its instruments, when a Chief Executive of the nation is compelled to resort to so flagrant a misstatement of facts?

So much, Mr. Chairman, for the manner in which this Lecompton constitution was instituted and organized. Instead of representing the sovereignty of the people it is but the representative of an insignificant faction; instead of being the exponent of the popular will, it has been created in flagrant disregard and defiance of the popular sentiment of the Territory. It has only been able to hold its sessions with Federal bayonets around it to protect it from an outraged and exasperated people; and yet this body of men is indorsed by an Administration and a party that professes to subscribe to the doctrine that the people of a Territory are free to form and regulate their own institutions!

And now, let us pass from the organization of this convention to its action. It assembles in Lecompton; it frames a constitution; and here another fraud is invoked to subserve the purposes of the conspirators against freedom. The people of the Territory had a pledge in the organic act, that they should determine for themselves the character of the institutions under which they were to live—a pledge which the men who sustained the act were bound in good faith to keep. Then they had been assured in the name of the Democracy at Cincinnati, that the right to form a constitution rested with the people of the Territory, "acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents." And at a still later date the President of the United States, in his inaugural, says:

"It is the imperative and indispensable duty of the Government of the United States to secure every resident inhabitant the free and independent expression of his opinion by his vote. This sacred right of each individual must be preserved."

And, still later, the Governor of the Territory, speaking for the President and Cabinet, assures them that they shall be protected in the right of voting for or against the instrument, and that the popular will shall not be defeated by fraud or violence.

And then John Calhoun and his colleagues, when candidates for seats in that convention, pledged themselves that the constitution to be framed shall be submitted to every bona fide actual citizen of Kansas, "in order that the said constitution may be adopted or rejected by the actual settlers of the Territory, as the majority of voters shall decide." Here were pledges and assurances made and renewed to the people of that Territory, that they should have the privilege of ratifying or rejecting the instrument that was framed by the convention. How were those pledges redeemed? Was this constitution submitted by the convention to the popular judgment? Never; the submission under the schedule was a most transparent fraud and swindle. It provided that the resident might vote "constitution with slavery" or "constitution with no slavery;" but for the constitution he must vote in any event. No matter how obnoxious the provisions of that instrument may be to him, he cannot vote against it. He cannot express his dissent on any question of finance, or taxation, or schools, or banking, or the numerous questions that enter into State policy and politics. In reference to all those matters, he must take this instrument just as it came from the hands of its framers. He cannot even vote to make a free State of Kansas, by a ballot for the "constitution with no slavery," for the schedule provides that if the votes for the "constitution with no slavery" prevail, then "slavery shall no longer exist in the State of Kansas, except"—now mark the words—"except that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with." In other words, the slaveholders in the Territory were made secure in the right to their slaves and their increase forever; and the only effect of a vote for the "constitution with no slavery" was to determine the future source of supply, namely: that it shall be by increase of the slaves within, and not by importation of slaves from without. As has been well remarked, the only question submitted was whether Kansas should be a slave State with the slave trade, or a slave State without the slave trade.

Such was the submission of the slavery question—a mockery and an insult. It gave no power to the people of the Territory to prohibit African slavery; but it fastened it upon them for all time to come. It bound them hand and foot, and placed them at the feet of Calhoun and his confederates. And yet the President adds insult to injury by telling them and us, that at that election every citizen had "an opportunity of expressing his opinion, by his vote, whether Kansas shall be received into the Union with or without slavery"—a statement which the facts show to be utterly without apology or excuse.

But passing from the form of the submission, let us look at the manner. The president of the convention, John Calhoun, appointed three commissioners for each county. These commissioners established precincts for voting in each county, as they deemed proper, and selected inspectors of election for the several precincts—then the returns were to be made to this John Calhoun, who determines the result. Sir, when this scheme was devised for holding an election, it needed no prophet to foretell the result. It was already a foregone conclusion. The history of Kansas elections, under the control of those men, had been a history of villainous fraud, unknown before in the experience of the Republic, and this election was no exception to the rule. The creatures whom John Calhoun placed as inspectors at the Oxford precinct returned thirteen hundred votes for the "constitution with slavery," when a census, subsequently taken, establishes the fact that there were only forty-two white male inhabitants in the township over twenty-one years of age. His inspectors at Shawnee returned over one thousand votes for the "constitution with slavery," when the same census shows but one hundred and fifteen male inhabitants of legal age in the township; and the return from Kickapoo was likewise threefold the actual number of its legitimate voters; and by such unblushing frauds a vote of some six thousand has been returned for the "constitution with slavery"—a vote more than double the real pro-slavery strength of the Territory.

Nor did these men content themselves with retaining in their own hands the entire machinery and control of this election, but they prescribed a test oath for the express purpose of repelling free-State voters. The ninth section of the schedule provides that—

"Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election, upon said constitution, shall be challenged to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws."

Yes, sir, the man who went to the polls to deposit his ballot is met by an oath that he will support this constitution, under the pains and penalties of perjury. He must make an unconditional surrender at the very outset. He must submit to the humiliation of bowing down before his oppressors, and calling Heaven to witness that he recognizes, acknowledges, and will support, the work of their hands. He may be a man whose instincts and impulses are all on the side of freedom and humanity, but before he can vote, he must swear fealty to an instrument which declares the right of a slaveholder to be inviolable, and the institution of slavery to be before and higher than any constitutional sanction. All this must he do, in defiance of his own conscientious convictions of right, or stand back from the ballot-box. There was no freedom of suffrage there, except for such men as were willing to pledge themselves by an oath that they would maintain, uphold, and defend a system that is founded on piracy and maintained by force. Sir, the free State men of Kansas were disfranchised by this test; they could not vote under it, and they did not.

But we are not left in the dark as to the will of the people of Kansas in reference to this question. An election was held on the 4th of January, by authority of the Territorial Legislature and its Governor, for the purpose of ascertaining the sentiment of its citizens. Its result has been announced over the hand of the Governor. It shows a majority of ten thousand votes against this Lecompton constitution. It was an indication of public sentiment, clear, distinct, and decisive—one that no man can deny or evade. It stamps the seal of popular condemnation on this document. It brands it as a swindle that has escaped from the Territory to deceive with lying pretenses, and counterfeit with brazen arrogance.

And now, Mr. Chairman, I ask, are members of the American Congress ready to become actors and participants in this scheme? Are they, in the noonday of the nineteenth century, and with the flag of the free floating above their heads, willing to commit this great crime against justice and right? Are they, with the impulses of manhood in their hearts and the obligations of official duty upon their consciences, ready to become parties to this trickery and fraud? Will they force upon an unwilling, a protesting people, a constitution that is rank with usurpation and rotten with the leprosy of falsehood and fraud? I will not yet believe that an American Congress will lend itself to such despotism, or stoop to such degradation.

I now reach the last point of inquiry: is this Lecompton constitution republican in its provisions? Let me read one of them. The first section of the seventh article declares:

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction; and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable, as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Now, I assert that a constitution indorsing and avowing such a principle is not a republican constitution, in any true signification of the word. I deny that the institution of slavery is founded on natural right, or that it has a sanction before and above any constitutional law. It is a monstrous doctrine, contravening every fundamental principle of our Government, and falsifying the testimony of the living and the dead.

Washington, when he took his farewell of earth, left his recorded opinion of slavery as a moral and political wrong. Jefferson denounced "the whole commerce between master and slave" as "a continual exercise of the most unrelenting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other;" and asked, emphatically—

"With what execration should the statesman be loaded, who, permitting one half of the citizens thus to trample on the rights of the other, transforms those into despoils and these into enemies, destroys the morals of the one part and the amor patriæ of the other! Can the liberties of a nation be thought secure, when we have removed their only firm basis, a conviction, in the minds of the people, that these liberties are the gift of God? that they are not violated but by His wrath? Indeed, I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just, and His justice cannot sleep forever."

And even southern courts stamp this doctrine of the Lecompton constitution as false; they declare that slavery is an unnatural right, existing only by virtue of local laws. It was decided, in the State of Mississippi, (see Walker's Reports, 86,) that—

"The right of the master exists not by force of the law of nature or of nations, but by virtue only of the positive law of the State."

In the same State, the court say, (Walker's Reports, 42:)

"Slavery is condemned by reason and the laws of nature. It exists and can only exist through municipal regulation."

A Kentucky court, in the case of Rankin vs. Lydia, (2 Marshall's Reports,) declare that slavery is "A right existing by positive law, of a municipal character, without foundation in the law of nature or the unwritten and common law."

I place by the side of this Lecompton instrument the Constitution of our fathers—a Constitution that comes down to us as a sacred legacy from the sages of the Revolution. The men who framed it avowed it to be their object to establish justice and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and their posterity. That Constitution you and I have sworn to support. It is a standard by which we can determine the political doctrines of a better day; and when we contrast them with those of the present, we have startling evidence of our downward progress. It is a significant fact that the framers of the Federal Constitution excluded even words that would imply an idea of property in man; while this Lecompton contrivance indorses property in man as founded on good policy and natural right!

Sir, I will never recognize the doctrine that this Lecompton constitution teaches, or the principles that it avows. If it had received the sanction of every citizen of the Territory of Kansas, it would make no difference with my vote; for a constitution which places slavery over and above law, is a constitution which no community or people have a right to make; and, standing here by virtue of the suffrages of seventeen thousand free-men, and in their name, I declare that I will never, by my vote, recognize any extension of slavery outside of the limits where State sovereignty now protects it. The motto of my people is, "No more slave States." Their position is unequivocally on the side of free labor and free institutions. They protest against the extension, by the influence of this Government, of a system which inevitably degrades the white laborer, and which gives to the owner of five slaves political power equal to that of four of our own free electors. So far as that unfair advantage exists under the compromises of the Federal Constitution, they yield to it; but they go not an inch beyond. They yield to no men in loyalty to the Union and allegiance to the Constitution, which is our common bond; but they insist that the power of that Union shall not be prostituted in behalf of an unhallowed system that is at war with the teachings of patriotism and the lessons of humanity—a system that contains the elements of weakness and the seeds of disunion. They protest against a perversion of the plain principles of the Constitution to shield a great social and political evil—an evil that is fatal to economy, industry, and liberty. They deny the new interpretations which the necessities of slavery place upon our organic law, and the false theories that they ingraft upon our judicial decisions. They abide by the precedents of the past and the faith of their fathers. They are not yet prepared to believe that civilization and freedom are failures, and only slavery and oppression possible upon the earth; but they do know that but one hope remains, one remedy is left, and that is the remedy of the ballot—wresting power from the hands of the slave Democracy, and vesting it with those whose political creed is founded on the eternal principles of humanity and justice.

You may talk to these men about secession, disunion, and dissolution. If you use such language for purposes of intimidation, then their answer is the laugh of scorn. Your threats of a divided Confederacy pass by them like the idle wind. They realize that this Union is worth much more to you than it is to them; and that it is worth too much to every section, it is too dear to every interest, to suffer any damage when it is administered in accordance with the high purposes of its founders. They realize that the strength and perpetuity of this Union rest in a faithful adherence to the eternal principles of liberty, justice, and right, on which it is founded. They know that it is only weakened and endangered by a departure from those principles; and that when, in the service of oppression, it becomes powerless for good and only efficient for evil, then it is a Union no longer worth preserving. They therefore best evince their devotion to the Federal Union by a cordial support of the principles which constitute its glory and its strength, and by hostility to an institution which is its weakness and its shame.

But before I pass by the consideration of this constitution, let me call the attention of gentlemen to the section providing for its amendment. It reads as follows:

"Sec. 14. After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution; they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two-thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives; said delegates so elected shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

This section makes slavery perpetual in that Territory. It coils fetters about the people, and then ties up their hands so that they cannot remove them. The edict establishing and protecting slavery is like the laws of the Medes and Persians—irrepealable. The institution of slavery is so dear, so sacred to the men who compose this convention, that they place it above and beyond all law; and also beyond the sovereignty of the future State. This section denies any amendment until 1864, by which time it is expected that the "peculiar institution," under the kind care of your Army, your Supreme Court, and your Executive, will have taken deep root and firm position. Then it is necessary to secure a two-thirds vote in both branches of the Legislature in order to call a convention; and these conspirators have carefully guarded against that by giving the pro-slavery counties representation in both Houses, founded on fraudulent returns; and then, to guard against all and any contingencies, they demand that the citizen shall swear allegiance to this constitution, which declares plainly and distinctly that "no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." There is therefore no mode under this constitution by which the citizens of that Territory can free themselves from this evil.

I know that it is claimed by some gentlemen, that notwithstanding this provision of the constitution, the people of the future State will have the power to amend it as they deem best. I shall not argue that question now. Whether they have it or not, is immaterial, for we all well know how an attempt to exercise that power will be met. Suppose that this constitution is forced upon that Territory, and after it becomes a sovereign State, its people amend it in another mode than that which the constitution itself points out, and in so doing, abolish the institution of slavery? Why, sir, the slaveholder will go to the Supreme Court of the United States and cite the clauses of this constitution; and no man can doubt what the decision of that court will be, when the slaveholder goes to it for protection; and that that decision will be maintained as against this alleged right of a people to amend its constitution, in violation of its provisions.

Mr. Chairman, this Lecompton constitution is not an isolated wrong; it is not the first aggression on popular rights in Kansas; but it is the necessary result, the fitting sequel, to a series of villainies and wrongs.

For four years past the Democratic rulers and the Democratic party, have been engaged in an effort to extend the institution of slavery into the Territory of Kansas. The effort has been unceasing, untiring, and unscrupulous; and the means used have been, in every respect, worthy of the end to be accomplished. First, the Missouri compromise was repealed—repealed by the aid of Executive influence and by the force of party drill, because it stood in the way of the extension of slavery. Then a section of territory, that did not contain one hundred American citizens, was divided into two territorial organizations, at an annual expense to the Government of $100,000, so that the southern subdivision might, from its location and climate, be better adapted to the institution it was sought to introduce; then territorial officers were selected, who were supposed to be orthodox on the subject of African slavery, and willing to use their official position in its behalf; and when they shrank back from deeds of fraud, and injustice, and outrage, they were replaced by men who acknowledged less allegiance to conscience, and more loyalty to party; then armed bands from the southern States invaded that Territory, nullifying the will of its citizens, and electing a Legislature of usurpers as appropriate instruments to forward the unhallowed work.

But it is needless to recur to that catalogue of wrongs as evidence of a long-settled purpose. No man can now dispute it. It was the design of the men who devised and engineered the repeal of the Missouri compromise to make Kansas a slave State. It was cloaked over at first in order to stifle the sensibilities of the northern conscience, and beguile northern Democrats out of their votes. When the party was halting and hesitating about indorsing the Nebraska bill, General Cass assured it that the South never could derive any benefit from the measure, for no human power could ever establish slavery in the regions defined by that bill. These were his very words; but now when the Democratic party is brought to the sticking point, the mask is thrown off and he stands as the very Premier of an Administration glorying in the avowal "that Kansas is as much a slave State as Georgia or Alabama."

Sir, I am not surprised that a portion of the Democracy finally recoil from the work of usurpation, to which they have so long been parties by their votes. I only wonder that they have so long allowed themselves to be instruments in the hands of the slave power to strike down the cherished interests of freedom. I only wonder that their indignation has so long slumbered, whilst these fetters have been forging for their fellow-citizens in that Territory, and I now regret that they content themselves with so tame and so limited a measure of remonstrance. I regret that they confine themselves to a denunciation of this last outrage, when every argument that they use and every word that they employ apply with equal force to the long chain of usurpations that stain the pages of our history.

The fraud and outrage involved in the formation of the Lecompton constitution is not more odious and sickening than the violation of public faith and honor involved in the destruction of a sacred compact. There has been no enormity perpetrated at the recent elections in that Territory, which had not its model and pattern in the first elections under the Nebraska act. The government of that Territory, from its first inception, has been a despotism, created by armed invasions, and maintained only by Federal bayonets. The Legislature of that Territory has been maintained in power by the same military authority that interfered to protect this Lecompton convention from the indignation of the people it assumed to represent. The laws of that Territory have, from the first, been enforced, at the risk of violence and bloodshed, upon an unwilling people. The officers of that Territory, from the day of its organization, have been men selected with reference to their ability and disposition to do the bidding of the slave power—men whom the people of that land never selected—and their task has been to enforce laws which the people never made. The man who presented himself to the appointing power with the blood of a free-State man upon his hands, was the man favored as the recipient of executive patronage; and when an official has manifested a disposition to do half-way justice to the people—when he has for a moment recoiled in disgust from the work of usurpation—he has been beheaded by the executioner at the White House. The elections that immediately preceded and followed this Lecompton convention have been just as fair, just as honest, just as legitimate, as those which elected Territorial Legislatures and congressional Delegates. All of them have been alike outrages on the right of the elector. All of them have been carried by fraud in voting or in counting, except the election of last October, and then the usual frauds were perpetrated, but they failed of their object through the interference of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton; and that interference lost them favor with the Administration, and finally cost them their official positions.

Mr. Chairman, it may be that this Lecompton constitution is to be forced through Congress by the strength of party drill and executive influence. I fear that result; and, in anticipation of it, the Administration is asking an increase of Federal troops to enforce it upon the protesting people of the Territory. I am aware that they do not openly avow this object; and yet they but half conceal it. They talk about Mormon rebellions and Indian disturbances, while at the same time they retain three thousand men in the Territory of Kansas to protect usurpers in their wrong, and deprive freemen of their rights. The resources which the Administration has at its command are abundant for present emergencies, if it will use them; and I vote not another man nor another musket to be placed at its disposal.

This great wrong, Mr. Chairman, may be consummated; but, if it is, then I rejoice that there is in this land a power higher than Presidents, and greater than Congresses—the power of the sovereign people—constituting a tribunal of last resort, to which the friends of freedom will take an appeal with a consciousness of power and strength that a righteous cause always gives to its advocates.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman—I trust he will permit me to call him my friend—from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has made a most solemn appeal to me, in consideration of some remarks which fell from me on a former occasion. Of his perfect sincerity I have no doubt; and I presume that he will do me the honor to say that he has as little doubt of my own integrity of purpose. That gentleman and myself, from the professions we make to the world, recognize mankind as responsible, in the broadest sense, as eternally existent intelligences, who are destined to a glorious future. We recognize that he and myself, at a future day, will meet face to face, before the bar of retributive justice, with the most abject slave that treads the earth. It is to such men I reply, and not to those who deny those great and, to the gentleman and myself, important and undying principles.

Sir, show me any being made in the form of the Creator, and I will show you a brother, no matter what may be his position, how degraded, how trampled on. If he bears the impress of immortality upon his countenance I recognize in him one who will stand with me, my equal, at the last day. True, my first duty is to my wife and children; next to those around me; then to the State and nation; and then to mankind in its broadest and most comprehensive sense, no matter whether they toil under an African sun, or upon the plains of India; whether in freedom, or oppressed by slavery. I see in man, wherever he may be, the handiwork of God; and I see in him a being destined to immortality. It was this great principle that prompted those mighty men, J. Q. Adams, J. A. Bayard, Henry Clay, Jonathan Russell, and Albert Gallatin, to enter into a solemn compact and declaration of sentiment with Lord Gambier, Henry Goulburn, and William Adams, commissioners on the part of Great Britain, which I will read:

"ART. 10. Whereas, the traffic in slaves is irreconcilable with the principles of humanity and justice, and whereas, both his Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object."

Mr. Chairman, clothed with the opinions of those illustrious names, Great Britain and the United States stand committed to the civilized world to use their whole influence to put down—not the African slave trade merely—but the traffic in slaves on our own shores, and among the British West India islands. And, sir, as a member of the American Congress, as an American citizen, as a Christian, as a statesman, and as a man, I will carry out that solemn compact, that solemn pledge. It was with these views that I made the remarks to which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] has replied with so much zeal and eloquence. It was with the intention of exposing this misrepresentation of our Government in the length and breadth of its iniquity, that I called the attention of the country to the fact that our Minister at the Court of St. James had made statements to the British ministry that were unfounded in fact; and I challenged contradiction to that important assertion, as I did sixteen years since. I then declared the utterance of our representative at the Court of Great Britain as slanderous of the American nation—as false, unfounded, and a libel upon our Government. I call upon the gentleman from Tennessee to contradict that; and my friend had better acknowledge the fact at once, than to attempt to evade it as he did.

I rise to call the attention of the gentleman and of the country to the important fact that this Government has violated this solemn compact, by its authorized agent in Great Britain. And I called on British ministers not to be again misled, but to carry out the solemn pledge which that nation and our own had thus made to the civilized, the Christian world. I felt that the British ministry had violated this pledge by consenting to pay for men, immortal beings, as property. Now, sir, here is my position. It is no appeal to this man or that, but an appeal to the whole British and all other nations, to all people of whatever language, whatever may be their form of government, that they stand up in favor of humanity, maintain the dignity of man, and to see that this pledge, so solemnly made by this Government, shall be redeemed. Now, will my friend from Tennessee stand up to this pledge?

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not understand that any pledge has been made that requires either to be redeemed, or stood up to, or violated; or that there is a category, such as is suggested, to which it is necessary to respond; but as I am upon my feet, by permission of the gentleman—

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will my friend redeem that pledge? Will he use his efforts, so far as he can, to abolish this traffic in human flesh?

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will hear what I have to say—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only ask the question, will he carry out that pledge, or will he not? I do not ask for any other explanation.

Mr. MAYNARD. If the gentleman will not give me my own mode of replying—

Mr. GIDDINGS. I only say that Henry Clay, when he stood before the country as a candidate for the Presidency, and when I, before the country, supported him in that canvass, had made this solemn pledge, that he entered into that compact to destroy the traffic in slaves.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BARKSDALE obtained the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. BARKSDALE. One single question.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was going to ask the gentleman whether he did not understand that this tenth article of the treaty with Great Britain related to the slave trade? And then I was going to ask him whether there was not a very grave question of casuistry, as to the right and title under which we hold the lands once belonging to the Indians, and whether there was not a great difference between the propriety of getting their lands now, and giving up what we have already acquired?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I will answer the gentleman's first question, but will not answer his second question, it having no relation to the question.

Mr. MAYNARD. The question which I asked was this: whether there is not the same difference between the question of the African slave trade; either as a question of ethics or of policy, and the holding of persons in slavery who are now slaves; that there is between plundering the Indian tribes of their lands, and the holding of the lands which we have now got, and refusing to give them up to the first Indian who comes along?

Mr. GIDDINGS. The gentleman must meet my question, or back out. When the gentleman asks me whether that provision was not intended for the slave trade, I tell him no; not exclusively. One man who made that compact declared upon this floor that it was designed to overthrow the entire traffic in human flesh. There is no reference to the foreign slave trade, nor to the domestic or coastwise slave trade; and I believe that Mr. Clay, and those men who acted with him, thought as much of our own country as they did of Africa; and that they would not say that the slave trade upon the African coast was piracy, and on our own coast was a commendable vocation. They did not hold that crime was to be determined by the latitude and longitude in which it was committed; but they held that a man who, upon our own southern coast, dealt in those who were created in the similitude of God, ought to be hanged, as much as those who engaged in the same trade on the African coast. And let me tell the gentleman that, if he had consulted the history of the country, he would have known these declarations, which were publicly made in the Halls of Congress.

Mr. MAYNARD. Then I ask the gentleman whether he intends to say that, when the treaty of Ghent was made, on the 24th of September, 1814, by John Quincy Adams, Bayard, Clay, Russell, and Gallatin, they invoked the aid and instrumentality of Great Britain acting here in putting down the buying and selling of slaves in our own country? Sir, such a supposition as that I hold to be a calumny. I hold it to be a slander on the memory of those distinguished statesmen. They never could have done so. I will never believe—I will believe anything first—that they would make a treaty with the Power with which we were at war; the Power which we met on the northern lakes; the Power which we met on the seas; the Power which had impressed our seamen, by which that Power, as one of the high contracting parties, should come upon our own ground, into our own country, and interfere to prevent a citizen of the United States from either buying or selling a household servant as the exigency of his household or the requirements of his business might make proper or necessary.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I wish to have one minute, to say that this pledge of Henry Clay, and John Quincy Adams, and Bayard, and Gallatin, was on behalf of the United States and of this Government; not on the part of England, but for this nation and Government. England owned, at that time, slave colonies herself, and tolerated traffic in slaves among her West India islands; and the British ministers proclaimed their intention to put down the traffic in slaves in the West India islands. Now, I appeal to the nation, I appeal to the House, whether we ought not to carry out that compact?

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask why, if that had reference to slavery, and not to the slave trade, they did not use the word "slavery?" It was as easy for them to have inserted a word about which there could be no controversy and no misunderstanding.

Mr. GIDDINGS. It was because the United States Government had not the power to abolish slavery in Tennessee, or in any other State, but had the power to abolish the slave trade on our coast. They said "traffic in slaves," not slavery, not the slave trade.

Mr. BARKSDALE resumed the floor.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I ask the gentleman from Mississippi to give way to a motion that the committee do now rise.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I prefer to go on now.

Mr. ATKINS. Will the gentleman yield to my colleague, [Mr. MAYNARD,] that he may ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GIDDINGS?]

Mr. BARKSDALE. For one moment only.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will also yield for an answer?

Mr. BARKSDALE. Certainly.

Mr. MAYNARD. I dislike, Mr. Chairman, to pursue this course of discussion. The question which I desire to propound is—

Mr. HARLAN. I feel under the necessity of raising an objection.

The CHAIRMAN. By the settled usage of the committee the floor cannot be yielded without unanimous consent, except to ask a question. Objection is made, and the gentleman from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Mr. Chairman, the third section of the fourth article of the Constitution of the United States declares that new States may be admitted by Congress into the Union; and the fourth section of the same article provides that the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion, and, on application of the Legislature, or of the Executive when the Legislature cannot be convened, against domestic violence.

Under these clauses of the Federal Constitution, Mr. Chairman, from the beginning of the Government to 1820—in its purer and better days—in the days of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, of the great men who fought the battles of the Revolution, and achieved our independence, free States and slave States were admitted into the Union without any discussion as to their domestic institutions. During that period Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, and Alabama, were all admitted into the Union on terms of perfect equality with the original States that formed the Confederacy. In 1820, however, when Missouri applied for admission, her application was resisted, not because her constitution was not republican in form, not because there was any objection to her boundaries, not because she did not have the requisite population, not because she had not undergone a territorial pupillage, but because her constitution recognized slavery.

Here, sir, commenced the agitation of that fearful question of slavery, which, though presenting at different times somewhat varying aspects, remains unchanged in its essence and character, and is to-day what it was then—a contest for sectional aggrandizement on the one hand, and existence on the other.

This fierce struggle was finally ended by the admission of Missouri; but, in order to secure it, the South was forced to yield to an unjust and unconstitutional restriction, by which slavery was prohibited north of 36° 30'.

It is unnecessary for me, sir, to repeat the events of that period. They have been often depicted during the present session of Congress in the discussion of this Kansas question, and are well known to the country. And from that period to the present, whenever a slave State has applied for admission into the Union—as in the case of Arkansas, of Florida, and of Texas, the country has passed through the same scenes of agitation, of excitement, and of turmoil, through which we are passing now.

Mr. Chairman, when a State applies for admission into the Union, what are the inquiries to be made by Congress? First, whether her constitution is the act and will of the people of that Territory, or inchoate State; and secondly, whether her constitution is republican in form. To arrive at a satisfactory solution of these questions as connected with the application of Kansas, I propose to call the attention of the House to certain facts, the authenticity of which no one can successfully controvert.

On the 3d of February the President of the United States, in the patriotic discharge of his duty, transmitted to Congress a constitution formed by Kansas, with her application for admission into the Union, accompanied by a message marked with extraordinary ability, urging her admission. The question for us to ask is, is this the constitution of the people of Kansas? Have they made it? Is it their act and deed, and are they applying for admission into the Union under it?

The objects of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, introduced into the Senate by Judge DOUGLAS, who was its avowed champion, were to organize these Territories, to confer upon the people whatever powers of legislation were possessed by Congress, and to repeal the Missouri restriction—thus establishing the principle of non-intervention. That bill became the law of the land. The Missouri restriction was repealed, and Kansas and Nebraska became organized Territories. A Governor of Kansas and other officers were appointed. A Territorial Legislature was elected by the people, and all the machinery of a territorial government put in operation. It has been charged, however, that there were frauds practiced in the election of the first Legislature of the Territory of Kansas. I do not know how that may be. I do know, however, that before the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed—after it became evident that it would pass—an organization was gotten up in the State of Massachusetts, with a capital amounting to $3,000,000, for the purpose of sending emigrants into Kansas with a view, not of becoming citizens, but of shaping and controlling its institutions, and defeating the objects of the law. Now, sir, what does Judge DOUGLAS say with reference to the organization of this Emigrant Aid Society?

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken in what he says about a society organized, as he says, in Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I understand, sir, what are the facts in connection with the organization of this society. Its objects were to defeat the law; and many of those who went to that Territory under its auspices, left it, never to return, immediately after the first election.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman let me correct him?

Mr. BARKSDALE. No, sir; I do not mean to treat the gentleman discourteously, but I cannot yield.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to say to the gentleman, that no such society was organized in Massachusetts as he has described.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Why, sir, it has never been denied before, to my knowledge.

Mr. DAWES. It is denied now. He is mistaken about the society.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. SUMNER] boldly avowed it in the Senate, and it was admitted upon this floor by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Mace, a member of this House in the Thirty-Third Congress.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Mace acknowledged that he was the president of the association.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman says that the Legislature of Massachusetts incorporated such a society.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman is mistaken. I did not say the Legislature incorporated the society. I said there was an organization formed with a capital of $3,000,000.

Mr. DAWES. And formed in Massachusetts, I understand you to say.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Yes, sir; that is my understanding.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman is mistaken. There was no such society formed in Massachusetts.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I repeat, sir, that I have never heard the fact denied before. It has been gloried in by the Representatives from Massachusetts heretofore. I recollect that the Senator from Massachusetts avowed it and exulted in it on the floor of the Senate. I allude to Mr. SUMNER, in that celebrated speech of his, which gentlemen on the other side of the House will remember, perhaps, forever.

And let me state here that the candidate of the anti-slavery party for Congress, in the first election, left the Territory immediately after the result was made known, and never returned.

The object of that organization, I repeat, was to defeat the purpose of the law, and to prevent slaveholders from enjoying their property in that Territory. Here is what Judge DOUGLAS says:

"The passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act was strenuously resisted by all persons who thought it a less evil to deprive the people of new States and Territories of the right of State equality and self government than to allow them to decide the slavery question for themselves, as every State of the Union had done, and must retain the undeniable right to do, so long as the Constitution of the United States shall be maintained as the supreme law of the land. Finding opposition to the principles of the act unavailing in the Halls of Congress and under the forms of the Constitution, combinations were immediately entered into in some portions of the Union to control the political destinies and form and regulate the domestic institutions of those Territories and future States through the machinery of emigrant aid societies."

Here, I have quoted the language of your great leader in this war upon Kansas and the South, in regard to these emigrant aid societies—

Mr. DAWES. If the gentleman will permit me, I will in a moment set him right in this matter.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I only have an hour, and the gentleman will see that I have no time to spare. Judge DOUGLAS continues:

"In order to give consistency and efficiency to the movement, and surround it with the color of legal authority, an act of incorporation was procured from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, when a powerful corporation, with a capital of $5,000,000, invested in houses and lands, in merchandise and mills, in cannon and rifles, in powder and lead, in all the implements of art, agriculture, and war, and employing a corresponding number of men, all under the management and control of non-resident directors and stockholders, who are authorized by their charter to vote by proxy to the extent of fifty votes each, enters a distant and sparsely settled Territory, with the fixed purpose of wielding all its power to control the domestic institutions and political destinies of the Territory, it becomes a question of fearful import how far the operations of the company are compatible with the rights and liberties of the people. Whatever may be the extent or limit of congressional authority over the Territories, it is clear that no individual State has the right to pass any law, or authorize any act, concerning or affecting the Territories which it might not enact in reference to any other State. It is a well-settled principle of constitutional law in this country, that, while all the States of the Union are united in one, for certain purposes, yet each State, in respect to everything which affects its domestic policy and internal concerns, stands in the relation of a foreign Power to every other State. Hence, no State has a right to pass any law, or do or authorize any act, with a view to influence or change the domestic policy of any other State or Territory of the Union, more than it would with reference to France or England, or any other foreign State with which we are at peace. Indeed, every State of this Union is under higher obligations to observe a friendly forbearance and generous comity towards each other member of the Confederacy than the laws of nations can impose on foreign States."

I have thus established the fact of the organization of this society by the testimony of Judge DOUGLAS, who was eloquent in denunciation of its objects.

The fact that there was such an organization in existence, I repeat, has never been denied before, to my knowledge.

Mr. DAWES. I do not deny that

Mr. BARKSDALE. There may have been frauds in that election. I do not pretend to know how the facts are. If there were frauds on one side, there were frauds, doubtless, on the other; and if Missourians invaded that Territory, it was for the purpose of counteracting that which had been improperly and illegally done by the Emigrant Aid Society of Massachusetts.

But, sir, how was it? Members of that Legislature were commissioned by Governor Reeder himself. He issued their commissions and he did not object to that Legislature upon the ground of its illegality, until after it removed the place of its meeting. The Territorial Legislature of 1855, passed an act, submitting the question to the people, whether they desired a convention to be called to organize a State government or not. That question was submitted to the people. Every man in that Territory had the right to vote; the United States troops were there to protect them in that right, if they did not have the courage to protect themselves. If the anti-slavery party of the Territory were opposed to organizing a State government, why did they not say so? They refused to obey the law; they refused to exercise the privilege which had been guaranteed to them under it; a large majority, almost a unanimous vote, was given in favor of calling a convention of the people to organize a State government. Sir, the object of these emigrant aid societies was to set at defiance the authority of the Federal Government and the Territorial Legislature, and they were successful.

Sir, are we to be influenced by conduct like this? They not only refused to obey the law, but property was rendered insecure, and human life itself was put in constant peril. The country was ever and anon shocked with accounts of murders and assassinations committed by the abandoned outcasts, who were gathered from the dens and purlieus of northern cities and transported into that Territory by these emigrant aid societies. Arson, robbery, and murder, and every crime known to the black catalogue of crimes, were committed by these outlaws and traitors. Yet we are told that, because they did not vote, this constitution is not the will of the people of Kansas. The true people of Kansas, those who had fixed their homes and cast their destiny in that Territory, and whose interests were identified with it, decided, under the forms of law, that a convention should be held; the succeeding Legislature passed an act requiring all the voters of the Territory to be registered preparatory to the election; officers were regularly appointed to register the names; and time was given for every man in the Territory to register his name. But these men refused to obey the law, or avail themselves of the rights which had been so carefully secured to them. Law-abiding citizens of the Territory, however, did observe the law, to the number of more than nine thousand.

After this opportunity had been given to every man in the Territory to register his name, an election was held for delegates to this convention; the apportionment having been made by Mr. Secretary Stanton himself. Here, again, was another opportunity afforded to the free-State men of that Territory to have secured a majority in that convention, and thus to have made a free-State constitution, or a constitution prohibiting slavery if they desired to do so. They did not vote; or, if they did vote, they were in a minority, and hence a large majority of pro-slavery delegates was elected to that convention.

In due course of time—the time specified by law—the convention met, having been elected by the people at the ballot-box, every man in the Territory having had an opportunity of participating in the election of those delegates. The validity of this convention was recognized by the President in his instructions to Governor Walker, and by Judge DOUGLASS himself in a speech delivered by him at Springfield, Illinois, in which he declares that:

"Kansas is about to speak for herself, through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of his elective franchise. If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of the political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest upon those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitations than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of these rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity to the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas, that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, who are now reaping the rewards of their treachery to the South in the adulation of their Abolition friends at the North, both repeatedly acknowledged the legality of this convention.

As I said, the convention met and proceeded to form a constitution for the people of Kansas. That constitution recognizes slavery, and throws around it protecting sanction. But it is said in reference to this constitution, in the first place, that there ought to have been an enabling act, and that the Territorial Legislature had no right to call this convention.

Now, sir, let us look into that matter. When, sir, did the author of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and the leader of the forces in opposition to the admission of Kansas, become a convert to the doctrine that it is necessary that there should be an enabling act in order to the admission of a new State into the Union? Why, sir, if it is necessary to have an enabling act, the Kansas-Nebraska bill is itself an enabling act. Now let me read the language of that bill:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, or to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

Here, sir, was the enabling act, if one was necessary. But Kansas is a portion of the territory which we acquired from France. It is a part of the Louisiana territory, and, by the treaty under which we acquired it, Kansas has a right to be admitted into the Union. Then, sir, two enabling acts have been passed already for the people of Kansas to form a State constitution; and, acting under this authority, the people of Kansas, through their Territorial Legislature, called a convention to organize a State government.

But, sir, was it necessary that an enabling act should be passed at all? What has been the practice of the Government? Why, sir, seven out of eighteen States, which have been admitted into the Union since the foundation of the Government, came in without an enabling act: Vermont, Maine, Arkansas, Iowa, Tennessee, Michigan, Florida, and California. In the case of Tennessee, a convention was called, a constitution framed, and an application was made to Congress for the admission of that State, without any enabling act, or without any authority from Congress. And it is a fact worthy of note that General Jackson himself was a member of that convention, and that General Washington urged upon Congress the importance of admitting Tennessee into the Union without delay.

What were the facts in relation to California? Acting under the authority of a military commander, an election was held, and delegates chosen to a convention to form a State constitution, when no census had been taken, when no registry of votes had been made. The inhabitants of the Territory at the time, whether Mexicans, Chilians, Frenchmen, or Dutchmen, were allowed to march up to the polls, and usurp the political sovereignty of that vast Territory. Thus it was that California, with its one thousand miles of sea-coast, its one hundred and fifty thousand square miles of territory, its boundless resources, and vast treasures, was forbidden to the South, and appropriated for the purposes of free soil.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to say that Florida was admitted under a constitution adopted by a convention some nine years before its admission, by a people different from those in the Territory at that time, and it was admitted against the wishes and protests of the people of the Territory at the time of its admission.

Mr. BARKSDALE. That is true, I believe. Why, sir, it has not been the practice of the Government to require an enabling act, nor was an enabling act necessary in the case of Kansas.

But it is said, sir, that this constitution should have been submitted to the vote of the people, and that it is not their act because it was not so submitted. Sir, I would ask, have constitutions been formed in this way alone, by the people of this country in organizing States? A portion of the States have submitted their constitutions to the people after they were framed; but in eighteen States of the Union the constitutions were not submitted. And why? Because here the people do not act en masse. They act through delegates elected by themselves. Ours is a representative government. The convention of Kansas embodied the sovereignty of the people, carried out the will of the people, spoke the voice of the people, and was, in fact, the people. The Constitution of the United States was never submitted to a vote of the people. The delegates to the convention that framed that Constitution were not even elected by the people. They were appointed by the Legislatures of the States. And after they had finished their great work, it was indorsed and ratified, not by the people at the ballot-box, but by conventions of the States, acting for them in their sovereign capacity. Vermont, Tennessee, Louisiana, Mississippi, Alabama, Arkansas, Kentucky, Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Missouri, and Wisconsin, were admitted into the Union with constitutions that were not submitted to the people. Kentucky presented herself for admission into the Union before her constitution was formed or her convention had met; and hence was admitted into the Union without any constitution.

But, sir, while this constitution was not submitted as a whole to the people of Kansas, the only question in dispute—that of slavery—was submitted. It was submitted to a vote of all the people of Kansas. It was submitted, too, in such a way as to secure a fair vote on that article of the constitution. Now, sir, what do the gentlemen on the other side of the House care about the school question, or the bank question, or the internal improvement question, in the Territory of Kansas? Has there been any agitation of these questions? I ask my friend from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] if he is interested in these questions in that Territory? The only question in dispute was the slavery question; and that, I repeat, was submitted to a vote of all the people in that Territory. Now, I believe that that convention acted unwisely in submitting it to a vote of all the inhabitants. I believed that a residence of three or six months should have been required as a qualification for voting; but it was the province of the convention to prescribe the qualifications of voters, and they allowed all to vote who happened to be there on the day of election, claiming to be residents. If an individual arrived in that Territory five minutes before the polls closed, and came up with the sweat and dust of travel upon him, and claimed to be a resident of Kansas, he was allowed to vote on the question whether this slavery article in the constitution should be retained or rejected.

Mr. CURTIS. The constitution says "inhabitants."

Mr. BARKSDALE. All were allowed to vote, as I have already said. And what was the result? More than six thousand votes were given to the constitution with slavery, and but a few hundred against it.

But it is said that the majority of the people of that Territory did not vote. I do not know how that may be. The right to vote was given them, and every safeguard provided. If they desired Kansas to be a free State, and did not so vote, that is their own fault. But it is said that Kansas must be rejected because a majority of the people are opposed to it. How do we know that? Where do you ascertain that fact? Do you find it in the election returns of the 4th of January? Why, the question had then been settled. The people had acted on it. The pro-slavery clause of the constitution had already been ratified by the people. Those who were in favor of its insertion did not vote on the 4th of January, because it was a question which had been settled, and which perished with the settlement of it.

Where, then, do you find evidence that the constitution framed at Lecompton is not acceptable to the majority of the people of Kansas? I think I have shown that it is the constitution of the people of Kansas; that they have made it; that it is theirs; and that under it they are applying for admission into the Union.

Now, the next question is, is this constitution republican in form? I hardly suppose there is any dispute with regard to that fact. It is a republican constitution. It is founded on the will of the people. Under its provisions the Governor is elected by the people; the Legislature is elected by the people; even the judiciary are elected by the people. All the officers are so elected. If the constitutions of the other States are republican in form, no objection on this ground can be urged against that of Kansas.

Then, sir, I have endeavored to answer the only questions that Congress ought to ask in the admission of new States: first, that it is the will of the people; and, next, that the constitution which they present is republican in form. What, then, is the ground of the opposition to the admission of Kansas? The true ground, sir, disguise it as gentlemen may, is that its constitution recognizes slavery. I see near me the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. COLFAX,] who is one of the leaders of his party in this House, and I desire to ask him now whether, if all the people of Kansas desired to have a pro-slavery constitution, he would vote for her admission into the Union?

Mr. COLFAX. The gentleman from Mississippi asks me a question. I have listened very attentively to his speech, and I desire to say to him that if I get the floor when he concludes, as I hope to, I intend to answer every point he has made in his speech.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I do not know that I will be here. I should like to have the answer now. I ask you, gentlemen on the other side of the House, of the Black Republican party, would you vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union with a constitution tolerating slavery, if a hundred thousand people there wished it?

Mr. GIDDINGS. Does the gentleman ask me?

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask all of you.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Then I answer the gentleman that I will never associate, politically, with men of that character, if I can help it. I will never vote to compel Ohio to associate with another slave State, if I can prevent it.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask the gentleman from Ohio if he speaks for his party?

Mr. GIDDINGS. I speak for the thinking, reflecting, humane portion of mankind generally. [Laughter.]

Mr. BARKSDALE. Black Republican mankind you mean. [Laughter.] I have no doubt of it. I repeat that the true ground of opposition to the admission of Kansas is, that her constitution tolerates slavery, and I now have indubitable evidence of the fact in the declaration of the gentleman from Ohio. Why, sir, gentlemen on the other side of this Hall voted for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Topeka constitution—a constitution framed not only without authority of law, but in violation of law—a constitution which did not embody the will of the people—a constitution which, notwithstanding their professed devotion to the negro, as I am told by a friend near me, [Mr. KEITT,] prohibits the immigration of free negroes.

Mr. BINGHAM. If the gentleman will allow me for a moment, I wish to say that the statement which I have heard made before, that the Topeka constitution excluded free negroes from Kansas, is an entire mistake. It excludes nobody from that Territory. On the contrary, so far from excluding free negroes, it provides that no person shall be transported from the State, not even for crime.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Was that constitution ever submitted to the people and voted on by them?

Mr. BINGHAM. It was submitted, and I believe voted on, though the vote was not a large one.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Was it ratified?

Mr. BINGHAM. Yes, sir.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman is mistaken; it had not been submitted before it was sent here. While the gentleman from Ohio is on the stand, I ask him if he would vote to admit Kansas into the Union with a pro-slavery constitution if the people of that Territory all desired it?

Mr. BINGHAM. Certainly not.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I repeat, then, sir, that the opposition to the admission of Kansas into the Union is based upon the ground that her constitution tolerates slavery.

Mr. STANTON. I will say, if the gentleman will allow me, that the Republican members of this House, so far as I know, will never vote for the admission of any slave State north of 36° 30'.

Mr. KEITT. Will you south of 36° 30'?

Mr. STANTON. A good many of them will.

Mr. BARKSDALE. The gentleman speaks for himself, I suppose, when he makes that declaration. He certainly did not speak for his colleague over the way, [Mr. GIDDINGS.] Then, sir, this question involves the rights, the equality, and honor of the southern States of this Confederacy. Upon the floor of the Senate it has already been avowed by the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union. I will read the language of the Senator:

"The white man needs this continent to labor upon. His head is clear, his arm is strong, and his necessities are fixed. He must and will have it."

This, sir, is not only a declaration that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union, but that slavery must yield even in the fifteen slave States. He must have the whole continent. That is his declaration.

And, sir, with this formal and well-considered proclamation by the leader of the Black Republican party, in the Senate, reiterated by chiefs and subalterns of the same party here on this floor, can there be any misapprehension as to the purposes and the inevitable end to be accomplished by this opposition to the admission of Kansas.

Mr. Chairman, it is time the North and South understood each other. If this is the position of the North, we of the South desire to know it. If no more slave States are to be admitted into the Union, our people should be informed of your determination. In the language of one of the noble statesmen of the South, [Mr. TOOMBS,] delivered in the Senate a day or two ago, I too have counted the cost of this Union; and I think I understand something of its value. Sir, this Union was made by slaveholders. The battles of the Revolution were fought by slaveholders. A slaveholder headed your armies, and led them on to victory. Slaveholders laid the foundations of this Republic deep and broad. The Declaration of Independence was published to the world in behalf of thirteen colonies—all of them slaveholding. The Union which they afterwards formed—"the more perfect Union"—was a Union of equality, of equal rights, and of equal privileges. If you intend to deprive the southern States of their rights, it is well for us that you have so frankly and unreservedly avowed your purpose. In every period of our history, when dangers impended over us, the South has been true and loyal to the Union. When, sir, in the hour of danger, has she ever faltered? The bones of her sons are bleaching upon the very soil from which her people are excluded, and the achievements of her heroes adorn the brightest pages of your history. But, sir, that same patriotic devotion which inspired them to bare their breasts and shed their blood for our Union when it was a glorious Union of equals, will arouse their hearts and nerve their arms to resist its aggressions upon their rights and honor.

Mr. COLFAX obtained the floor.

Mr. ADRAIN. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that I took the floor and addressed you first?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say, once for all, that he does not mean to set aside any gentleman who has first addressed the Chair. When he gives the floor to any gentleman, it is conclusive that he considers him in time with any other gentleman.

Mr. ADRAIN. I bow to the decision of the Chair.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana, as this is Saturday afternoon, will yield to a motion to adjourn.

Mr. COLFAX. I prefer to go on now.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. Chairman, when the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BARKSDALE] was upon the floor, a little while ago, he put some interrogatories to me. He wished to know whether, if Kansas came here with a constitution adopted by her people recognizing slavery I would vote for her admission under that constitution? I tell him now, emphatically, in advance of the speech which I have prepared, that I would not. When the Missouri compromise, that time-honored compact, was repealed, I declared then, and I maintain it now, that by no vote of mine shall that repeal be carried out to what I feared was intended to be its result; and therefore I would refuse to admit Kansas as a slave State under any contingency. But all who oppose the ratification of the Lecompton constitution do not agree on this point; and I pledge myself to the gentleman from Mississippi and other members from the South upon this floor, that, if I do not prove that there are sufficient reasons, apart from slavery, to demand its rejection, that the Lecompton constitution is not republican in its form, that it does not speak the voice nor the will of the people of the Territory of Kansas, then I do not ask any man of any party to join me in voting against it.

Nineteen years ago, the House of Representatives was convulsed with an exciting question, which threatened to prevent its organization, which hazarded even the continuance of the body itself, and which, affecting as it did the political majority of this branch of the National Councils, and thus deciding which party should wield its power, baffled all attempts at its adjustment, until the strong mind of the "old man eloquent" brought it from chaos to order once more. The incidents of that struggle must be fresh in the minds of every Representative within the sound of my voice; for they were discussed at every fireside throughout this broad land. Five citizens of New Jersey presented themselves at the bar of the House, with commissions certifying their election as Representatives from that State, signed by its Chief Magistrate, and attested by the broad seal of the State itself, the symbol of its sovereignty. These commissions were in the exact form required by law; and the gentlemen thus commissioned demanded that they should be admitted to seats upon them during the organization of the body, and till the proper committee was appointed before whom their contestants could present their claims. No other gentlemen claimed to have legal commissions for the seats on this floor belonging to New Jersey, except one whose right was uncontested; but five other citizens presented certificates signed by an inferior officer of State and by two county clerks, asserting that the votes of two townships had been omitted in the executive computation, which, if included with the others, would have entitled them to the commissions given to their adversaries. To this it was replied, by the members commissioned according to law, that gross frauds and irregularities existed in the returns of these townships, justifying their exclusion, as they would show at the proper time; but that meanwhile they claimed the seats in this body to which their legal credentials, the signature of the Governor of their State, and its broad seal, entitled them. Such is a fair abstract of the points in controversy in the celebrated New Jersey case. The application which I shall make of them may already be apparent.

Then, a sovereign State, by a fulfillment of all the formalities under which members are officially accredited to this body, demanded, under the signature of its highest functionary, who, by law, had the right thus to speak for his State, that certain citizens thereof should be received to membership here. But the remaining members of the American Congress persistently, and to the end, despite the excitement which reigned here for two long weeks, resolved that they should not be admitted into their midst; but that, going behind these credentials, regular though they were on their face, they would, at all hazards, regardless of broad seals and gubernatorial signatures, ascertain what was the actual will of the people of New Jersey. And the political majority of this body, with these claimants excluded, being adverse to their views, their credentials, broad seal, executive signature, and all, were finally thrown back into their faces, and their uncertified contestants admitted in their stead.

Now, the scene has changed. A constitution is before us, not framed by the authority of an enabling act, the last Congress having failed to concur in the passage of one—not ratified by the people interested, at any election in which the right to choose, the simple power of saying yes or no, had been conceded—but framed by a convention, elected under an imperfect, unfair, disfranchising, and therefore swindling, census and registry, whose members represented, on an average, exactly thirty votes apiece—who needed an army to protect them, while in session, from the indignation of the people, whose organic law they pretended to have been commissioned to make—who themselves conceded all that I have charged against them, by submitting the constitution only to those who were willing to vote for it, and to swear besides to support it; and whose ill-shapen and illegitimate offspring was repudiated as spurious by the overwhelming majority of ten thousand, at a fair, open election, authorized by the Governor and Legislature of the Territory. And yet this fraudulent instrument, which no one here is hardy enough to claim as the voice of the majority of the people of the proposed State; which no more speaks their will than does the constitution of conquered and enthralled France speak the will of the freemen of America; and which every one, here or elsewhere, knows full well is loathed and scorned and repudiated by the people, who are to be forced, with the bayonet, to live under it,—this instrument is pressed upon us for ratification on the technical ground that it emanated from a body which was nominally a convention, representing the people of Kansas—that it has passed the ordeal of a pretended, one-sided, submission; and that we have, therefore, no right to go behind it, and inquire whether it is or is not the will of the people of that distant Territory.

But, sir, I propose to hold up to these defenders of the Lecompton constitution the emphatic utterances of the leaders, the very magnates, of their party upon this floor, during the discussion of the celebrated New Jersey case, to which I have referred; for, if it was right, if it was legal, if it was constitutional, to look behind the regular credentials of Representatives, and to decide, before admitting them to seats, whether those credentials actually spoke the voice of the people interested, then are gentlemen on the other side "estopped" (to use that favorite term of the Lecomptonites) from arguing that, when an instrument of such vital, far-reaching importance, as a State constitution, is before us for ratification, we may not also go behind even the fairest face that it may wear on the outside, to see if it is not a fraud and an outrage, a tyranny and a wrong.

My quotations are from the eighth volume of the Congressional Globe, session of 1839-40.

And, first, to all the gentlemen, from the President down, who tell us so complacently that the Lecompton convention was a legal body, that their constitution was a legal instrument, that its formation has all been technically regular, and that, therefore, we have no right to consider the nearly unanimous protest against it by the Territorial Legislature, and the overwhelming repudiation of it by the people themselves, I quote the outspoken language of Aaron Vanderpool, then the leader of the Democratic delegation here from the Empire State:

"These (said he) were his views and answers to the technical points—the mere questions of form—raised here, to preclude us from looking at the real truth and justice of the case." * * * "He implored the House not to acknowledge itself so impotent, or so mystified by form as to be blinded to substance; not to promulgate to the world that the potent voice and will of the people of a sovereign State, constitutionally expressed, could here be practically frustrated and drowned, even for a season, by the pitiful, squeaking notes of form and technicality."—Congressional Globe, p. 9, 1839.

That was the robust language in which a Democratic champion of that era spurned the argument of "form and technicality," and sought rather, as he declared in another part of his speech, to ascertain what was "the right and truth and justice and conscience of the case."

Nor was this all. After him stood up the champion of the Democratic delegation from Ohio, who for years afterwards occupied a still higher seat in the other end of this Capitol, and who now presides as the Executive of the Golden State. Said John B. Weller:

"His object was to do full and ample justice to these men and to the people of New Jersey; and he was not to be tied down by forms, or stand upon technicalities, when he saw a gross fraud practiced upon the rights of a people of a sovereign State." * * * "Whenever he saw an effort made to disregard the expressed will of the people, and trample upon their constitutional rights, he would be heard in their defense. Yes, sir, as long as God gives me a voice to speak, that voice shall be heard in vindicating the cause of an outraged and insulted people."—Ibid., p. 10.

That voice, Mr. Chairman, is still spared to its owner; and as it spoke so emphatically, when merely a representation in a single Congress was at issue, I shall look to hear the solemn pledge which I have quoted most eloquently redeemed when John B. Weller, from the Pacific coast, lifts his voice in vindication of "the cause of an outraged and insulted people," and condemns, in the severe language which he so well knows how to use, and will use if he is faithful to his vow, the imposition of an odious constitution upon a protesting and indignant community.

Virginia, too, in that day, spoke in a different tone from her Representatives of 1858, but in striking accordance with the fearless declarations of her present chief magistrate. George C. Dromgoole—and I need not state here what rank he held among the statesmen of the Old Dominion—uttered language which was both truthful and prophetic. Listen to his words of warning:

"If you establish the principle that the credentials given by the State authorities, no matter how fraudulent, no matter how much at variance with the will of the people of the State, as expressed in the elections, shall outweigh the popular voice, you strike at the existence of the elective franchise, and destroy every principle that makes democracy both lovely and practicable."—Page 59.

And yet the successors of Dromgoole tell us that we cannot go behind the official certificate of John Calhoun to ascertain whether the instrument he bears is or is not "at variance with the will of the people." To them comes the stern condemnation from their eloquent predecessor, who, though dead, yet speaketh—"You strike at the existence of the elective franchise, and destroy every principle that makes democracy both lovely and practicable."

Time will not permit more copious quotations, but I must call yet another witness upon the stand, who "still lives" in his own State of South Carolina. I allude to Francis W. Pickens, to whom the President not long since tendered one of his most important foreign missions, and who should therefore be good authority at the White House, as well as with his successors here. Mr. Pickens thus spoke in the same debate, says the Globe:

"He asserted the power of the House to take what course it thought proper. It might pass by the great seal of the State of New Jersey as insufficient evidence, and it was accountable to nobody but its own constituents."—Page 18.

And it cannot be denied that our obligation to admit Representatives here is more imperative than to admit new States. We must do the former; but the Constitution declares that we may do the latter; and if we may, we certainly also may not. A rightful Representative we are bound to admit without compromise or stipulation. Even a legal State we may admit or reject as we see proper, and if we admit, can do it with or without conditions.

But the warning of this eminent State-rights Democrat was still more impressive than Mr. Dromgoole's. Let it ring in the ears of those who now spurn the will of the majority, for its truthfulness has lost nothing by age:

"He called," says the Congressional Globe, "upon gentlemen to beware how they set at defiance the will of the people when clearly expressed. He did not desire to preach revolutionary doctrine, but he was ready to declare a great truth, that history would bear him out in, which was that the thunder of Heaven might sometimes be heard to roll in the indignant murmurs of an outraged but free people."

* * * "When the people come to decide upon that question, they will tear off and trample in the dust the technicalities of special county court pleading, which are thrown around us here for party purposes or otherwise."—Page 13.

I cannot dismiss this retrospect of what used to be Democratic argument in the olden time, without quoting an extract from one of the editorials of the Lecompton organ here, the Washington Union, but a fortnight since, and the emphatic and truthful reply to it from the lips of one of the Democratic champions of the debate of 1839. Says the Union, in an article showing the perfect indifference it exhibited to what was the desire of the majority of the people of Kansas:

"We do not care whether the people like or dislike the constitution. We are unwilling to take any more testimony. The case has been closed; the judgment entered up; and the execution is now in the hands of the officers."

Said John B. Weller, in the famous New Jersey debate, prophetically and justly characterizing such sentiments as these:

"They [his opponents] had always practiced upon the principle of the incapacity of the people to govern themselves—that the minority should rule. That was the cornerstone of Federalism."—Page 10.

How appropriately, too, does the language of Governor Weller reply to the bold avowal of a champion of the Lecompton constitution in the other branch of Congress, [Mr. HAMMOND, of South Carolina,] who in that famous speech of his justified "the rule of the minority," as follows:

"If this was a minority constitution I do not know that that would be an objection to it. Constitutions are made for minorities. Perhaps minorities ought to have the right to make constitutions, for they are administered by majorities."

The brief hour allotted me speeds so rapidly away that I must hasten to another branch of the discussion. The stronghold, the very citadel, of the supporters of the Lecompton constitution is the argument that the free-State men have thrown away their opportunity to vindicate their principles by failing to vote, and have therefore no right to complain. To every appeal for justice to Kansas—to every denunciation of this great wrong—the ready answer is, "Why did your friends fail to vote?" It is the key-note of every Lecompton speech; it is the burden of the President's message; it is the staple of those editorials, able but utterly sophistical and fallacious, with which the Government organ abounds; it is the inspiration of its echoes all over the land. Cabinet officers ask, in their letters to political conclaves, "What right have those to complain who did not vote?" Custom-house officers join in the melody of this stereotyped tune; and postmasters, who do not swell the chorus with cordial alacrity, find their official windpipes suddenly stopped, so that others may sit in their gates and proclaim to the people this fundamental argument of Lecomptonism. The answer is plain, and I shall strive to make it thorough, although it will compel me to show that the President has either willfully, or, what is even worse, ignorantly, misstated historical facts.

It is not needful to speak at much length of the first important election in the Territory of Kansas, on the 30th of March, 1855, when the people, under the organic act, were called upon to elect their first Legislature. It was an election of vital, commanding importance. On that body would devolve the enactment of an entire civil, criminal, and miscellaneous code of laws, which would embody the wishes and protect the interests of the pioneer settlers of the Territory. It would also be required to enact statutes governing future elections, to appoint or provide for the election of the various county and township officers who were to assist in putting the machinery of government in operation; to establish counties and county seats; to select a site for the capital; and, in a word, by representatives fairly chosen, to concentrate the popular will into a body, which, in every free land, speaks with potential voice, because it springs from the hearts and votes of the people for whom it acts. Need I repeat the history of that organized invasion from a neighboring State, as large in numbers as the army with which Zachary Taylor achieved the crowning victory of his life at Buena Vista; which, with all the equipage and paraphernalia of war, surrounded the various polls, drove the actual voters from their own ballot-boxes with violence and imprecations; forced unsubserving election judges to carry out their will, or, with pistols at their breasts, gave them five minutes to die or to yield their places to their serviceable tools; stuffed the ballot-boxes with nearly five thousand fraudulent, illegal, ruffian votes, electing an entire pro-slavery Legislature, with the exception of a single representative from a distant precinct in the interior; and then returned to their Missouri homes with drums beating and banners flying, exulting over this unparalleled outrage which they hailed as a brilliant victory? Though at the risk of life, a few districts were contested, and new elections ordered, this bogus Legislature, when it met, promptly repudiated every one chosen at the second election, and installed in their stead the persons elected by the invading army, thus appropriately "perfecting their organization." And this was the first step in the progress of affairs which has so fittingly culminated in the Lecompton juggle, which, as it did not have the people for its sponsor at the baptismal font, appears before us with John Calhoun as its foster-father, and the President as its next friend, sticking closer than a brother.

I pass over, for the present, the infamous code of laws which this sham Legislature enacted, to oppress and degrade the free people, whose legislative rights it had so shamelessly stolen; (confessed by eminent Democratic Senators to be a disgrace to the age; and yet, which, enshrined and guaranteed and sustained as they are in the Lecompton constitution, do not render that instrument less palatable to these very same gentlemen now;) for I wish here specially to refer to the various elections which followed. Bold and reckless in their determination to maintain their ill-gotten power, this Territorial Legislature not only withheld from the people for two and a half years the election of all their county, township, and election officers, filling all these posts from the pitiful minority, which, with the power of the General Government at their back, sustained this shameless usurpation; but they fenced up the way to the ballot-boxes of future elections, by restrictions purposely intended to exclude and disfranchise the majority of the people of Kansas. Tax laws were passed, to defray the expenses, amongst other equally repulsive charges, of the so-called militia, who roamed over the Territory with Government muskets, harassing the free-State settlers, destroying and stealing their property, committing that last inexpressible outrage on their wives and daughters, sacking towns, and burning houses; and they made the payment of these taxes an essential prerequisite for the elective franchise. But worse than this even, they added unconstitutional test-oaths as another qualification, which they knew no free-State man, who was worthy to be called a man, would consent to take; and with these restrictions, and their own creatures presiding at the ballot-boxes, they felt that they were safe. Sir, these disgraceful facts, which banished from the polls the liberty-loving people of Kansas, cannot be unknown to the President; and yet, when speaking of the election of October, 1856, at which he claims that the people, at the polls, decided in favor of a constitutional convention, he coolly says:

"It is true that at this election the enemies of the Territorial Government did not vote. BECAUSE they were then engaged at Topeka," &c.—Congressional Globe edition, p. 5.

It is eminently fitting that the first point in favor of the legality and regularity of the Lecompton constitution, which is cited by the President, should be a meager vote at ballot-boxes not presided over by impartial judges chosen by the people, but guarded by the tools of the usurpation, and hedged in by test-oaths, which even the usurping despot of France has not yet imposed on the voters of his empire.

The convention having been thus called, the usurping Legislature, yet unwilling to concede the people a fair, honest, open ballot-box, though compelled, as they were that winter, to repeal the test-oath, by the odium which it had justly incurred, looked around for some new plan to prevent a free-State majority, and at last devised the registry, which should limit the franchise at the election of delegates to those who were placed upon it, and which is well known in Kansas history as the census swindle. No other State constitution had ever thus been framed—utterly disfranchising, as this enactment did, every voter whom hostile officers, not elected by the people, either neglected or refused to enroll. Besides the nineteen counties, whose people were all ignored, and the facts in regard to which are now so well known to the public, the registry in the other counties shows that there was a method in their madness and wickedness. In the flourishing town of Topeka, not a soul was enrolled. In Leavenworth, all the workmen in the pro-slavery printing office were duly included in the registry, while not a single one in the free-State printing office was discoverable by the deputy sheriff. Henry J. Adams, the Mayor of Leavenworth itself, was omitted. So was Marcus J. Parrott, who, from his triumphant election here at the first fair election ever held in Kansas, the succeeding October, must have been known even then to some few citizens of the Territory, though the bogus officer was oblivious to his existence. Nay, more: this very official failed to find out that such a man lived in Leavenworth as his own landlord, Doctor Morris, who was, therefore, disfranchised by not being on his sacred registry, because he happened to prefer freedom to slavery. And Judge Johnson, of Kansas, a most unimpeachable witness, declares that of the nine thousand persons purported to be registered, from four to five thousand were citizens of Missouri, whose names were included expressly to be used in case they were needed at the ballot-box. And this census swindle is most appropriately another step in the fraudulent formation of this Lecompton constitution—of which the President, however, says in his message:

"It is impossible that any people could have proceeded with more regularity in the formation of a constitution than the people of Kansas have done."—Page 4.

This census having been thus completed, with half the counties omitted, the registry in the others, willfully and intentionally one-sided and fraudulent, and thousands of Missourians added to it to swell its aggregate and to make success certain in every possible contingency, the election of delegates was the next act in the drama.

And here I quote from the President's message, what he says of this election, as I am compelled to make a direct issue with him upon the facts involved, and shall produce my testimony to disprove his allegations. Says the President:

"The enemies of the territorial government determined still to resist the authority of Congress. They refused to vote for delegates to the convention; not because, from circumstances which I need not detail, there was an omission to register the comparatively few voters who were inhabitants of certain counties of Kansas in the early spring of 1857; but because they had predetermined, at all hazards, to adhere to their revolutionary organization, and defeat the establishment of any other constitution than that which they had framed at Topeka. The election was, therefore, suffered to pass by default; but of this result the qualified electors, who refused to vote, can never justly complain."—Page 5.

I could answer this by saying that, as all three sessions of the Thirty-Fourth Congress had expired, without the passage of any of the acts proposed in either House, to authorize the formation of a State constitution, those who thereupon declined to participate in the unauthorized action of the Territorial Legislature for that purpose, really maintained, instead of resisting, "the authority of Congress." But I put the issue with the President on even higher grounds, on the very facts alleged in his statement.

On the 24th of April last, acting Governor Stanton, within a few days after his arrival in Kansas, having heard as yet only the apocryphal statements of the enslavers of that Territory, the leaders of that minority which basked in the sunshine of presidential favor, proceeded to Lawrence and there, at the request of its citizens, made a public address. He concedes now, with a frankness that does him honor, that he had not, for several months after this time, any conception of the enormity of the minority, who having, by fraud and violence obtained possession of the forms of law, used them systematically for still further injustice to the rights of the people. But like a bold and brave man, as he is, he frankly told the citizens of Lawrence that he had come to Kansas determined to enforce the territorial laws. He was met by equally resolute replies, that while they would submit, as they always did, to any oppression by the officers or soldiers of the United States Government, no power on earth could induce or compel them to yield allegiance to a felon code, imposed on them by a foreign invasion, which had driven them from their own ballot-boxes with contumely and violence, and then used the power they had stolen to oppress and degrade those they had robbed. But having appealed to them to redress their grievances, if they had any, at the polls, he was surprised to find the free-State leaders willing and even anxious to do so if a fair and honest election was guaranteed. He asked them to put their proffer in writing, and the next day it was done. Although this was extensively published in the newspaper press of the day, and I have one here with me to prove this fact, and to show that the proffer was not kept a secret, I prefer to read it from an attested manuscript copy, furnished me by Governor Robinson, who heads its list of signatures:

LAWRENCE, April 25, 1857.

DEAR SIR: In your address to the people of Lawrence, last evening, we understood you to say, in substance, that you would enforce the laws enacted by a Legislature elected by the people of an adjoining State, until they should be repealed; also, if the laws are unjust or distasteful, our remedy is the ballot-box. History has indelibly recorded the fact, which General McLean admitted in our presence last evening, that the ballot-box was taken from the people of Kansas Territory on the 30th March, 1853, and has not to this day been returned. From that time until the present, the people have had no voice whatever in making laws, or in selecting officers to administer them, notwithstanding the world-wide declaration by the Administration at Washington, and its friends elsewhere, that the people should be perfectly free to regulate their own institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States.

We are now invited to participate in an election of delegates to a convention, to meet September next, to frame a constitution and State government. We are told that the election law is a good one; that the voice of the actual settlers can be heard at the polls, and that justice will be meted out to all parties. We regret that the past conduct of the officers to superintend this election has not been such as to permit us to believe that they will secure a fair vote of the people, and the fact that many well-known citizens in Kansas are omitted from the registry list, and that as well known citizens and residents of Missouri are registered, is conclusive proof to us that a fair election is not intended and will not be permitted by the officers who have thus far had the matter in charge. But if a fair election is intended, notwithstanding the body of men calling it was not elected by the people of Kansas, and notwithstanding the people have already framed a constitution of which a large majority approve, we, the undersigned, are willing to overlook the past, and go into the election of delegates to a constitutional convention, should a convention of the people of Kansas convene, if the following course be adopted by the officers of the election, to wit:

First. Two persons shall be selected in each township or district to correct the registry list, one by the pro-slavery and one by the free-State party, who shall proceed in company to take the census and register all legal voters, and the probate judges shall correct the first lists, and the apportionment of delegates shall be made according to the returns thus made.

Second. Four judges of election shall be selected for each voting precinct, two of the pro-slavery and two of the free-State party, and the names of three of said judges shall be required to have a certificate of election to entitle a person to a seat in the convention.

We think that your Excellency will at once perceive that some such course must be pursued to correct the list, or no correction can be made. We are informed by credible reports that, in some districts, non-residents to the number of thousands have already been registered, while actual free-State settlers have been refused; and how clear can the lists be corrected than by a retaking of the census by some person or persons who have regard for an oath? Testimony of a negative character can avail nothing; and to obtain positive testimony with reference to the residence of those enlisted from another State, would be impossible in the short time remaining before the election.

That you have the power to take any course you may think proper to secure a fair election, we have no doubt. It is not material that the letter of the law calling the election should be strictly followed; indeed, no law at all is requisite, so that the will of a majority of the people can be ascertained. Congress can give legality to a constitution formed in accordance with a previous territorial act or without one; and we trust your Excellency will restore the ballot-box to the people of Kansas in all its purity, at any risk of informality on minor and non-essential provisions of the election regulations.

Very respectfully, your obedient servants.

Hon. F. P. STANTON, Acting Governor, Kansas Territory.

A true copy. Attest: S. C. Smith.

I submit this frank and manly document as proof beyond all contradiction that the charge of the President, reiterated in the report of the Senate's Territorial Committee, is not in accordance with the facts as they exist. All that the leading free-State men asked or desired was a perfect registry and an honest election. Though the majority of the people, they claimed only equal rights with their opponents—one man of each party to fill up the registry, and make the census complete. The probate judge, the very officer and the only one authorized by the law to correct the census, to add to it the names of the citizens thus mutually ascertained by a chosen representative of the two contending parties in each precinct, and each party to have one half of the election judges. What could have been fairer, if an honest, unfettered expression of all the legal voters of Kansas was really desired? And even if the requirement in the election law for three election judges forbade their equal division, and the addition of one to each election board was considered impracticable, the completion and filling up of the registry, which was to be the test of the elective franchise, was perfectly attainable, for the election was not to be held for fifty-three days afterwards.

It is well known in Kansas that Governor Stanton was struck, as he might well have been, with the fairness and justice of this proffer, and promised them a reply in writing. This, to use the language of the President in arguing this very point, "was the propitious moment for settling all difficulties in Kansas." But when Governor Stanton returned to Leecompton, and consulted with the men there who had taken such pains thus far to stifle the honest expression of the popular will so as to perpetuate their ill-gotten power, they insisted on its refusal; and five days afterwards he replied in an argumentative letter, declining to interpose his authority, without which the plan had no prospect of accomplishment. And a month later, the apportionment was made; that apportionment which Governor Stanton has so frankly declared he would have utterly refused to proclaim, if he had then known what he has since learned, the base plot of the engineers of this gigantic fraud. I do not allude to this refusal to arraign the conduct of Governor Stanton, much as it is to be regretted, but to show that it was the furthest thing possible from the wish of the enslavers of Kansas, who were then his only counselors, to allow even a single fair opportunity of voting to be given, in the whole procession of events, which culminated in the Leecompton constitution. And in full view of this fact, is it not extraordinary, to say the least, that a committee in the other end of the Capitol, who knew of this correspondence, as they quoted copiously from Governor Stanton's reply to this proffer, should use the following language afterwards in their report:

"The people having, by a direct vote, ordered the calling of a convention to form a constitution, the abolition agitators and disturbers refused to vote at the election of members of said convention, and then, after an obstinate refusal, raised an outcry that the convention was unjustly constituted inasmuch as they were not represented therein."—Senate Report, p. 14.

And this same idea is even more offensively repeated in a subsequent part of the report:

"So, again, when the members of the convention were elected, the abolitionists shrunk from the contest. So, also, when the question came up whether there should or should not be a clause retained in the constitution allowing slavery to be established in Kansas, they again shrunk from the contest, conscious of their weakness, or from sinister political design."—Senate Report, p. 16.

The election was held; but during its pendency, Democratic meetings resolved and reresolved and promised over and over again that the constitution when formed should be submitted for ratification or rejection to a full vote of the people. Numerous candidates for delegates, including the man who walks the streets of this city, with the entire and despotic power in his own hands, of deciding who shall be the Governor, State officers, and Legislature of the new State of Kansas, solemnly pledged themselves to the same action, and declared that the rumored intention to withhold the constitution from the popular verdict was all a Republican lie. Governor Walker and Governor Stanton traversed the Territory, reiterating the pledge that the people should have the opportunity of deciding for or against the organic law, under which they were to live, before it should be submitted to Congress. And the following extract from the instructions of the Administration to Governor Walker was presented to the people of Kansas as a voucher more solemn and sacred than any other which could possibly be given:

"When such constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

I look in vain in the President's Leecompton message for this most important point in the history which he has written for our instruction, of the constitution which he presses upon us for adoption. But the people, who regard presidential pledges as of too much importance and solemnity to be cast aside, like actors' robes, after they have accomplished their purpose, find in this, which I have quoted, the following points, which Presidents, Senators, Representatives, or organs cannot write down:

1. That on March 30, 1857, the President of the United States regarded a submission of the constitution to a popular vote as a "RIGHT."

2. That this "right" extended to "voting FOR OR AGAINST THAT INSTRUMENT."

3. That to "interrupt" "the fair expression of the popular will" is nothing less than "FRAUD."

I appeal, therefore, from the Leecompton message to the presidential instructions to his Executive in Kansas—from the James Buchanan of March, 1858, to the James Buchanan of March, 1857; and I have no fears of the popular verdict on that appeal.

I pass rapidly over the subsequent history. The delegates elected by an aggregate vote, not equal to a common county in all, assemble at Leecompton and adjourn over till after the election of October, 1857. For the first time in Kansas a fair election was held. The free-State men swept the field; and though the old game of fraud was played to the last, by forged returns, which, if admitted, would have continued the legislative power of the Territory in the hands of the reckless men whom the people, by an overwhelming vote, had repudiated, the convention reassembled with a full and unmistakable knowledge of the actual will of the people whom they pretended to represent. I intend to speak hereafter of some of the details of the instrument they framed; but I wish to devote this part of my remarks to the history of the elections, by virtue of which this constitution is now here, and which the President eulogizes as so fairly conducted that it would be impossible for the people to have proceeded more regularly in this work. Instead of either framing their constitution in accordance with the known will of the people who were to live under it, or submitting it when framed to their adoption or rejection, they outraged their own pledges—the pledges of the executive officers in Kansas, which they heard made to the people without dissent—and the pledges of the President, by submitting it "for the constitution with slavery," or "for the constitution with no slavery;" and fettering even this restricted choice by the extraordinary provision that no one should be allowed to vote at all unless he was willing to take an oath to support the yet unadopted constitution under the pains and penalties of perjury. I must quote here again from the President:

"The question of slavery was submitted to an election of the people of Kansas, on the 21st December last, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution. Here again a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question in their own way; and this restore peace to the distracted Territory; but they again refused to exercise their right of popular sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default." * * * "They did not think proper to submit the whole of this constitution to a popular vote; but they did submit the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State to the people."

The President must have read the Leecompton constitution; and have seen there that even if "constitution with no slavery" was adopted, it was still expressly enacted in the schedule that, notwithstanding that vote, "the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with"—(Section seven of schedule); and again, in section fourteen of schedule, that whatever amendments may hereafter be adopted to the constitution, "no alteration shall ever be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." And yet, though he argues, with apparent gratification, that "Kansas is, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina," he declares (even in full view of these provisions in the Kansas constitution, which every voter who approached the ballot-box was compelled to ratify if he voted at all, and swear to support besides) that the convention fairly submitted to the people the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State!

An important point must not be omitted in this rapid review: that no instance exists, during our entire history as a nation, that I can find by the most diligent search, where a special clause of a new constitution was submitted to a popular vote, that the whole instrument was not also submitted to the same ordeal at the same time. And the reason is, that nowhere else in this whole land have the framers of a constitution sought or desired to impose it upon a people against their well-known hatred and detestation of its provisions. Where constitutions, in previous generations, have not been submitted to the people, it has been where the assent to their principles on the part of the people has been well known and undeniable. This Leecompton fraud is, I rejoice to say, the first instance of the kind in our country, and I trust that it will be so utterly repudiated that it will be the last. My views in regard to the extension of slavery are known to my fellow-members, and need not be repeated; for this is not a question whether Africans are to be slaves, but whether freemen, of your own race and color, are to be made the serfs of the Leecompton usurpers: whether, in a word, the majority of the people of Kansas have any rights that Congress is bound to respect.

Resuming this almost completed history of Kansas elections, I must quote a remarkable admission of the President, where he is speaking of the future power of the people to amend the constitution—an admission which destroys his whole case, utterly and irretrievably:

"The will of the majority is supreme and irresistible when expressed in an orderly and lawful manner. They can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure. It would be absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove."—Leecompton Message, p. 7.

The President's whole argument, previous to this admission, was that the Legislature, having passed an act calling a constitutional convention, had thereby surrendered to that body all power over the instrument they were commissioned to make; but I meet him on this new ground that he has taken, and ask, in his own language, if it is not "absurd to say that they can impose fetters upon their own power which they cannot afterwards remove?" What are the facts? Before any vote was taken upon the constitution—before, by its own terms, it had gone into effect, or possessed the slightest vitality—for, by section sixteen of the schedule, it was "to be in force from and after its ratification by the people as hereinbefore provided"—the same legislative authority which called it into existence, convened and ordered a vote of the people for or against its adoption; and, on the 4th of January, a majority of ten thousand of the people of Kansas branded it with an indignant repudiation. If their previous action, therefore, had been construed to impose any "fetters" upon the people, their action before the convention's election on the 21st of December removed these fetters, and enabled the people to speak their will unmistakably.

But again: if a Legislature of the people, after a constitution has been adopted, ratified, and confirmed, both at home and by Congress and the Executive, have then the power to proceed, contrary to the terms of the instrument itself, in the necessary steps to amend or overthrow it, as the President argues "the Legislature already elected may, at its very first session," proceed to do, is it not extraordinary that they have not this same power before it has gone into force at all? Is not this position, to use the President's expressive language, "absurd?"

But I have still another point to make, on this head, which will leave the President and his friends no room to escape from the position he has taken above. They may say that the language is that "the will of the majority" must be "expressed in an orderly and lawful manner;" and that the election of the 4th of January does not comply with this condition. The President, in his message, though refusing, as he did also in his instructions to Governor Denver, to recognize its result as material, says, "it was peaceably conducted, under my instructions." But still more conclusive is the following extract from the instructions to Governor Denver, which were dated December 11, 1857, ten days before there had been any voting on the constitution at all, in full view of the fact that a bill would probably be passed by the Legislature authorizing the people to vote for or against it. Speaking of the Governor's duty, the instructions say:

"It extends, of course, to the protection of all citizens in the exercise of their just rights, and applies to one legal election as well as to another. The Territorial Legislature doubtless convened on the 7th instant, and while it remains in session its members are entitled to be secure and free in their deliberations. A rightful action must also be respected. Should it authorize an election by the people for any purpose, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention. While the peace of the Territory is preserved and the freedom of election is secure, there need be no fear of disastrous consequences."

"From whatever quarter it is attempted to interfere by violence with the elections authorized by the constitutional convention, or which may be authorized by the Legislature, the attempt must be resisted, and the security of the elections maintained."

Whatever, therefore, the President may argue as to the inefficacy of that vote, these instructions recognize it as a "LEGAL ELECTION," as a "just right" of the people, as a "rightful action by the Legislature," and as entitled to precisely the same protection as the elections authorized by the convention. And this being conceded by the President, I contend that that election is decisive of "the will of the majority," that that will has been "expressed in an orderly and lawful manner;" that the people, whom the President says "can make or unmake constitutions at pleasure," have decidedly unmade this one at an election "peaceably conducted under the President's instructions;" and that if they ever did "impose fetters upon their own power," by authorizing this convention to meet, it is "absurd" to say that they "cannot afterwards remove" them, as they have done so decisively by repudiating the convention's work.

I must, before passing to another point, expose the absolute and emphatic contradiction, on a vital point, of the two champions in Congress of this Leecompton constitution. I allude to the authors of the senatorial report from the Committee on Territories, and the yet undelivered House report from the select Kansas committee, as published by its author, Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in the Union. It is in regard to the right and power of the Legislature calling the convention, to restrict its authority, or to stipulate, in advance, that their work should be submitted to the popular vote.

Says Senator GREEN, of Missouri, in his report, speaking of the failure to require the submission of the constitution:

"If the Legislature could direct the convention what they should do on one subject, it might with equal propriety have given commands on all other subjects. This would have been a flagrant violation of all rules of right and of justice to the people."

I would respectfully suggest that, before these champions of convention omnipotence go before the people on this issue, they should revise their reports so as to make them agree instead of antagonizing on this essential question; and settle the point, whether a condition that a constitution should be submitted to the people who are to live under it, would or would not be "a flagrant violation of all rules of right and of justice to the people."

The next question which confronts us in the discussion of this question is, whether the constitution is "republican in form." The report of the Senate's Committee on Territories, on page 10, after discussing the slavery clause, says:

"No real or valid exception can be taken to any other part of the constitution. On this subject President Buchanan has well said, in his message:

"In fact, the general provisions of our recent State constitutions, after an experience of eighty years, are so similar and so excellent, that it would be difficult to go far wrong at the present day in framing a new constitution."

Yes, Mr. Buchanan; but if there is one provision, more than another, in our recent State constitutions, in which there has been a universal concurrence of sentiment, it has been in their submission to the people. All parties, all sections, all States, have agreed upon this "excellent" provision. Though in the earlier days of the Republic, when the public sentiment was unequivocal, State constitutions were allowed to go into operation, by general consent and universal acquiescence, yet, for over twenty years, no constitution has gone into operation, in any new State or old, without having been submitted to the ordeal of a popular ratification or rejection. This forms the only exception, during the present generation; and the following reason, very frankly given by the President, on page 4 of his Leecompton message, does not strike me as either "excellent" or truly Democratic:

"Had the whole Leecompton constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this [the Topeka] organization would doubtless have voted against it."

But, sir, besides the fact that the constitution is not really republican, because it does not represent the actual and well-known will of the people, I dissent from the senatorial report, in its assumption that "no real or valid exception can be taken to any other part of the constitution," besides its provisions in favor of perpetual and irrepealable slavery.

And first, the constitution flatly contradicts itself on a most essential point. In section one, of article seven, it is declared that "the right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction"—a new higher law; while section two, article twelve, authorizes even a soulless corporation to take and pay for private property, even against the consent of the owner, if a jury, which is usually rather inferior in power to a constitution, only consents.

And secondly, these sagacious constitution-makers, in their deep interest for the people, enact in section five of article twelve, that no bank bill shall go into force unless it is submitted to a vote of the people, after its passage by the Legislature, and shall be approved by a majority of the electors voting at such elections, while they themselves refuse to submit their own work, binding up though it does all the institutions, the legislation, and the interests of the people, to this test which they command hereafter, on a single question. Such gross and shameless inconsistency cannot receive the sanction of my vote. To be consistent with their idea of a "fair submission," they should have provided that the Legislature should order a vote "for banks with branches," and "for banks without branches," and exclude all votes of anti-bank men by requiring the voters to swear fealty to the banks before they could be allowed to choose between the two.

And thirdly, a single word in this constitution indicates the animus of its framers. The Constitution of the United States allows the writ of habeas corpus to be suspended only "in cases of rebellion or invasion;" but the Kansas constitution (section fourteen, bill of rights) authorizes it to be suspended "in cases of rebellion, insurrection, or invasion." The unconstitutional addition of that single word, "INSURRECTION," so capable of latitudinous construction, becomes doubly significant when we remember what these same men have considered "insurrections" during the past four years. And section twelve allows them also to dispense with grand juries or impeachments, even in capital or infamous offenses, "in cases of rebellion, insurrection, or invasion." With the habeas corpus, indictments, and impeachments, all brushed aside, they can indeed be "a law unto themselves," and become the irresponsible and unrestricted Robespierres of the State.

And fourthly, in full view of the fact that, before the constitution was framed, or even fairly commenced, the people, by a vote six times greater than that by which the delegates had been chosen, had elected a Legislature, which, by the act of Congress, approved by the President, had been clothed with full power of legislation on all rightful subjects, they attempted to legislate through their constitution, even before its ratification by Congress, and to trammel and restrict the legal power and authority of a legislative body, whose commissions sprang from as high an authority, at least, as theirs. They declare, in section two of the schedule, that all laws then in force shall continue in full force until the State Legislature, to be elected under the constitution, should assemble. Such arrogance is in fit unison with the conduct of the reckless men who framed this instrument in open, undisguised contempt of the known will of Kansas, and who ask us to force it down the throats of the people they seek to punish by its adoption. But there is an object in this, and it was to prevent the repeal or amendment of that atrocious code which for years this usurpation had been vainly striving to enforce on the people of Kansas. Some of its features I quote from a speech I had the honor of delivering during the last Congress; and those who vote to ratify this rejected constitution, give their willing suffrages to also maintain and uphold those laws which the constitution so jealously preserves from amendment or repeal:

"I will now invite your attention to a contrast in the penal code of this Territory, singular in its character, to say the very least. Section five of the act punishing offenses against slave property, page 604, enacts as follows:

"If any person shall aid or assist in enticing, decoying, or persuading, or carrying away, or sending out of this Territory, any slave belonging to another, with intent to procure or effect the freedom of such slave, or with intent to deprive the owner thereof of the services of such slave, he shall be adjudged guilty of grand larceny, and on conviction thereof shall suffer death, or be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than ten years."

"A person who, by a pro-slavery packed jury, is convicted of aiding in persuading out of the Territory a slave belonging to another, is to suffer at least twice as severe a penalty as he who is convicted of committing the vilest outrage that the mind of man can conceive of on the person of your wife, sister, or daughter! Nay, the contrast is still stronger. The jury, in the first instance, are authorized even to inflict the punishment of death—in the latter, see page 208, the penalty is 'not less than five years.' Such is the contrast in Kansas between the protection of a wife's or daughter's honor and happiness, and that which is thrown as a protectingegis over the property of the slaveholder!

"Again, on page 208, you will find that the ruffian who commits malicious mayhem, that is, without provocation, knocks you down in the street, cuts off your nose and ears, and plucks out your eyes, is punished 'not less than five nor more than ten years;' the same degree of punishment that is meted out in section seven of the above act, page 605, on a person who should aid, or assist, or even 'harbor,' an escaped slave!"

"On page 209, you will find that the man who sits at your bedside, when you are prostrated by disease, and, taking advantage of your confidence and helplessness, administers poison to you, but whereby death does not happen to ensue, is to be punished 'not less than five nor more than ten years,' though it is murder in the heart, if not the deed. And this is precisely the same penalty as that prescribed by the eleventh section (quoted in my remarks above on the five violations of the Constitution) against one who but brings into the Territory any book, paper, or handbill containing any 'sentiment' calculated, in the eyes of a pro-slavery jury, to make slaves 'disorderly.' The man who takes into the Territory Jefferson's 'Notes on Virginia' can be, under this law, hurried away to the chain gang, and manacled, arm to arm, with the murderous poisoner."

"On page 210, the kidnapping and confinement of a free white person, for any purpose, even, if a man, to sell him into slavery, or, if a woman, for a still baser purpose, is to be punished 'not exceeding ten years.' Decoying and enticing away a child under twelve years of age from its parents, 'not less than six months, and not exceeding five years.' But decoying and enticing (mark the similarity of the language!) a slave from his master is punished by death or confinement not less than ten years. Here is the section, page 634:

"Sec. 4. If any person shall entice, decoy, or carry away out of this Territory, any slave belonging to another, with intent to deprive the owner thereof of the services of such slave, or with intent to effect or procure the freedom of such slave, he shall be adjudged guilty of grand larceny, and, on conviction thereof, shall suffer death, or be imprisoned at hard labor for not less than ten years."

And fifthly, this constitution, section three, article ten, expressly empowers the Legislature, besides poll taxes, income taxes, and uniform taxation on property of all kinds, to levy additional taxes on "all persons pursuing any occupation, trade, or profession." Under this, the gentleman or the sluggard, who is too wealthy or too lazy to work, is to be exempt from this tax on industry, while the mechanic, the laborer, the manufacturer—in a word, the men who earn their living by the sweat of their brow—are to pay a tax for so doing, over and above all the other taxes which they share in common with their fellow-citizens of every degree. Before I will vote to ratify or indorse so shameless and insulting a discrimination against the free laborers and working men of Kansas, my tongue shall palsy in my mouth. Let gentlemen on the other side, who insist that we cannot look behind the constitution to see how it was formed or adopted, shut their eyes, if they can, to this unreplicable provision which stares on them from its face.

Nor is this all. The Leecompton delegates appeared as anxious to rob the United States of their lands in the Territory as they had the people of Kansas of their rights. And they have sent us an ordinance declaring that, to induce the new State to yield the right she claims of taxing the unsold Government lands within her borders, four sections out of each township, instead of the usual number of one, must be given her for schools; all the salt, gold, silver, and lead mines; seventy-two sections for a college, and an enormous railroad grant besides of alternate sections of land, for a breadth of twenty-four miles wide through the Territory from east to west, and another of the same extent from north to south. It is well known that this wholesale "land-grab" would kill the Lecompton constitution in Congress, if coupled with it here; and hence the President has sent it to us in a separate form from the main body of the constitution itself; and the Senate report says:

"The committee do not approve the ordinance accompanying the constitution, and report against its allowance; but they do not regard it as any part of the constitution, nor will its approval or disapproval by Congress affect the validity of that constitution if the State be admitted into the Union as recommended."

The friends of this Lecompton fraud cannot, however, rid themselves of this undesirable handiwork of the usurpers. I shall prove that it is part and parcel of the constitution, inseparable from it, and will be ratified fully and unequivocally if the State is admitted. For—

1. It is part of the proffer made by the framers of the Lecompton constitution, on which they agree to come into the Union.

2. It was framed by a body whose only authority was to prepare a constitution.

But still higher and more indisputable authority is the positive testimony of the chief conspirator, their own witness, John Calhoun, president of the convention and bearer of the constitution, whose official certificate they are, by their own argument, "estopped" from looking behind. I quote this certificate, attached to the ordinance, from page 48, Senate report:

"J. CALHOUN,

"President Constitutional Convention.

"LECOMPTON, Kansas Territory, January 14, 1858."

"Submitted as part of the constitution by the convention." Gentlemen, can you escape that? Your Senate committee, in the teeth of this, and to avoid saddling this extra weight on your consciences, may say "they do not regard it as any part of the constitution." But the Lecompton convention declares that it is. Its President and mouthpiece certifies most unequivocally that it is. Nay, more: he says it was part of the constitution which was submitted by the convention. It has been ratified by the people, therefore, exactly as much as any other part. It is of as much validity as any other section or article. You cannot, you say, vary in the slightest degree from the action of the convention, not even to consult the popular will, not even to adopt the constitution, subject to its satisfactory ratification hereafter. Then you cannot vary their proffer to you. You cannot accept part of the constitution and reject part. The ordinance is declared in an official certificate of the President of the convention which framed it to be "part of the constitution;" and you will be compelled, therefore, when you strike down the rights of the people of Kansas, to strike, at the same time, a heavy blow at the rights and interests of your constituents there, and to sanction a land-theft that, uncoupled from this model constitution, would not command five votes in this body.

I have not time to notice other provisions equally objectionable, but which have been already widely criticised and condemned; and I must hasten to another branch of the discussion.

The report of the majority of the select committee of this House, as published by Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, insists that no further enabling act was necessary to authorize the formation of a State constitution than the original Kansas-Nebraska law itself. In order not to do him injustice, I quote his exact language:

"Another objection of the same class is, that no enabling act was passed by Congress; or, in other words, that the Legislature of Kansas did not have the legal right to call the convention that formed the constitution. This objection is equally untenable both on principle and authority. The power to call a convention to form a State constitution is clearly within the rightful subjects of legislation granted in the organic act."

Others in debate, in both branches of Congress, have deduced the argument that a congressional enabling act was unnecessary, because of the following language in another section of the Kansas-Nebraska bill:

"And when admitted as a State or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."—United States Laws, vol. 10, p. 283.

But these gentlemen, perhaps, forget that precisely the same argument would authorize Utah to demand admission without any previous enabling act. The language of her organic act, on this point, is exactly the same as that of Kansas, and I copy it here to prove the fact:

"And, when admitted as a State, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission."—United States Laws, vol. 9, p. 453.

But, I prefer to meet the gentleman from Georgia on his own ground, where he finds the power, as above quoted from his report, in the following section of the organic act:

"Sec. 24. That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."—United States Laws, vol. 10, p. 285.

Passing over the question whether the overthrow of the territorial government established by Congress, is a "rightful subject of legislation, consistent with the provisions of this act," which established it, I reply to the gentleman from Georgia, that Utah has precisely the same authority, in the following section of her organic act:

"Sec. 6. The legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation, consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."—United States Laws, vol. 9, p. 454.

Do the gentleman from Georgia, and the other prominent champions of the Administration, dare to stand by their own argument when applied to the Territory of Utah? Will they maintain, while asking us for appropriations for the Army which is to assist in sustaining and upholding the new territorial officers there, that the whole territorial government itself can be superseded or trammelled by the spontaneous formation of a State constitution in Utah, and the Lecompton-like election, before even the instrument itself is submitted to our inspection of a governor, state officers, judiciary, and Legislature? And yet the language of the two acts being identical on the very point where he finds the authority for Kansas, he must acknowledge its fallacy, or concede a license to Utah utterly destructive of the national authority in that rebellious Territory.

I leave the gentleman from Georgia to select whichever horn of this dilemma he chooses, and ask attention to the two following extracts from the speeches of distinguished advocates of Lecompton upon this floor.

The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR,] in his speech on the 18th of January, lays down the following proposition:

"The people act in their sovereign capacity when they elect delegates; and the delegates thus elected and convened are, for all practical purposes, identical with the people. Sir, I take higher grounds. I hold that the highest embodiment of sovereignty, the most imposing political assemblage known to our Constitution and laws, is a convention of the people legally assembled, not en masse—for such an assemblage is unknown in our representative system—but by their delegates, legally elected. When such a body, with no declared limitation upon their powers, are deputed to form a constitution, and they execute their trust, the constitution, ipso facto, becomes the supreme law of the land, unquestionable and unchangeable by any power on earth, save that which ordained it."

"It [Kansas] is no longer a Territory of these United States. She has, by your own authority and permission, thrown off the habiliments of territorial dependence, and stands now a State, clothed with all the attributes and powers of a State, and asks admission as an equal in this noble confederation of sovereignties. You may reject her application, if you will; but it will be at your own peril. To remand her to her territorial condition you cannot, any more than you can roll back to their hidden sources the waters of the Mississippi. Kansas is a separate, organized, living State, with all the nerves and arteries of life in full development and vigorous activity. Between your laws and her people she can interpose the broad and radiant shield of State sovereignty, and may laugh to scorn your enabling acts."

The gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] just a month later, declared himself also as follows:

"When the Kansas and Nebraska bill was passed, this doctrine of the right of the people in the Territory to establish a slave or a free State, and be admitted into the Union free from all congressional interference, was adopted as a fundamental principle. That bill declares that Kansas, as well as Nebraska, has the right of admission into the Union as a sovereign State, with or without slavery, according to the legally-expressed will of the majority of her people.

Kansas to-day presents herself at the door of this Hall with her constitution, and demands admission into the Union."

"If the organic act establishing a territorial government for Kansas was, as I contend, an enabling act, then she is to-day a sovereign independent State, and the Federal territorial officers should be instantly withdrawn. She is a free, independent, sovereign State, outside of the Union, and by the consent of Congress."

These, sir, are bold sentiments, daringly expressed. But when you apply to them the touchstone of Utah, their monstrous character, their fatal results, are plainly exhibited to all men. Even their authors themselves would shrink from carrying them out. No more dangerous blow could be wielded at the authority of the Federal Government in our Territories than this. Indorse them by your ratification of the Lecompton constitution, for which they are the chief argument, and you, gentlemen of the opposite side of the House, will be responsible for the consequences in the other Territory which you are striving to force back to its allegiance. In the path that these gentlemen have marked out for him Brigham Young can walk, and doubtless will. With precisely the same enabling act that Kansas has, a vote of the people could be at once taken on the propriety of forming a State constitution; an election of delegates to a constitutional convention ordered by a unanimous vote of the Kansas Legislature, even over the Governor's veto, as the Lecompton act itself was; a constitution framed, fair and republican on its face; the whole completed within a very few months; and if Congress rejected it, the rulers of Utah could tell you, in the language of Mr. LAMAR, that they are "no longer a Territory of the United States;" that "you cannot remand them to their territorial condition;" that "between your laws and her people she will interpose the broad and radiant shield of State sovereignty;" and, in the language of Mr. SHORTER, she could declare herself "a sovereign, independent State," and could demand that "the Federal territorial officers should be instantly withdrawn."

Do you say in reply, gentlemen on the other side, that these are speeches of only two members of your party, and do not bind the whole? I will give you, in addition, the even weightier declarations of the authorized exponents of your party, the organs of the Senate and House committees on this subject, to show you to what arguments even your champions are compelled, in their attempts to vindicate this Lecompton constitution.

The senatorial Committee on Territories close their report with the following summing up of their argument:

"In conclusion, this committee is of opinion that when a constitution of a newly-formed State, created out of our own territory, is presented to Congress for admission into the Union, it is no part of the duty or privilege of Congress either to approve or disapprove the constitution itself, and its various provisions, or any of them, but simply to see whether it be the legal constitution of the new State; whether it be republican in form; whether the boundaries proposed be admissible; and whether the number of inhabitants be sufficient to justify independent State organization."

And the gentleman from Georgia, in his report from the select committee of this body, also declares:

"When a new State presents a constitution for admission, Congress has no more power to inquire into the manner of its adoption than the matter of its substance. The matter cannot be inquired into further than to see that it is republican in form; and the mode and manner of its adoption cannot be inquired into only so far as to see that it has been formed in such way as the people have legally established for themselves."

To such extraordinary positions do the necessities of this extraordinary case unwittingly hurry its ablest defenders. We, on the contrary, who do not believe that Congress is so powerless, so bereft of legislative discretion, so tongue-tied, that it has not even "the privilege" of saying "no," when a State asks for admission, would meet the application of Utah, did she come here with a constitution republican in form, with proper boundaries and sufficient people, as we meet this Lecompton fraud—by the declaration that, in the exercise of our power and authority, we decline admitting you into the partnership of States, and remand you, for reasons good and sufficient to ourselves, to your territorial condition. You, gentlemen, however, will be "estopped" by the doctrines you have deliberately indorsed; and having ratified the humiliating declaration of the Senate's report, that it is neither your duty, nor even your "privilege," to look behind a constitution fair on its face, even if you know it be a "whited sepulcher," you will have to welcome Utah into the Confederacy, as the first fruits of your Lecompton doctrine of 1858, with Brigham Young and Heber C. Kimball in your national Senate, to assist you in applying it to still other Territories of this Union.

Imagine, sir, George Washington sitting in the White House, that noble patriot, whose whole career is a brilliant illustration of honor and purity in high places: and who doubts that if such a constitution as this had been submitted to him for his sanction, he would have spurned from his door with contempt and scorn the messenger who bore it? Or, ask yourself what would have been the indignant answer of Thomas Jefferson, who proclaimed as the battle-cry of the Revolution that great truth enshrined in the Declaration which has made his name immortal, and which scattered to the winds the sophistries and technicalities of the royalists of our land, that "all Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed;" not the implied consent of enforced submission, but the actual, undeniable, unquestioned consent of the freemen who are to bear its burdens and enjoy its blessings. If a messenger had dared to enter the portals of the White House when that stern old man of iron will, Andrew Jackson, of Tennessee, lived within it, and asked him to give his indorsement and approval, the sanction of his personal character and official influence, to a constitution reeking with fraud, which its framers were seeking to enforce on a people who protested and denounced and loathed and repudiated it, and to go down to history as its voluntary advocate and champion, that messenger, I will warrant, would have remembered the torrent of rebuke with which he would have been overwhelmed, till the latest hour of his life.

I turn gladly, joyfully, from the consideration of the extraordinary arguments to which I have alluded, to a brighter, happier picture, if you will only allow it to be painted. The President complains that he is tired of Kansas troubles, and desires peace. How easy is it to be obtained? Not by forcing, with despotic power and hireling soldiery, a constitution hated and spurned by the people upon a Territory that will rise in arms against it; not by surrendering the power and authority of an infant State into the hands of a pitiful minority of its citizens, who, by oppressive laws, and persistently fraudulent elections, have continued to wield the power which a shameless usurpation originally gave them; but by simply asking the people of Kansas, under your own authority, if you insist on rejecting the vote authorized by their Legislature, the simple and yet essential question, "Do you desire Congress to ratify the Lecompton constitution, or the new constitution now being framed?" How easy is the pathway to peace, when justice is the guide! how rugged and devious the pathway of error when wrong lights the road of her followers with her lurid torch, I have endeavored to show.

The people of Kansas, through every possible avenue which has not been closed by their enslavers, have remonstrated to you against this great wickedness. By ten thousand majority at the polls; by the unanimous protest of their Legislature; by public meetings; by their newspaper press, and by the voice of their Delegate upon this floor, overwhelmingly elected less than six months past, they ask you to repudiate this fraud. Dragged here, bound hand and foot by a Government officer-holder; who, besides drawing his pay as surveyor general, acts also as president of the Lecompton convention; who becomes, by its insolent discarding of all your territorial officers, as well as the people's, the recipient of all the returns, fraudulent as well as genuine, and the canvasser of the votes—she appeals to you to release her from the grasp of this despot and dictator, and to let her go free. In the language of an eloquent and gifted orator of my own State, I say, "When she comes to us, let it be as a willing bride, and not as a fettered and manacled slave."

Mr. ADRAIN obtained the floor.

Mr. SCALES. If the gentleman will yield the floor I will move that the committee rise.

Mr. ADRAIN. If that be the disposition of the committee I will yield to the gentleman to submit that motion.

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. I hope not. There are many gentlemen here who wish to address the committee on this question, and I hope the committee will not rise.

Several MEMBERS. We will speak this evening.

Mr. MORGAN. Allow me to make a suggestion. If the committee is to continue in session I hope it will be the general understanding that no business will be transacted, so that those who wish to go may go, and those who wish to stay may remain.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no quorum present, and even if it were proposed, no business could be done.

Mr. MORGAN. A quorum might be gathered here.

Mr. FLORENCE. I can say, so far as this side is concerned, that there is no purpose on this side to transact business, if the committee remain in session. We do things on the square. I think the gentlemen on the other side may be assured that nothing will be done.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope that the understanding will be entertained, as many members desire to be heard, that this debate shall not be terminated for a day or two longer.

Mr. MORGAN. I only propose that, if the committee continue in session, there shall be no business transacted. There is no gentleman here who is authorized to speak for others.

Mr. FLORENCE. There seems to be a general understanding to that effect.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will consider that it is the understanding of the committee that no business shall be transacted this evening.

Mr. ADRAIN. Mr. Chairman, the Territory of Kansas has been the occasion of a long and deep excitement, and it was fondly hoped, on the accession of Mr. Buchanan to power, that peace and happiness would have been restored to that much-distracted Territory. It was no doubt his strong desire, as it was that of every good and patriotic citizen, that so great an object should be accomplished; and a policy was laid down which gave assurance that such would be the result. He selected, as Governor of that Territory, one of the most able, fearless, patriotic, and experienced statesmen of the country and the age. Relying fully on his sound judgment, integrity of purpose, and strong devotion to the sacred rights of the people, he sent him forth with such powers and bearing such instructions as promised every reasonable prospect of success. The Hon. Robert J. Walker, who was thus singled out as best fitted for this most delicate and responsible position, at an advanced stage of life, with comparatively feeble health, and at a great sacrifice of all the comforts and endearments of home, set forth on his most important and trying mission. He was now about to accomplish, if he could, what his predecessors in office had failed to effect. And many a man, with less energy of will, and less love of country, would have shrunk from the undertaking; but not fearing the result, with honest intentions, and confidently relying on the support and promises of the Administration, he went forth into Kansas; and soon, by his wise, peaceful, and judicious management, restored order and brought the people into quiet submission to his authority. He proclaimed to them a great principle—a principle not new, but old as the Government itself, and constituting the very corner-stone on which our political institutions rest—that the will of the people, the will of the majority, must and shall rule—that the people are sovereign, and have the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. And as the Territory was preparing to form itself into a State, and be admitted as such into this glorious Union, he declared that the constitution, framed by the delegates chosen for that purpose, should, and of right ought to be, submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. And, in making this declaration, he was but carrying out the policy agreed upon, on his accepting the office of Governor, as fully appears by his letter of acceptance and the instructions issued to him. In writing to Mr. Buchanan, he says:

"I understand that you and your Cabinet cordially concur in the opinion expressed by me, that the actual bona fide residents of the Territory of Kansas, by a fair and regular vote, unaffected by fraud or violence, must be permitted, in adopting their State constitution, to decide for themselves what shall be their social institutions. This is the great fundamental principle of the act of Congress organizing that Territory, affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States, and is in accordance with the views uniformly expressed by me throughout my public career. I contemplate a peaceful solution of this question by an appeal to the intelligence and patriotism of the people of Kansas, who should all participate fully and freely in this decision, and by a majority of whose votes the decision must be made, and by the only and constitutional mode of adjustment.

"I will go, then, and endeavor to adjust these difficulties, in the full confidence, as strongly expressed by you, that I will be sustained by all your own high authority, with the cordial cooperation of all your Cabinet."

And he was instructed, as follows:

"The institutions of Kansas should be established by the votes of the people of Kansas, unawed and uninterrupted by force and fraud.

"When such a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right to vote for or against the instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

But this convention failed to do what Governor Walker expected, and promised to the people would be done. The President was disappointed—the whole country was disappointed—and because the convention did not do what it ought to have done, a justly excited feeling of indignation has been aroused. It submitted to the people of that Territory but one single question, and that unfairly, without affording them an opportunity of deciding any other, or of rejecting the whole constitution if they pleased. This was not right. It was in violation of the direct promises of Governor Walker—of the clear and emphatic instructions of Mr. Buchanan; but above all of that great right guaranteed to the people by the Kansas and Nebraska act. This act gave them the right of determining not one, but all of their domestic institutions; it was full and complete, and not limited to the single question of negro slavery. And although much regretting to take a position not in accordance with the views of the President, yet feeling a deep and conscientious conviction that it rests on sound principles, I will stand by the right of popular sovereignty, the will of the majority; and as the Lecompton constitution does not embody or express the will of the majority of the people of Kansas, I shall vote against her unqualified admission as a State, with such a constitution, into this Union—a constitution stamped, as I conceive it to be, with gross wrong, injustice, and fraud, and not the people's choice. How can I consistently give my sanction to it? If I did, I could not return to my constituents and face them as an honest man and honest Democrat. They would turn upon me and say, "You proclaimed to us in your addresses during the presidential campaign, the popular sovereignty of the people, the right of the people in Kansas to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. We believed you, and elected you to Congress, and almost the first thing you do is to trample in the dust the principles you urged upon us with all the ability of which you were master; the fundamental principles on which the whole fabric of our political institutions rest." Such would be the greeting the Democracy and people of my district and State would give me. In New Jersey, sir, the right of popular sovereignty, the right of self-government, is strongly and deeply imbedded in the hearts and affection of her sons. It is a right which they early learned and early fought for; and New Jersey's soil is rich with some of the best blood of the American Revolution in defense of that right. The plains of Princeton, Trenton, and Monmouth, all tell of the heroic valor and patriotic devotion of the Jersey Blues. And coming, sir, as I do, from such glorious revolutionary soil, hallowed by so many blood-dyed battle-fields in defense of popular rights and popular liberty, I would be an unworthy son of that small but gallant State if I did not raise my voice in defense of the same great rights and same priceless liberty.

It shall be now my purpose, as briefly as possible, to give the reasons why I object to the present unqualified admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution.

The Democratic party, sir, is a party of truth, and has ever adhered to its principles and pledges, and this is the reason why it is now in the ascendancy in the country, and guiding the destinies of this great and prosperous people. Other political parties have arisen in the land, but their existence was brief, for the simple reason that their principles were only ephemeral and for a day, and not founded on truth and the rights of the people. But not so with the great party to which I claim to belong. It is the same party now that it was in the days of Jefferson, Jackson, and of Polk, and will continue to be the same party for years to come, if we only steadily adhere to the rights of the people and the fundamental principles of popular government; and it is because the unqualified admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution would be a gross departure from those great rights and principles, that I now object to it.

At the last presidential election, sir, which resulted in the elevation of Mr. Buchanan to the Presidency, the Democratic party proclaimed to the people a principle which it was pledged and bound to carry out. It was the principle of the Kansas and Nebraska act. Now, what was that principle which was proclaimed by all of our Democratic orators and presses, both North and South, East and West—a principle which entered so largely into that memorable contest? It was that the people of each State and Territory should have the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Federal Constitution. Now, by that act, was it intended that the negro question of slavery was the only one that the people of Kansas had the right to vote directly upon and to decide? The act speaks of "domestic institutions," which certainly embrace more than one—that of master and slave. If the distinguished author of that celebrated act had intended to limit and confine its meaning, he would have said the domestic institution of slavery, and then it would have been clear and specific. But this was not his meaning, nor his intention. It was broader, and embraced all domestic institutions of every kind and character. If the people of Kansas, then, by virtue of this act, had the right of voting on one question, why not on another? It is a very narrow and mistaken idea to suppose that the question of slavery was the only important one for the people of Kansas to decide by a direct vote. It is all true that it has been for some time past the most exciting and prominent one, overshadowing all the rest; but are the questions of public schools, banking, taxation, internal improvements, and the like, of no moment? These questions are of deep and vital importance to the people of Kansas, as they are to the people of every State in the Union; and ought they not to have the right of voting upon them, and deciding them for themselves? Are they not questions which have deeply excited the people of the several States, giving rise to most important discussion, and diverse opinions? What question can be more important and interesting to the people of Kansas than that of common schools—the system best adapted for the education of the young? If the stability of our free institutions depends on the education and virtue of the people, the highest and most important question of all is the mode of educating the masses. Then again, in regard to the incorporation of banks—another question of vital importance, particularly at the present time, when many attribute our financial difficulties to these moneyed institutions—ought not the people of Kansas to have the right to say whether they will have banks or not, or how many? And then again, the system of taxation, a subject on which the whole American people have ever been, and are now, peculiarly sensitive. Now, upon all these questions, and many others of like moment, by the action of the Lecompton constitution the people of Kansas have been deprived of expressing their opinion by a vote.

The only way of clearly ascertaining the will of the majority of the people, on any important subject, is by a direct vote. This is the fair, honest, and Democratic method, and no other will ever satisfy a jealous and watchful people of their dear-bought rights. It was for this reason that the question of slavery or no slavery was submitted to the people of Kansas for their decision; and, for the same reason, the whole Lecompton constitution ought likewise to have been submitted. Says President Buchanan, in his annual message, in speaking of the Kansas and Nebraska act:

"Did Congress mean, by its language, that its delegates elected to frame a constitution should have authority finally to decide the question of slavery? or did they intend, by leaving it to the people, that the people of Kansas themselves should decide this question by a direct vote?"

On this subject, in the same message, he further adds:

"I confess I had never entertained a serious doubt; and, therefore, in my instructions to Governor Walker, of the 28th of March last, I merely said that, when a constitution shall be submitted to the people of the Territory, they must be protected in the exercise of their right of voting for or against that instrument, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence."

It is at once seen, then, what was the meaning of Congress and the understanding of Mr. Buchanan on this subject. He never entertained a serious doubt about its true meaning; nor did anybody else. And hence he did not hesitate to instruct Governor Walker what to do when the constitution shall be submitted to the people of Kansas. It will be perceived that he uses the word shall, not may—a word implying an imperative authority on the convention to submit their labors to the people for their ratification or rejection. And again, it will be perceived that President Buchanan speaks, in his instructions to the Governor, of the submission of the constitution, the whole constitution; not a part, but all. This is what Congress intended should be done—this is what President Buchanan instructed to be done, and took for granted would be done; and hence he says:

"My instructions to Governor Walker in favor of submitting the constitution [not the mere slavery clause] to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

Now, why did he give such instructions, and why did he and the whole Democratic party expect that this constitution would be submitted to the people? Was it not because it was in strict accordance with the letter and spirit of the Kansas and Nebraska act, and the intention of Congress; and, to use the President's own language, "founded on correct principles?" Now, what are those "principles?" Are they not the right of self-government, and that the only way of clearly ascertaining the will of the people is through their votes? "In emerging from the condition of territorial dependence into that of a sovereign State," says the President in his annual message, "the will of the people can only be known by a majority of votes." And he gives us the following reason for it:

"The election of delegates to a convention must necessarily take place in separate districts. From this cause it may readily happen, as has often been the case, that a majority of the people of a State or Territory are on one side of a question, whilst a majority of the representatives from the several districts into which it is divided may be upon the other side. This arises from the fact that, in some districts, delegates may be elected by small majorities, whilst in others those of different sentiments may receive majorities sufficiently great not only to overcome the votes given for the former, but to leave a large majority of the whole people in direct opposition to a majority of the delegates. Besides, our history proves that influences may be brought to bear on the representative sufficiently powerful to induce him to disregard the will of his constituents. The truth is, that no other authentic and satisfactory mode exists of ascertaining the will of a majority of the people of any State or Territory, on an important and exciting question like that of slavery in Kansas, except by leaving it to a direct vote. How wise, then, was it for Congress to pass over all subordinate and intermediate agencies, and proceed directly to the source of all legitimate power under our institutions!"

"How vain would any other principle prove in practice! This may be illustrated by the case of Kansas. Should she be admitted into the Union with a constitution either maintaining or abolishing slavery, against the sentiment of the people, this could have no other effect than to continue and to exasperate the existing agitation during the brief period required to make the constitution conform to the irresistible will of the majority."

Well may the President say that any other principle of deciding great and important questions than that by a direct vote of the people, who are the legitimate source of all political power, is utterly void. And what question can be higher or more important than that of a constitution? The people cannot, and never will, rest satisfied, except by their own direct action. They will be restless and excited as the heaving ocean, which is only stilled by omnipotent power. So with a dissatisfied and exasperated people: their own potential voice alone will quiet their agitated feelings and give them peace.

If there ever was a Territory in which the whole people should have a direct vote upon their constitution, it is that of Kansas. The people there have long been divided in political sentiment, and bitter and deadly feelings of hate have been engendered, leading to civil war and bloodshed. If such had not been the case, and the people were harmonious in sentiment in regard to their constitution, no great evil would result in admitting Kansas as a State, if her people desired it. But such is not the fact. It is boldly declared that the Lecompton constitution is not of their making, but has been condemned and disowned by them at the election on the 4th of January, by a majority of over ten thousand votes against it.

At the election on the 21st December, the majority for the constitution was 5,574
More than one half of which, however, was cast at those very sparsely-settled precincts in the Territory, two of them in the Shawnee reserve, on land not open for settlement:
Oxford, Johnson county..... 1,266
Shawnee, Johnson county..... 729
Kickapoo, Leavenworth county..... 1,017
— 3,012

Which being deducted from the pretended majority leaves in favor of the constitution..... 2,562

But assuming this election to have been all fair and valid, and the returns to have been genuine, and the voters to have been citizens of the Territory, notwithstanding the recent developments of the enormous frauds at the polls and in the returns, how does the case then stand on a comparison of the result of the two elections?

At the election on the 4th of January, the majority against the constitution was..... 10,064
At the election on the 21st of December, the majority in favor of the constitution, as presented to Congress, was..... 5,574

Showing a clear majority against the constitution, on comparison of the returns of the two elections, and supposing each to have been fair and legal, of 4,490

If, from this calculation, are deducted the fraudulent votes, according to the statement of the presiding officers of the two Houses of the Legislature, who were present at the opening of the polls and the counting of the votes, by the invitation of the President of the convention, there is, then, a majority of more than eight thousand, or four to one of all the legal voters of Kansas in opposition to the constitution.

And here, Mr. Chairman, I would say a word in regard to the votes cast at the election in Kansas on the 4th of January. We are told by the President that we must disregard that vote as being illegal. Whether so or not, we have the important fact, that a majority of over ten thousand votes were cast against the Lecompton constitution at that election, and that is the expression of the will of the people of Kansas through the ballot-box, spoken at the very first opportunity they had of making it known; for on the 21st December last they were not permitted to cast a single vote against the constitution, although at full liberty to vote for it.

The vote on the 4th January was under a law of an extra session of the Territorial Legislature, convened by the late acting Governor Stanton. He at once communicated the fact to Secretary Cass of the calling of the Legislature, and the Secretary, by the authority of the President, instructed Governor Denver, who succeeded Stanton, who was removed, to respect the rightful action of the Legislature convened by his predecessor. And further more, "should it (the Legislature) authorize an election for any purpose, this election should be held without interruption, no less than those authorized by the convention." Here, then, was an election held by the authority of a legal Legislature, and protected by the Governor of the Territory at the instance and by the authority of the President, and yet the President says that the votes cast at that election against the constitution are not to influence or affect our minds; or in other words, we are utterly to disregard the clear and emphatic will of the people. Why did he not say in advance to Governor Denver, that the vote against the constitution would be considered as illegal, and not to regard it? But he permitted it to go on, and Governor Denver received the returns of the vote, cast them up, and certified to the result, yet we are now gravely told that the whole thing is illegal and wrong.

But the vote, Mr. Chairman, on the Lecompton constitution on the 4th of January, was a legal one. The law of the Territorial Legislature authorizing it was legal. That Legislature had full power to make it, and it would have been derelict in its duty to the people of Kansas, not to have done so. It was the Territorial Legislature which authorized the holding of the convention that adopted the Lecompton constitution; and it was the Territorial Legislature which authorized the vote on the 4th of January. The convention had no power to deprive that Legislature of the right of passing laws for the benefit and protection of the people. Here was a convention which framed a constitution, not in accordance with the sense and wishes of the people of Kansas, but in direct opposition to both; and the Territorial Legislature, acting as the guardian of the rights and liberty of the people, passed the law affording to them the right to say whether the Lecompton constitution was acceptable to them or not, before it was sent to Congress. If it had no such authority to pass the law, then the convention was above the Legislature, the very power which called it into being. The Legislature was still in existence, and only ceases its territorial power on the admission of Kansas as a State into this Union; and "its power over the whole subject was as full and absolute on the 17th day of December, when the law was enacted providing for the submission of this constitution to the people at the election on the 4th of January, as it was on the 19th day of February, 1857, when the Legislature passed the act calling the Lecompton convention into existence."

If the submission of a constitution to the people who are to be bound by it, is founded, as the President says, on correct principles, and hopes that the example set by the last Congress requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of her people, may be followed on future occasions, it is an example which ought to be followed now. We cannot begin too soon to imitate good examples; and let us commence at once, and provide in some way for the people of Kansas to decide upon their constitution. It is an example which ought to be set by a Democratic Congress; and I am greatly surprised that Mr. Buchanan, in opening his administration, did not throw the weight of his official position in favor of its immediate application to Kansas. And in doing that, he would have been carrying out the great principle on which he was elected—that of popular sovereignty—and been warmly sustained by the great majority of the people. "Do unto others as ye would others should do unto you," is the golden rule, but little regarded in this degenerate age, and particularly by politicians. Now, if I were in Kansas, I would claim the right of voting upon the constitution, and insist upon it, too, which is there to become the governing law. In New Jersey, sir, but a few years ago, the people determined to make a new constitution in the place of the old one; and one of the reasons urged for it was, that the latter had never been submitted to the people for their approval or rejection. The new constitution was submitted to the people, which they ratified; and it became the supreme law of that State; but it had the stamp of the people's will, without which, in that State, it would have been a dead letter. Having claimed, then, for myself the right of voting upon that constitution, I cannot refuse to accord the same right to the people of Kansas; and I am but carrying into practice the golden rule of "doing unto others as ye would others should do unto you."

And here, Mr. Chairman, I cannot refrain from expressing my great surprise that the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. Thomson] who addressed the Senate the other day, should have advocated the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution. It was this Senator who was greatly instrumental in having the old constitution of New Jersey abolished, and a new one substituted in its stead. And, if my memory serves me, he urged as one of the reasons against the old constitution, that it had never been submitted to the people for their ratification or rejection. And in his recent speech, he says:

"I do most heartily approve of the submission to the people of a State of all great questions affecting their interests, not only their forms of government, but also legislative acts involving the creation of debt and the faith of the State."

And yet he would force upon the people of Kansas a constitution which they have condemned, by a majority of over ten thousand votes against it, and which he knows does not truly express their will. Why does he approve, sir, and "most heartily," of submitting a constitution to the people? Is it not because that is the only fair and true way of ascertaining their sense in regard to it? It would have been, in my opinion, much more consistent in him if he had declared against the Lecompton constitution, and insisted upon its submission to the people of Kansas; and in doing that, he would have given us the best evidence of what he so heartily approves. As it is, his sentiments are one way, and his actions directly opposite. And he further says, that to reject the Lecompton constitution on the ground of its non-submission to the people of Kansas, "at this day would be most cruel and unjust." Why, sir, at this day all the recent State constitutions have been submitted to the people. This is the popular, correct, and Democratic principle of the day. And the Senator has been compelled to admit in his speech, when speaking of the different State constitutions which have been adopted of late years, that seventeen of them were submitted directly to the people. And yet the poor people of Kansas, most of all entitled to a fair and honest vote upon their constitution, are not to enjoy that right if it can be prevented; and to accord it to them, in the opinion of the New Jersey Senator, "would be most cruel and unjust." All I have to say, sir, is that his notions of cruelty and injustice are widely different from my own. I can see nothing either cruel or unjust in rejecting the Lecompton constitution and permitting the people of Kansas to vote upon it; but on the contrary, every principle of right, justice, and humanity demands it.

But it is said that the Lecompton constitution is the legally-expressed will of the people of Kansas; that delegates were chosen, who assembled in convention, and framed this constitution; and that it was not incumbent on that convention to submit the constitution to a direct vote of the people, as there was no provision in the legislative act authorizing the convention, which required it. Now, it is all true, there was no such provision; but the convention did submit one question to the people, that of slavery—admitting the right of the people to pass judgment upon that; and if they had the right to vote on one question, why not on all others? or, in other words, on the whole constitution itself?

It is admitted by the President, in his annual message, that the delegates to the Lecompton convention had no right finally to decide the question of slavery without a direct vote of the people upon it. He says he never had any doubt about that. And why? Because the true intent and meaning of the Kansas and Nebraska act was, that the people were to be left perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way. Now, if domestic institutions mean more than one, and slavery be one of them, and the delegates to that convention had no right finally to decide that, neither had they any more right, by the said act, to decide any other domestic institution. If they had the right to decide one, then all; and if not one, then not all; for the people were to be left perfectly free to form and regulate all their domestic institutions in their own way. And this freedom of the people at the ballot-box, or, in other words, popular sovereignty, the President says is the vital principle of our free institutions, and upon which the whole Democratic party was cordially united during the last presidential campaign—"everywhere remaining" true to the resolution adopted on a celebrated occasion, recognizing "the right of the people of the Territories, including Kansas and Nebraska, acting through the legally and fairly expressed will of a majority of actual residents, and, whenever the number of their inhabitants justifies it, to form a constitution, with or without slavery, and be admitted into the Union upon terms of perfect equality with the other States." Now, according to this resolution, which the President admits embodies the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, the people were to form—what? Why, a constitution, with or without slavery, it is true; but the chief and important thing was the constitution—slavery a mere incident. Now, suppose in this resolution nothing had been said about slavery, but simply to form a constitution: would it not embody the great doctrine of popular sovereignty—the right of the people to vote upon that constitution? How does the mere question of slavery affect that right? The President, in his annual message, refers to this resolution, as proof to show that the delegates to the Lecompton convention had no right finally to decide the question of slavery and to withhold it from the people, and substitute their own will for that of a legally-ascertained majority of all their constituents; and if it proves that, it also proves that the delegates had no more right to substitute their will for that of the people, and finally to decide any other proviion; but that the whole constitution itself was to be submitted to the people.

If, then, this convention, in the opinion of the President, had no right finally to decide the question of slavery, and, as I have shown, had no more right finally to decide any other provision of the constitution, and substitute its will for that of the people, then it necessarily follows that this constitution is not the act and deed of the people of Kansas, and we are bound to reject it.

The position taken that the people had no right to vote upon the whole constitution unless the convention saw fit to give them that right, is one which places the convention above and beyond the very power which called it into being. It is making the delegates to that convention, who were mere agents of the people, their masters; and the poor people are absolutely bound by their acts, right or wrong; good or bad. The delegates to that convention did not carry with them a law-making power absolutely binding, without the sanction of the people, and against their will. The constitution of a State is the supreme law, and its organic form of government; and, as all free government derives its power from the consent of the governed, how can it be authentically ascertained whether the people of Kansas approve of the Lecompton constitution without a vote upon it? It is not my purpose to waste time upon the mere abstract question of delegated and sovereign power; upon how much and what power the people may delegate, and what retain as an inherent right. The far more important and practical one is, whether the delegates who framed the Lecompton constitution fully and fairly represented the will of the great body of the people of Kansas?

If there is any man living who ought to know the real facts in regard to that convention it is Governor Walker. And I would here beg leave to read a portion of his able letter to the President, resigning his position as Governor, which discloses facts which ought to be conclusive on this subject. He says:

"That convention had vital not technical defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment, as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses, by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties, it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact, that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty by law of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not, and did not, give a single vote at the election for delegates to the constitutional convention. And here I wish to call attention to the distinction, which will appear in my inaugural address, in reference to those counties where the voters were fairly registered and did not vote. In such counties, where a full and free opportunity was given to register and vote, and they did not choose to exercise that privilege, the question is very different from those counties where there was no census or registry, and no vote was given, or could be given, however anxious the people might be to participate in the election of delegates to the convention. Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for wherever they endeavored, by a subsequent census or registry of their own to supply this defect occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention."

"I repeat, that in nineteen counties out of thirty-four, there was no census. In fifteen counties out of thirty-four there was no registry, and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of these counties. Still, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties, in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory; and these fifteen counties in which there was no registry gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last. If, then, sovereignty can be delegated, and conventions, as such, are sovereign, which I deny, surely it must be only in such cases as when such conventions are chosen by the people, which we have seen was not the case as regards the late Lecomton convention. It was for this, among other reasons, that in my inaugural, and other addresses, I insisted that the constitution should be submitted to the people by the convention as the only means of curing this vital defect in its organization. It was, therefore, among other reasons, when, as you know, the organization of the so-called Topeka State government, and as a consequence an inevitable civil war and conflict with the troops must have ensued, these results were prevented by my assuring, not the Abolitionists, as has been erroneously stated—for my address was not to them, but the people of Kansas—that in my judgment the constitution would be submitted, fairly and freely, for ratification or rejection by their vote; and that if this was not done, I would unite with them, the people, as I now do, in "lawful opposition" to such a procedure."

And in addition, we have the statement of Frederick P. Stanton, late Secretary of that Territory, in his recent letter of the 29th of January, who fully corroborates the assertions of Governor Walker. He says:

"The registration required by law had been imperfect in all the counties, and had been wholly omitted in one half of them; nor could the people of these disfranchised counties vote in any adjacent county, as has been falsely suggested. In such of them as subsequently took a census or registry of their own, the delegates chosen were not admitted to seats in the convention."

It appears, then, that this convention was not composed of delegates from all the counties in Kansas; and a very plain and satisfactory reason is given for it. In nineteen of those counties there was no census taken, and in fifteen no registry of voters; and hence there was no basis on which to make the proper apportionment of delegates. And, as Governor Walker alleges, it was no fault of the people of those counties that this was not done. And, consequently, having had no voice or hearing in that convention, they ought not to be bound by its action, and made to receive a constitution in the framing of which they have been excluded, without first having the opportunity of deciding by a vote whether they will accept or reject it. Under these circumstances, to force a constitution upon them would shock every sense of right, justice, and law, and strike down the great principle of representation, without which there would be no political freedom in this country. It would be a perfect piece of despotism; and I am not willing to take part in inflicting it upon any people, much less upon a large body of my own countrymen.

Why, sir, did Governor Walker promise to the people of Kansas, as he was instructed to do by the President, that they should have the right of voting for or against the constitution? Was it not because a very large majority of the people complained that they were deprived of delegates in that convention; that it did not fairly and fully represent the popular will; and that they would not submit to its action? And did he not allay all their fears, and subdue their exasperated and outraged feelings, by the solemn assurance that they should have a vote on the constitution? Its submission to the people was to rectify the radical and vital defects in the organization of the convention; and to the promise of such submission may be attributed the peace and order which reigned in Kansas up to the very time when the convention refused such submission.

It is not my purpose to discuss the question whether the Territorial Legislature had the legal authority to authorize the assembling of the Lecompton convention to frame a constitution. It certainly had no such direct power given to it by any act of Congress. But whether it had or not, I would not object to the legality of the convention, if the people of Kansas were satisfied with it as the fair and honest organ of their will and political sentiments. The great point with me is the will of the people; and I care not whether it is expressed through their representatives, or by their direct vote, if it is only honestly and fairly done, and truly expresses that will.

Now it is clear that this constitution does not express the will of the majority of the people of Kansas. In the first place, they were not all represented in the convention which framed it, nineteen of the counties having had no delegates to speak for them. And in the second place, the people have had no opportunity of giving their assent or dissent to the constitution, so as to ascertain their will. It is all very true, that a vote was taken on the 21st of December last; but were the people of Kansas permitted to vote as they saw fit on that constitution? It was submitted to them—but only to vote for, and not against it. The form of the vote was, "constitution with slavery," or "constitution without slavery;" but the constitution had to be taken—good or bad, right or wrong—not in part, but in the whole. Now what a complete farce—nay, more, what a bold and disgraceful attempt, in this free land, to stifle the people's voice, and to defraud and rob them of their dear and blood-bought right to say what shall be their form of government! Can any man wonder that the people of Kansas are roused to the highest pitch of excitement, and are determined not to submit to a government not their own; and that freemen at the North, and freemen at the South, and freemen everywhere, cry shame! shame! at such high-handed fraud and tyranny? Did not the King of Great Britain once try to force our brave ancestors to submit to laws in the making of which they had no voice? And did not the soul-stirring rallying cry ring out from hill-top and from valley, "No taxation without representation?" And is not the same cry now heard in Kansas, and throughout the country, "No constitution without representation?"—a principle that finds an echoing response in every free, manly, and patriotic heart.

In the instructions of President Buchanan to Governor Walker, he said the people of Kansas, in the exercise of their right of voting for or against the constitution submitted to them, must be protected, and the fair expression of the popular will must not be interrupted by fraud or violence. Now, were they not defrauded of the right of fairly expressing their will by the form of the vote which was required? Every man who could not conscientiously subscribe to the provisions of the constitution, and did not vote on that account, and was not permitted to vote against it, was as much deterred from voting as if a strong police force had been stationed at the polls to keep him away. Was not this, then, a great fraud? And will we sanction it? Mr. Buchanan's own strong words were, in his inaugural address, on assuming the oath of office:

I repeat it, sir, this sacred right of each individual must be preserved.

Why, Mr. Chairman, was not this Lecompton constitution submitted to the people of Kansas? There is but one short and conclusive answer; which is, that the people would have voted it down—which they had a right to do. This fact, then, by itself, clearly shows that it does not embody the will of the people of Kansas; and without that it ought to have no binding force. Why, then, should we receive Kansas as a State with such a dead constitution, not speaking the living voice of her people? It is said that the sooner we receive her as such, the sooner the Kansas excitement will die out. That, however, is a mere supposition, and by no means a certainty. Now, there is no one who desires peace more than I do; and I would go very far to purchase it, but never at a sacrifice of great fundamental principles of government, and of the faith, integrity, and solemn pledges of the Democratic party. But there would be no peace. Why, sir, the President himself says, in his annual message, that—

"Should Kansas be admitted into the Union with the constitution either maintaining or abolishing slavery against the sentiment of the people, this could have no other effect than to continue and exasperate the existing agitation during the brief period required to make the constitution conform to the irresistible will of the majority."

Are we, then, to keep up this agitation, and exasperate still more the people of Kansas, by admitting her with this Lecompton constitution, which everybody knows is against their known and declared will? Suppose, Mr. Chairman, this constitution is accepted by us, and the people of Kansas say—as they do—we will not submit to it: what then? Why, sir, the President will have to use the military power of the Government to suppress the resistance, and force a much-injured and wronged people into quiet submission. If this is done there will be bloodshed, and a far deeper excitement throughout the country than has yet occurred in regard to Kansas.

Governor Walker says:

"Disguise it as we may to ourselves, under the influence of the present excitement, the facts will demonstrate that any attempt by Congress to force this constitution upon the people of Kansas, will be an effort to substitute the will of a small minority for that of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas; that it will not settle the Kansas question or localize the issue; that it will, I fear, be attended by civil war, extending, perhaps, throughout the Union; thus bringing this question back again upon Congress and before the people in its most dangerous and alarming aspect."

But, sir, is this constitution to be forced upon the people of Kansas on the mere ground of a supposed peace? Is that a sufficient reason for denying to the people of Kansas the right of self-government? Why, sir, the great and heroic spirits that broke the fetters of British tyranny, and gave freedom to America, often heard the siren song of "peace, peace," and they might have easily purchased it; but it would have been an ignominious and slavish peace. What they contended for was a great principle. They did not suffer any very great hardships. "The oppressions which roused them," says the accomplished orator, Edward Everett, "had in their day no worse form than that of a pernicious principle. No intolerable acts of oppression had ground them to the dust. They were not slaves, rising in desperation from beneath the agonies of the lash, but freemen, snuffing from afar 'the tainted gale of tyranny.' The worst encroachments on which the British ministry had ventured, might have been borne consistently with the practical enjoyment of many of the advantages resulting from good government. On the score of calculation alone, they had much better have paid the duties on glass, painters' colors, stamped paper, and tea;" but it was the principle of taxing them without their consent, against which they arose and fought. And on principle alone they fought it out with such glorious success; and we are now reaping the priceless blessings of that great and memorable contest. And yet, what is most extraordinary, we find the sons of such illustrious sires endeavoring to force upon the people of Kansas a constitution against their consent, and denying to them the right of self-government, for which seven long years of a bloody war was waged to accomplish.

But in refusing to admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, it is said we will not be carrying out the principle of the Kansas and Nebraska act, that of non-interference. Why, sir, that is the very way to carry it out. If we admit Kansas with that constitution, against the solemn protests of her people, and force them to accept it, that would be direct interference; nay more, it would be tyranny with a high hand. I say, let her alone, and let her have a fair and honest vote upon the constitution under which her people are to live and have their political existence, as a free and independent State.

Says the late Secretary Stanton, who is just fresh from among them, and well knowing their disposition, determination, and outraged rights:

"If Congress will heed the voice of the people, and not force upon them a government which they have rejected by a vote of four to one, the whole country will be satisfied, and Kansas will quietly settle her own affairs, without the least difficulty, and without any danger to the Confederacy. The southern States, which are supposed to have a deep interest in the matter, will be saved from the supreme folly of standing up in defense of so wicked and dishonest a contrivance as the Lecompton constitution. The moral power of their position will not be weakened by a vain and useless defense of wrong, when it is perfectly certain they will gain nothing even by success in the present attempt."

It is said again, Mr. Chairman, that our only inquiry on the application of Kansas for admission is, whether her form of government is republican? and that we are bound, under the Federal Constitution, to guaranty to her one of such a character. It is all true that we must see that her government is republican; but how are we to ascertain that? Why, it is said, here is her constitution; is not that republican? Yes, sir, I answer, as far as form goes. But are we merely to look at that? Are we not bound to see that the will of the people is enshrined within that outward form? for if it lacks that, it lacks the very life and being of a republican government. A written constitution is supposed to express that will; but if it does not, it is valueless; it is worse, sir, it is a gross fraud upon the rights and liberties of those who are to live under it. Just like a last will and testament, if it does not express the intentions and will of the testator the very object in view has been defeated.

But we are told that we cannot go behind the constitution to ascertain the will of the people; that the constitution is the only evidence of it. Prima facie it is; but this presumption may be overcome by the real facts in the case. A presumption in law, as every lawyer knows, has only weight in the absence of the truth, but cannot stand against it. And what fact is better known, or about which is there less doubt, than that this constitution does not express the will of the people of Kansas? And yet we are called upon to believe this constitution, and accept it as true, when the people themselves have stamped it with falsehood. Now, are we to close our eyes against this startling fact? This would be sanctioning fraud, and making forms everything and substance nothing. Are we not to hesitate, or doubt, or inquire, because this shameless fraud and villainy is a thing in "form?"

The language, Mr. Chairman, of the Federal Constitution is, "new States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union"—not shall—implying a discretionary power, and not to admit under all circumstances. And, besides, we are to admit, not force a State into this Union against her solemn protest and will.

But it is said again, Mr. Chairman, that after Kansas is admitted as a State, her constitution may be immediately altered so as to conform to the wishes of the people. Why, sir, this very remark would seem to intimate that the Lecompton constitution is not acceptable to them; or else why speak of a change? And is it not a most singular fact, occurring for the first time in the history of our Government, that we are called upon to force a constitution upon a people, with the consolatory reflection that they can have the right immediately thereafter to change it? Why, sir, the most natural inquiry which springs up at once in our minds is, why force them to accept it at all? Why not permit them to make a constitution which is in the first place acceptable to them, and will require no immediate change? The constitution is for their benefit and government alone, and the important inquiry ought to be, are they satisfied with it?

But, Mr. Chairman, can the people of Kansas, if admitted with the Lecompton constitution, change it as easily and as soon as contended for? If we receive Kansas as a State with that constitution, it at once becomes the fundamental law of that State, and the people are bound to submit to its provisions and authority. Now, by one of its provisions, after the year 1864 that constitution may be altered or amended, necessarily implying that it is not to be done until that period. And this is the opinion of the eloquent gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR], who addressed us the other day; and I have no doubt it is fully concurred in by many other southern gentlemen. He says:

"Can the constitution of Kansas be legally changed prior to 1864? In my judgment it cannot. There is a clause in the constitution of Kansas prohibiting the assembling of a convention prior to that time, and this inhibition precludes it. This clause is regarded by some as a nullity. I do not so regard it. Every government that is created by a written charter rests upon it as a foundation. All the agents under it are subordinate, and must act in conformity to its provisions. Whenever an agent, in its exercise of power, exceeds the power granted to it by the author of its being, such exercise of power is illegal and nugatory. A Legislature, then, which is prohibited by the sovereign authority in the organic law from assembling the sovereign authority, acts, in thus assembling it, against or dehors the constitution, and the act is void from lack of authority."

There must have been, Mr. Chairman, some object in inserting such a provision in the constitution, and that object alone was to prevent a change. Those that put it there must have supposed it sufficient to carry out their object. And you will find, sir, if Kansas is admitted as a State, that every pro-slavery man in Kansas will assume the ground that no change can be made before the year 1864, and plant himself defiantly on this provision of the constitution.

It is all true, sir, that the people can make and unmake constitutions at pleasure; but there are only two ways in which it can be done—according to law, or without law. It may be done in the manner prescribed by the constitution, the fundamental and binding law of the State, or in the face of the constitution, and then it becomes revolutionary.

It does not necessarily follow that this revolution would be a bloody one. It may be peaceful and bloodless where the people all acquiesce in it. The constitution of a State, I admit, may be at any time changed, even where it contains an express provision forbidding it, provided the people agree to it, and make no resistance; and yet it would be against the fundamental law of the State.

But suppose Kansas is admitted, and her people should desire to alter or amend their constitution, and the Legislature should refuse to pass any law calling a convention of delegates for that purpose, taking the position that the constitution itself prohibited it until the year 1864: what then? How are the people to proceed to effect a change in their constitution? It is all true, they may meet together, and appoint their delegates to a convention, which convention may adopt an entirely new constitution, and new form of government; but then we would have two forms of government, and pray, sir, which would be the lawful one? Which one would Mr. Buchanan recognize? Why, unquestionably the first; for the last would be without law and revolutionary, and, if attempted to be put in force, would inevitably lead to all the horrors of a civil war.

Before, Mr. Chairman, the people of Kansas could make any alteration in their constitution, even admitting, for the sake of the argument, that it could legally be done before the year 1864, it is a vital and all-important question, which party has the majority in the Legislature elected on the 4th of January last? If the pro-slavery men have it, and the Lecompton constitution is against the will of the great body of the people of Kansas, I ask how it can be changed, as proposed by the President? He urges, as one of the strong reasons for the admission of Kansas, that "the Legislature already elected may, at its very first session, submit the question to a vote of the people, whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution, and adopt all necessary means for giving effect to the popular will." But, if the pro-slavery men have the majority in that Legislature, they will submit no such question to the people, or take any steps to make the constitution conform to their will; and the necessary consequence will be, that the vast majority of the people of Kansas will be forced to submit to a constitution not their own, but directly opposed to their political sentiments, or else rise in rebellion against the State government and effect a change in the constitution by a bloody civil war. Their only alternative will be a slavish submission or a bloody revolution. Is it not a most extraordinary fact, that the people of Kansas, as well as of the whole country, are kept in a state of suspense and ignorance in regard to the political character of that Legislature? On one day it is given out by John Calhoun that the pro-slavery men have the majority in that body, and that he will give certificates of election to them; and on the next, that the free-State men have it. So it goes, from day to day, and the truth may never be known until after Kansas is admitted, if that should ever take place, under the Lecompton constitution. If admitted, he will then show his hand; and if the pro-slavery men have the majority in the Legislature, good-by to all change in the constitution; it will prove to be a mere empty dream.

Mr. COX. I would ask the gentleman from New Jersey whether he has examined the Lecompton constitution to see whether or not there be not a clause in it which, in the absence of the president of the convention from the Territory, gives to another officer the power to issue these certificates?

Mr. ADRAIN. I believe that is so. The right of self-government, Mr. Chairman, is dear to us all. It is a right as dear to the men of the South, as to those of the North. And are they willing to deprive the people of Kansas of this blood-bought right? Was it not in the South that a Patrick Henry proclaimed, with a matchless power and eloquence, which fired the hearts and nerved the arms of American patriots, the right of the people to make their own form of government? And his soul-stirring exclamation, bursting forth from a heart glowing with patriotic fire, seems still to linger, as it were, in the distance, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" And many a man in Kansas may echo back the sentiment, if the Lecompton constitution is thrust upon her, "Give me liberty, or give me death!" Was it not Thomas Jefferson who embodied the great right of self-government in the charter of American liberty—the Declaration of American Independence? And was it not the immortal Washington who won by the sword that great right for our fathers, for us, and those who shall come after us? And we now see the gifted, fearless, and patriotic Wise standing proudly forth in defense of the same great right, although a strong slavery man—but who dares to do right, let the consequences be what they may! And it would have been a most singular fact, if, from the gallant State of Virginia, which gave to the country and the world a Henry, a Jefferson, and a Washington, no voice had been raised in behalf of the same great principle for which they contended, and were ready to seal with their blood.

The South, Mr. Chairman, can gain nothing by the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution into the Union. It is true that the slavery clause is in the constitution, but the people of Kansas will have it out, and will never rest satisfied until this is the case. What, then, is gained? Is it merely for the sake of an empty triumph that the South is contending? Does the South claim the Lecompton constitution as its work, and wish to boast and exult over the free-State men at the North, and say—there, see the slavery clause which is in it? For this, after all, must be it; and this is what the eloquent gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GARTRELL] declared the other day, when defending the institution of slavery, and depicting in glowing colors its great blessings: "It is true," said he, "the South has achieved a triumph in Kansas;" but permit me to say that it was an unworthy triumph over the constitutional rights and liberty of the people. Do not say that you are resisting an encroachment upon your rights by insisting upon the admission of Kansas. What rights, I pray you? No one is interfering with your right to hold slaves in your respective States where your laws permit it. I certainly am not, and would not.

But remember, gentlemen of the South, you have no right to say that slavery shall exist in Kansas, and force it upon her people. In doing that you are becoming the aggressors, and I charge upon every southern gentleman upon this floor, who attempts to force this Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas with the slavery clause in it, when he knows that the great majority of the people are opposed to it, as a gross interference with their just political rights. And if you do, the consequences rest with you; if a civil war rages, deluging Kansas with human blood, and perhaps involving the whole Union and its existence, it is your creating and not ours. Why, then, persist? Why not give Kansas up, and let her people be a free people? She is gone to the South, as a slave State. The laws of climate and her free population have fixed that, now and forever. Come, then, men of the South—sons with us of the same glorious ancestry, inheritors of the same common country, and ever actuated as you are by high, noble, generous, and patriotic sentiments—discard as ignoble, ungenerous, and wrong, any attempt to force a people to accept a constitution for the mere sake of an empty triumph. A far higher and nobler triumph would await you by according to the people of Kansas their just right of self-government. If you do that, the Democracy of the North will stand by you, as they have ever done, in your just constitutional rights. And it would greatly tend to appease the bitter feeling, with many at the North, against the domestic institution of slavery. But to press this Lecompton constitution through, would only have the effect to heighten and strengthen that feeling, and widen still further the breach now unhappily existing between the North and the South.

Pause, then, I pray you, men of the South, and not permit mere imaginary wrongs to urge you on, as you threaten, to a dissolution of our glorious Union. Suffer not your warm blood and heated imaginations to betray you into an act which would destroy the last resting-place of human liberty. If the goddess of Liberty ever takes her flight from our loved land, it will be forever; and then, oh then!—but I will not and cannot look into such a dark and harrowing future. All else is shut out from my gaze, and I can only see before me a hallowed Union of States, bound together by fraternal love, mutual interest, and a common glory—a Union cemented by the blood of our fathers, and founded on the great and inherent principle of popular rights and popular sovereignty; and the same great and benignant God who has watched over and protected us in the past, and brought us to so high a pinnacle of national prosperity and power, will not, I am sure, desert us now, in the midst of threatened and imminent danger, but still lead us on in the path of peace, safety, and stability, as one and a free people.

Mr. WORTENDYKE. I would like to ask a simple question of my colleague upon a matter in which I did not exactly understand him. He spoke of the alteration of a constitution by revolution. I wish to inquire of him, whether the change of the constitution of New Jersey, in 1844, was a revolutionary change?

Mr. ADRAIN. We did change our constitution, but it was done peaceably, all the people acquiescing in it. I wish the gentleman to understand that when I speak of a revolution, I do not necessarily mean that the people must rise and engage in a bloody revolution in order to accomplish the object they desire. A constitution may be changed even against an express provision of the constitution, if all the people acquiesce, yet it is no less a revolutionary change.

Mr. SEARING. Mr. Chairman, I rise, sir, surrounded with all the embarrassments that are usually attendant upon the first effort to address a legislative body; and, sir, I feel the position I occupy more sensibly, from the fact that I see around me, in the occupancy of these seats, gentlemen skilled in legislation, versed in the history of the country, and who, from education and experience, are most aptly fitted for the discharge of the high and responsible duties the country has enjoined upon them. But, sir, I bring to the discharge of the duty which my constituents have assigned me, very little legislative experience; I stand here to-day sustained by none of those advantages or influences which the collegiate institutions of my country confer, but springing directly from the ranks of the people, with whom, from my earliest infancy, I have been identified, and fortified only by the confident assurance on their part, that here, in my place in these Halls, I will honestly attempt to give utterance to their sentiments, protect their interests, sustain the honor and dignity of my native State, and by every honorable effort, preserve and perpetuate the harmony, peace, and concord, of all the States of the Federal Union. I shall not, Mr. Chairman, attempt to enter into a long and argumentative debate upon all the points involved in this discussion, but will content myself with assigning some few of the reasons which, in all human probability, will govern my action in the final disposition of this question.

If a stranger to our political history and institutions should be doomed to listen to all the speeches of our members and Senators, and peruse the many reports, messages, and statistics, relating to Kansas, her organization as a Territory, and her proposed admission as a State in this glorious Confederacy, he would necessarily consider the question as a grand political puzzle, to which there was no beginning and no end; and it would seem impossible for him to gain the thread or clew of this American labyrinth, and to trace and follow out correct and sound conclusions towards its final solution. And, at times, I must confess that the ingenious and special pleadings of the opponents of this measure seem to cover and include the merits of the case. And to clear my mind from doubts as to my own duties in the premises, I have to refresh my own memory upon the history of our country and her institutions prior to any serious agitation upon the subject of slavery, and coolly review the obligations each part of this great nation must preserve to the others, whether those obligations are written in the Constitution and laws that govern us, or are made clearly apparent and necessary by the experience of the past, to preserve our existence as a great Republic, a free and independent nation, indissolubly bound together in the bonds of political concord and union.

Digressing, sir, for a moment from the subject at issue, I would say for myself, as a sort of prologue to my remarks, that I am a Democrat; and, in the application of local adjectives, as used too much in this House, would be called a "northern Democrat." But I cast these local distinctions aside; I am a national Democrat; and I will not vote or speak in this House upon any question unless I can do so in the capacity of a national legislator. I come here to act for the North and the South alike; to act for my country, and my whole country. I can well recollect of years bygone, when Maine, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and South Carolina, members and Senators, met in this Capitol, with no objects of legislation but those supported in common by the representatives of the several parties; and those representatives were divided upon the floor of the House and the Senate, not by the number of degrees their homes happened to be from the equator or the north pole, but the Massachusetts Whig or Democrat sat down with the Kentucky Whig or Democrat; and while they differed, in principle and policy, from their Democratic friends of New York and Carolina on the other side, all were actuated by the same national feelings, and sought, in their own way, (by supporting their respective party measures,) to promote the prosperity and advancement of this great nation.

But now, sir, when I am called to act as a legislator for my country, I find that it is only the representatives of one of the great parties of the day that seem to fraternize now as then. The opponents of the Democracy seem to herd themselves together as a party whose boundaries are defined by the compass and chain, and whose principles and policies must be shaped by, and subject to, the passions, prejudices, and interests, of a portion of our people, whose physical constitutions are inured to a latitude north of Mason and Dixon's line; and I find, when a great party measure is to be moved, wherein all our national men should act in concert, and wherein, of old, members and Senators elected as Democrats acted unitedly, that many of those whom the nation trusted for support become weak and helpless, and surrender to this geographical humbug their party fealty. I hope, sir, yet to live to see this state of things changed; to once more realize that, in our national halls of legislation, the terms North, South, East, and West, shall no longer exist, except to designate the bounds of new Territories and States for this glorious Union.

I am not one who fears that this Union is in danger, until I know that a majority of this House and the Senate have forgotten their manhood, their love of liberty and liberal institutions, and forsaken the principles that were taught them by freedom-loving mothers and fathers, and which have been preserved by them as the "magna charta" of their future hopes and happiness. And, sir, should the time come when appearances would betoken this position, I would cling to the hope of preserving the Union still; and would struggle to postpone to the very last year, the last day, and the last hour, such a terrible conclusion to the history of my country.

But to return to the question before us: to understand clearly the merits of this question we must review briefly the position of affairs for a brief period prior and up to the time Kansas became a Territory.

The present Territory of Kansas became American territory in 1803, by the treaty of France, known as the Louisiana treaty. We received this territory under an engagement that it should be incorporated in the Union of the United States, and admitted as soon as possible, according to the principles of the Federal Constitution; and in the mean time the inhabitants should be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and the religion which they professed—"mean time," as I understand it, referring to the time it remained until its population and institutions made it suitable to become a sovereign State, when, according to the stipulations on our part, it must be admitted on a footing of perfect equality with the original States. These treaty stipulations bind us, as a nation, with all their original force. To be sure, in 1820, a geographical line of limitation was adopted as to a part of this territory, and was acquiesced in for many years, for the reason that there was no opportunity or necessity of enforcing it or claiming it, unless in the admission of Texas, which came in under another treaty than that. But when it was sought to be applied upon territory acquired by us from Mexico, the North refused to be governed by this limitation; and on the occasion of the admission of the State of California, and the organization of the Territories of New Mexico, Utah, and Washington, the enactment known as the Missouri compromise ceased to be of any binding force, and very properly, too; for believing, as I do, thereby a geographical line between one portion of this great nation and the other, that never should have been established, was virtually repealed, as it then ceased to have any binding virtue upon the North or South, although it stood upon our statute-book—

Mr. OLIN. Did I understand the gentleman to say that either the North or the South understood that the Missouri compromise restriction was repealed by the act of 1850?

Mr. SEARING. I said that virtually it was repealed.

Mr. ATKINS. I will answer the gentleman. It was so understood by Mr. Toombs, of Georgia, and so declared by him in an address to his constituents in 1850.

Mr. SEARING. When the time arrived for the organization of Kansas and Nebraska, and although it was virtually repealed before, and was dead and inoperative, still the formal repeal of that enactment was seized upon as a subject of political excitement and agitation in the North, and was perhaps the original corner-stone of the organization of a sectional party in this country, and in my opinion as dangerous and odious a political organization as ever cursed a nation in the world. It owed its conception in opposition to the law of the land, and to the general principles that should govern all our national legislative action. And the history of the Republican party since its organization is just such a history as might be expected from an origin so illegal, unconstitutional and anti-national in its character; and the staple articles of its progress have been agitation, opposition to law and order, revolutionary movements, robberies, arsons, murder, and crimes in general, perpetrated and perpetuated under the guise of liberty and freedom. Yet Kansas and Nebraska became a Territory without a geographical line of distinction to determine what their local institutions should be as to the question of slavery; and since then Kansas alone has become the theater where have been played the political comedies and tragedies, prepared for political effect in regions remote from her borders.

The game of the Republican party has been the anti-law-and-order game from the beginning to the present time. They refuse to act and vote unless in the way and at the time prescribed by them as a political party, and then only when they can insure to themselves the whole game. At one time pronouncing the acts of the territorial officials and Legislature as bogus and not binding, and at another recognizing them and acting under them, in the election of officers, just as the move seemed to be the one conducive to their ascendancy. But in the midst of all these erratic movements, a legally constituted Territorial Legislature passed an act to take the sense of the people of Kansas on the subject of forming a State government, and asking admission into the Union. At this election the vote was almost unanimous of the people of Kansas in favor of a convention; and afterwards the Territorial Legislature, by a two-thirds vote, passed a law providing for the election of delegates to a constitutional convention. Under that law delegates were elected, who met in convention and made this constitution, submitting to the people of Kansas, at a special election, on the 21st of December, 1857, the question whether the slavery clause should be stricken out or not. At this election the majority of votes cast were in favor of the constitution as it was passed by the convention; and now this constitution comes to us, and the question is, can we refuse to admit Kansas under that constitution or not?

Our opponents say, no; Kansas should not come in as a State until the constitution has been submitted. I answer, it has been submitted by the fact that the people, by almost a unanimous vote, decided and authorized their representatives in the Territorial Legislature to provide by law for a convention of delegates to form this constitution. They said so; and the delegates to that convention were elected by the people to form and frame a constitution, and the constitution framed by them became the constitution and law of Kansas, as far as we are concerned, from the time it was made complete and final by them until the same power, the people, altered that constitution. The convention wisely deemed that the people themselves should finish this constitution by their own act, at a special election on the 21st day of December, 1857, and this was also done; and we have the constitution of Kansas before us, made by their regularly elected representatives and finished by the people themselves. This statement of the matter is, as it appears to me, fully divested of all the clap trap attendant circumstances, with which we have, in my opinion, nothing to do; and when it comes to me thus, I can see no other way than to accept it, and enroll Kansas among the States of the Union; and with these convictions, my heart and reason are in favor of this course.

But I shall not leave the question, Mr. Chairman, without a due brief consideration of some of the views supported and held by the other side. I do not consider myself so much an orator or a political reasoner, that I wish to take up the time of this House with a lengthy review and reply of all that has been said against the admission of Kansas under this constitution, for much has been said that is unanswerable, because it has no point or force in it. It is of the Buncombe, spread-eagle style of argument, that tends more to amuse and confuse men than to convince their reason. In what I have said I have tried to elucidate this question, as it appears to me, without prejudice or passion concerning the circumstances surrounding it; and I will try to answer the main objections to this bill in the same way. The people of any State or Territory have the right to empower others to represent themselves in making constitutions or laws. To deny this would be to deny the sovereignty of the people. Our opponents say the people of Kansas have never delegated their powers to others in this question, nor have they ever expressed their assent in any manner to this Leecompton constitution. It is true, however, that they expressed their will to be that a constitution should be formed. The Territorial Legislature was the only organized body representing the people to make the necessary arrangements to carry their will into effect; and that the convention might represent truly the people, the act provided that between the 1st of March and 1st of April, 1857, a complete list of all qualified voters should be taken and filed in the office of the probate judge, and copies of the lists posted in public places; and from the 1st day of April to the 1st of May, the probate judge should hold court to correct said returns, so that if any were not registered in the returns, they might be added. This list or register of voters was then to be returned to the Governor and Secretary, who upon them made the apportionment of the members of the constitutional convention throughout the Territory.

The qualification of voters at this election of delegates, was, every "bona fide inhabitant of Kansas, on the third Monday of June, 1857, being a citizen of the United States, and over twenty-one years of age, and a resident of the county where he offers to vote, for three months prior to said election." This act was a fair one, and well calculated to obtain a fair expression of the people of Kansas. But many refused to be registered: that is, refused to act as citizens in this matter. Here was the first disposition manifested by a portion of the inhabitants of this Territory to refuse to express themselves on this subject. However, over nine thousand were registered and returned, making over three fourths of the voters of the Territory. Governor Walker and Stanton tried to induce the people all to act; but their advice was not heeded. Governor Stanton made the apportionment, and at the election of delegates, the people of Kansas had another opportunity to express their action on this question; but if reports are true, many refused or neglected so to do.

The convention assembled, duly and legally constituted, and afterwards, as our opponents say, the majority of the people of Kansas expressed no opinion as to the slavery clause in the constitution; and thus a constitution has been made by a convention originating with the people, and from the people; but, as they say, not by the people.

This, I am inclined to think, presents what may be aptly called a political paradox. If what our opponents say is true, that this constitution is repugnant to the majority of the people of Kansas, and the majority are opposed to slavery, it presents two points to me: either they were cowardly and were afraid to contest the matter for fear of being beaten, and preferred irregular action; or they were willing that the constitution should be made in this manner, and, by their silence and inaction, gave consent. Either point is conclusive as against them. Our opponents say the bona fide voters of Kansas could and might do so and so. If so, why in God's name did they not do it? If they were opposed to a slavery constitution, why did not they vote down the slavery clause? Their neglect or refusal to exercise the power to make or alter this constitution, if they had it, is inexcusable; and I think that if they have had the opportunity, and refused to act, they should have the power again only when they are members of a sovereign State. And this kind of assertions only strengthen us in the conviction that it is time the people of this Union should no longer be vexed and harassed by the internal political partisans and political fights of Kansas; and we should not be obliged to correct their evils, if such exist in her borders, because she is yet a Territory. Make her a State; and if her sons needs must fight, let it be a free one among themselves.

On the other hand, if these Kansas republicans are not as strong as they pretend, and cannot succeed or make a show of strength, except in irregular guerrilla political manifestations, that they show great talent in maintaining, then and in such case, this constitution represents the voice of Kansas, and should be received, of course. I cannot for my life see any merits in the opposition to the constitution. It is a mere technical question. If all they say is true, the remedy is in their own hands, and sooner, by being admitted as a State, than in any other mode whatever can it be obtained. It resolves itself into a mere question of political finesse or practice—one calculated to prolong these difficulties, and by their increase, and corresponding increase of sectional bitterness, endanger the future of Kansas and the peace and safety of the Union.

I have said that the basis of the opposition to this bill was laid in mere technicality. The logic of its opponents is what lawyers call special pleading, and does not go to the merits of the matter at issue. I believe they all profess to wish the speedy admission of Kansas, but object to her admission under this constitution. It is in reality a plea of delay; and if they succeed in defeating this bill, they wish to go back to Kansas for another trial, another passage at arms in that distracted Territory, with the whole Union as anxious spectators, and deeply excited in the issues, and new embarrassments will surround the question; and before it shall again come before us for action, this great nation may be convulsed from center to circumference with deep, lasting, and direful agitation. I tell you, Mr. Chairman, in a matter of this kind, "delays are dangerous," perhaps ruinous to the body-politic of this great Union. And we now have it in our power to prevent and provide against these consequences; and if we refuse so to do, we are blind to our duty, careless and indifferent to our obligations as the representatives of a great nation, bound by the conditions of a solemn treaty that they must admit this Territory into their Federal Union as soon as possible, and bound by that treaty and the Constitution of the Union to secure to the inhabitants of this Territory all the rights and privileges of a sovereign State of the Union, which gives them full power to regulate their social institutions as they wish, without let or hindrance or control by the Federal Government.

We have given to the people of this Territory, in general terms in their organic act, the right to act for themselves as to the manner and form they shall present themselves for admission as a State. If I were to act as a legislator of this nation, in organizing a new Territory, I would seek to prevent the troubles of this question by providing in the organic act creating the Territory, for the submission of the constitution, under which they might hereafter seek admission as a State, to a popular vote. But it is too late, in my opinion, now to compel the people of Kansas to do this. If we assume to dictate to them now, as in the manner they shall adopt this constitution before they can become a State, we may also dictate to them what the provisions of that constitution shall be; and by carrying out this principle still further, there will be no end to the power we may presume to exercise over their action; and thus shall we establish a precedent in the action and power of the Federal Government in direct conflict with the constitutional doctrine and principles that, as a Federal Government, we can exercise no power unless created by the Constitution itself—that all other rights and powers remain with the people themselves; a precedent which, if followed in the future, would be the beginning of a warfare against the sovereign rights of the people as secured by the Constitution; it would be the annihilation of State rights and popular sovereignty; it would centralize in this capital a despotism that might exercise its sway from Maine to Georgia and from the Atlantic to the Pacific. In the French revolution, amid the days stigmatized throughout the world as the "days of terror and blood," when thousands of the wisest, most ardent champions of true popular freedom were led to the scaffold as victims of freedom's vengeance, when our own beloved La Fayette was forced to flee from this deluge of uncontrolled passion and violence, the popular cry of the masses and their leaders, who moved in these terrible scenes, and became the ministers and executioners in this bloody work, was "liberty and equality."

It is said that when Madame Roland, than whom no one was more devoted to the cause of freedom, no one more opposed in every principle and action of her life to tyranny and despotism, was brought to the scaffold of death as a victim to the uncontrolled passions and prejudices of the misguided multitude, the popular cry of "liberty and equality" was heard around this fearful death scene; and on the public square fronting this terrible scene arose the statue of the Goddess of Liberty. Madame Roland raised her eyes towards this statue, and said: "Liberty! oh, Liberty! what horrors are perpetrated in thy name!" And when I hear the Opposition arrayed against this bill, and using as their battle-cry, "popular sovereignty," I think they are misguided and deluded, or they are determined in the wrong and against the right, and are willfully arrayed against the very principles they profess to advocate.

I have been a Democrat all my life, and as such been a close observer of all the tactics of the opposition to the Democracy; and I notice this fact, that when the people have indorsed the conservative action of that great national party, and our opponents have been routed "horse and foot," that they seize upon the very principles advocated by the Democracy, and by distorting and misinterpreting them seek to gain their original objects, and build up anew their scattered army.

In 1856, with James Buchanan as our leader-in-chief, we met the combined forces of abolitionism, sectionalism, and all other "isms" that have cursed our country for a quarter of a century; and with "popular sovereignty" as our watchword and principle, we triumphed. And now we have these men here advocating this doctrine in our national Halls of legislation, and by their special pleadings, their misinterpretations of the whole principle, seeking to distract and divide their opponents, and in many cases altogether too successfully.

Democrats, will you be deceived and drawn from your high and noble position? It is the same "old coon," only with a new coat of hair. They are doomed to be again disappointed. The national Democracy can spare those of their forces who are weak and trembling, and who have put their hands to the plow and look back. And still they will triumph, and their triumph will be the joy and the pride of the Union; for it will be the union of the North and the South, and the East and the West, in stronger bonds than ever; and which, God grant, may be as enduring as time itself.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH], when addressing the committee a few days ago on the admission of Kansas into the Union, said that of all the Democrats from the northern States who had voted for the Kansas-Nebraska bill, only three were members of this Congress. This he gave as a warning to those Democrats who, like the honorable gentleman from New York, [Mr. SEARING], who has just taken his seat, had avowed their intention to vote for the admission of Kansas. This, sir, was only one side of the picture; and I desire to call the attention of my friend from Indiana to the other side. I ask him where are all those Democrats, from that section, who voted against that measure? It is true that some of them were returned to Congress, and are now here as Representatives; but most, if not all, of them have gone into the arms of the Black Republican party, and they now help to swell the ranks of that great army which is warring upon the constitutional rights of one section of this Confederacy. The first false step from the ranks of the Democratic party having been taken, they went on and on and on, until they found themselves in company which I am confident my friend from Indiana has no affinity for whatever, and where I am sure I would deeply regret to see him. But, sir, I have not risen for the purpose of delivering a lecture to my friend, nor to those who agree with him in sentiment. I shall vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, and I have obtained the floor for the purpose of stating my reasons for so doing. I trust that I have not been actuated by selfish motives in coming to this determination. It is not alone because I see in the accomplishment of my desire that benefits are to arise to the State which I in part represent, but because I believe it to be a measure of justice, by which peace will be secured to the people of Kansas, and harmony and brotherly feeling restored to the people of the whole country. I wish to localize this question. I am anxious that it shall be removed from these Halls. I am desirous to see the country relieved from an agitation which has resulted in no good, and which, if continued, may lead to the most fearful consequences. I see but one way by which these ends can be accomplished, and that is by the prompt admission of Kansas into the Union. The peace and quiet of the country demand this at our hands, and these considerations outweigh all questions of mere party or sectional triumph.

In the few remarks which I design to present in the advocacy of this measure, I do not propose to enter upon any new fields of argument. Indeed, were I disposed to do so, it would be a difficult task to attempt to add anything to what has already been said in support of it. I regard it as a question upon the determination of which much depends, no matter which way it may be decided. I wish to approach the subject in a spirit of candor and fairness. I do not intend to conceal the fact that the people of that portion of the Confederacy where I live feel, and justly feel, that their independence and equality are at stake in the adjustment of this question; but, nevertheless, I will not undertake to induce others to agree with me by threats or menaces. I have long since determined neither to say nor do anything which tends to weaken the attachment of our people to their Government, or to sever the ties which bind together the States of this Confederacy; but, upon the contrary, actuated (as I believe I am) by an honest zeal for my country's welfare, and inspired with a brotherly affection for the people of every section of the Union—North, South, East, and West—and conscious of the obligations which rest on me as a representative of the people, I shall endeavor to promote, in my humble way, and with the best judgment I can command, the prosperity, the happiness, and greatness, of a common country.

Unhappily for mankind, the dangers which were foreseen by the fathers of the Republic, and of which we have received many faithful and solemn warnings, are upon us, and threaten us with disasters of such a character that no man can calculate them. Every question of any magnitude which presents itself assumes a sectional cast before it has been long under consideration. If an appropriation to pay necessary expenses incurred already, or about to be incurred, is presented, it is not long before some watchful and never-sleeping "freedom-shrieker" shrewdly discovers in it a plot to advance the interests of the "slave power," and thus crush the so-called spirit of liberty. Is an effort made to increase the Army to crush out rebellion in some distant Territory, it is no sooner done than it is insultingly said that its object is to aid a tyrannical chief Executive in forcing upon the necks of an unwilling and martyred people institutions and laws not their own, and against which they most solemnly protest. Has an officer of the Navy, in violation of the laws of nations, and in disregard of our obligations of neutrality, invaded neutral territory and taken citizens captive, pretenses are soon found for complimenting him for his gallantry, and reasons given for sustaining him; and all this because it is feared that in the acquisition of more territory in the South, by the progressive and indomitable spirit of our people, there will be new fields opened to southern enterprise, and new outlets for the "peculiar" institution. Does a new State present her constitution, and ask for admission into the Federal Union, she is welcomed to the glorious sisterhood if she comes with a free-State constitution. Our ears are shocked with no threats of "disunion and civil war," nor are our tastes offended by unjust and unparliamentary reflections upon the characters and institutions of other States. But, sir, if, in the exercise of her sovereign rights, and in the limits of her constitutional authority, she sees proper to form a constitution like those of the fifteen southern States, and then asks to be admitted into the Union on an equality with the original States, how changed the scene! It is immediately said that slave labor and free labor cannot exist together. The South is charged with a desire to encroach upon the rights of the North; our institutions are abused; our people insulted; our independence derided and scorned. Such has been the case, sir, in every instance where slave States have been admitted into the Union. It was so with Texas, and Arkansas, and Missouri. Even when they have been admitted, it has been through scenes of excitement, and in some instances with conditions and provisions inconsistent with their sovereignty, and insulting to their independence.

Sir, we have not been unmindful of these things. We have not been unobservant of that power which has been gradually yet surely growing in strength and importance, and which to-day threatens to brand us as inferiors and vassals, in a Confederacy which recognizes us as equals and sovereigns. If we had been actuated by that aggressive spirit with which we have been charged, might we not have avoided this calamity? In the original organization of the Federal Government, there were twelve out of thirteen States which recognized African slavery as a part of their institutions. Might not these twelve States have maintained their supremacy in the Government? Might they not, by prudent counsels, and, had they been actuated by selfish considerations, and desires for power, have disregarded principle and looked only to their own safety and independence? But, sir, what has been the history of this question? From twelve they have grown to fifteen, whilst from one the so-called free States have increased their number to sixteen, and will soon be increased to eighteen. And is this aggression? Do these facts sustain that class of complaining politicians, who, disregarding the history of the past, as well as their obligations to truth, still prate about the "slave power," and its aggressions upon the interests of the northern States? Sir, can any intelligent man in the North, or anywhere else, listen with patience to these men, who, having no merit of their own, seek to obtain position by perversion of history and by an unwarranted crusade against those whom they ought to regard as friends, and not as enemies?

When the Kansas-Nebraska bill became a law of the land, it was hailed as a measure which was to bring peace to a distracted country. It was regarded as a measure of justice which was forever to withdraw the question of slavery from Congress, and leave it where the Constitution left it—to be determined by the people of the Territory, and to be by them settled in their own way, subject only to "the Constitution of the United States." In the discussion and settlement of that question it was ascertained that there were two parties in this country; one contending for the principle that Congress had the power to legislate in all things whatsoever for the Territories, and calling themselves the Republican party—a name, which, like their principles, was a usurpation and a fraud, and which "to be hated needs but to be seen;" and the other, the Democratic party, which, following in the pathway of the Fathers of the Republic, and adhering to the immortal principles of the patriots of the Revolution, declared its devotion to the doctrine of self-government and popular liberty, that "the people of the Territories were to be secured in the right of framing their own constitution in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States." Upon this issue the contending parties entered the memorable contest of 1856; and the result was, the elevation of the present Chief Executive to the head of the Government. Heartily imbued with the great doctrine of non-intervention, advocating and defending it, because it was not only just, but because in it they recognized the soul and life of the Federal Constitution, the Democracy of the country, North and South, staked their existence upon this issue. They were not guided and directed by that selfish spirit which their enemies charged them with entertaining. They did not favor the repeal of the Missouri restriction, and the establishment of the great doctrine of non-intervention, because they believed that thereby the institutions of the South alone would be benefited. Those who utter that charge are guilty of the vilest slander upon the patriotic masses of the North and South, who, in the eventful contest of 1856, were found united and doing battle under the banner of the Democracy.

I will not here endeavor to follow the Territory of Kansas through the many difficulties which have embarrassed her since the formation of her territorial government. They are familiar to every one, and need not be recited. That wrongs have been done there, no one who is familiar with her history denies. That individual cases of violence and outrage have been perpetrated by persons who have gone there from the North and from the South, is equally certain. No man regrets this more than I do; but I hold that with it we have nothing to do further than to aid in the execution of law, and in the maintenance of constituted authority. Why these scenes of violence and disorder are so constantly paraded here, I cannot understand, unless it be intended thereby to keep open the wound produced by sectional excitement, which, it occurs to me, every loyal citizen ought to endeavor to heal. The excitement which grew out of these difficulties had spread its poisonous contagion throughout the country, until every good citizen longed for its settlement; and we all looked, with eager hope, to that happy result, when it was known that the Legislature of the Territory had authorized the election of delegates to a convention to form a constitution preparatory to the admission of Kansas into the Union as an independent State. The delegates were elected, the convention assembled, and the constitution was framed. The only question which had divided and excited the people of the Territory and of the States, was submitted to the decision of the people. Every voter in the Territory was called on to express, at the ballot-box, his views on the question of African slavery. If he desired its existence in the new State, he had an opportunity to say so by his vote; and if, on the contrary, he thought it unwise and inexpedient to establish it there, he had the right and the opportunity to say so by his vote; and whatever might be the verdict of the majority was to be the fundamental law, until changed by the competent authorities. On the day fixed by law for the election, a majority of the votes which were cast decided in favor of African slavery.

It is said that only a minority voted, and that the will of the majority was not thereby expressed. I hold, sir, that no man has any legal authority for coming to such a conclusion. But let us admit, for the sake of the argument, that it is true: are we to be thus trifled with? Are we, by our action here, to await the pleasure or caprice of factious and disorderly men, who have shown by their conduct that they are ready and willing to hazard not only the peace of the Territory, but the peace and quiet and safety of the whole country, by their disregard for law? Suppose, sir, that we were to act thus in this instance: what would be the effect of our example? Shall we say, because a portion of our people—a majority of them, if you please—were to refuse to vote at all on our election day for President or other officers, that therefore we are to let the Government stand still, and await the whims of such men? Sir, it is a doctrine which strikes at once at the very root of popular government. If they did not see proper to vote, it was not because an opportunity was not presented. For my part, sir, I am sincere in the belief that the refusal of the Republicans and Abolitionists to vote was but in obedience to the instructions of their friends in the States, who desired this question kept open in order that they might still further inflame the public mind, and thus the more certainly advance their own selfish ends. I believe this to be true, sir, and I have no hesitation in so declaring.

But, sir, passing from this part of the subject, I ask what is the question to be decided by this Congress? Is it, shall we admit Kansas as a State at once, and thus forever settle this question, and take away from agitators their only source of excitement and discontent? Or shall we refuse her application, give new energies to the enemies of popular liberty, and endanger again the peace and quiet of the country? As for myself, I have no hesitation in coming to a conclusion. I would admit her at once as a State, on terms of perfect equality with the original States; give her a place in the bright constellation, and hail her as a sister worthy of our kindest care and tenderest solicitude. I would rescue her from that band of lawless marauders who have grown fat upon her blood, and made themselves happy in her desolation. I would place her where she, in her own power, and clad in her own garments of sovereign strength, can protect her people from outrage and wrong without the help of Federal armies, or Federal power. But, sir, when these things are within our control; when we have it in our power to relieve ourselves from all the difficulties which have incumbered us since 1854 with regard to this question, we are startled with the announcement that it must not be done because there has been no enabling act. That the Black Republican party should have taken this position would have astonished no man; for it was expected that that party would assume any position, however untenable, unwarranted, or ridiculous, to cripple the energies of the Administration, and thus better their chances for the succession. I say, sir, that we expected their opposition. We have long and patiently endured their insolence and borne their misrepresentations, and we have expected their opposition. But I was not prepared to look for opposition in some quarters from which it is coming. I confess that I was no little surprised when it was announced that the admission of Kansas into the Union was to be resisted, and one reason that was assigned was, that Congress had failed to pass an enabling act. When the admission of California into the Union was under consideration in the Senate of the United States, this same objection was urged against that measure. But a distinguished Senator [Mr. DOUGLAS] met the objection in a speech of great power and eloquence, a portion of which was ably commented on by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. LAMAR]. I give a portion of that speech because it contains arguments applicable to the present question, which are, in my opinion, the best answer to that objection that can be given. I commend them, and the whole speech, to those members who have urged this objection to the admission of Kansas. The Senator said:

"Surely you will not punish the people of California for your own sins—sins of omission, if not of commission. The people of California were entitled to a government, ought to have had one, and it is not their fault that one was not given to them. Nor was it my fault. It will be recollected by every Senator present—and I trust the fact will not be forgotten by the country—that more than one year ago, in December, 1848, I brought in a bill to authorize the people of California to form a constitution and State government, and to come into the Union. Had that bill passed, the proceedings would have been regular. Everything then would have been prescribed by law, and done according to law, so that the most fastidious could have found nothing to complain of. The people of California would then have done in obedience to law precisely what they have done without law. The previous assent of Congress would have been given; the qualification of voters defined; the mode of conducting elections prescribed; the time and place for the convention to assemble fixed, and, in short, all the rules and forms of proceeding would have been established by law, according to the most approved precedents. I pressed the passage of that bill upon Congress during the whole of the last session, from the first week until the last day. But it failed; and why? The arguments urged against it were, among others, that it was unnecessary; there was no satisfactory evidence that the people of that country desired it; and if they did, they could form their constitution and present themselves for admission at this session without an act of Congress authorizing it, just as well as with. Precedents were referred to for the purpose of showing that such a law was wholly unnecessary, as in the case of Vermont, Tennessee, Maine, Michigan, and perhaps others, where nothing of the kind was required. Well, the bill was defeated; and the people of California, acting upon these suggestions, and relying upon the precedents cited, have formed a constitution and presented themselves for admission. Now they are to be told that they cannot be received because Congress failed to pass such a law, and the proceedings are irregular without it. I do not precisely understand what is meant by the irregularities of these proceedings. I have examined the precedents in all the cases in which new States have been admitted into the Union, from Vermont to Wisconsin. I will not go over them in detail and point out the peculiarities in each case; that duty has been well performed by the Senator from Maine, in his speech a few days ago. Those precedents show that there is no established rule upon the subject; each case stands upon its own peculiar state of facts.

"There are several cases in which there had been no previous assent by Congress; no census taken; no qualification for voters prescribed; and, in short, when they were situated precisely as California now is."

The Senator, in another part of the same speech, went on to say:

"Whose rights have the people of California usurped? Certainly not the rights of the United States, for they expressly acknowledge our sovereignty—they claim to belong to us—and only ask that they may be permitted to enjoy the same rights and privileges with us." * * *

"What provision of the Constitution of the United States have they infringed? They recognize to the fullest extent that Constitution as the paramount law, and have formed for themselves a State constitution in strict obedience to it."

"I hold that the people of California had a right to do what they have done. Yea, that they had a moral, political, and legal right to do all they have done."

He further says:

"Have the people of the Territories of the United States no rights? I had supposed the principle was universally conceded in this country, that all men have certain inherent and inalienable rights; and I have yet to learn upon what grounds the people of the Territories are to be excluded from the benefit of this principle. I hold, also, as a political axiom, that all mankind have an inherent and inalienable right to a government."

Thus spoke the distinguished Senator from Illinois, when it was proposed to admit California into the Union as a State. It will be perceived that the same objections were urged against that measure that are now urged against the admission of Kansas; and the arguments and facts adduced in favor of that measure will apply equally well to the present question. But now, sir, gentlemen oppose the admission of Kansas, and give, among other reasons for their action, that Congress has failed to pass an enabling act. I have not referred to the position occupied by the Senator from Illinois, for the purpose of making him appear inconsistent, but because his arguments against the doctrine of refusing to admit a State because Congress has failed to pass an enabling act, are clear and comprehensive, and because they weigh heavily in determining the grave and important question now before us.

It will thus be seen, sir, that when the question for the admission of California (a free State) was under consideration, there was no indignation manifested by that distinguished gentleman, because there was no enabling act; but when Kansas comes, with a constitution recognizing and establishing slavery, it is said that a great outrage, a great violation of law, is about to be committed, because there has been no enabling act. Sir, it is not for me to say why there should be so manifest and decided a change in the opinions of distinguished men. But if I were to venture the opinion that it is because of the fact that Kansas does establish slavery, whilst in California it was prohibited, that changes have been effected in the minds of Senators and Representatives, I hope I would offend no one.

Again, sir, when the same question was under debate in the House of Representatives, I find that my friend from Illinois, [Mr. HARRIS], when addressing the House, advocated the immediate admission of California into the Union with her constitution and proposed boundaries. He said, (Appendix to Congressional Globe, page 410, Thirty-First Congress, first session):

"Mr. Chairman, I am for the admission of California as a State into this Union—California, as she is with her constitution and proposed boundaries. I wish her to be admitted now; I wish no remanding, a thing that never was done at all, and never ought to be done in such a case as this."

"The organization of government in California was the work of the people, urged by the necessity which existed from the neglect of Congress. If the people have a right to govern themselves, they have a right to originate government. The people of California have nobly exercised that right, and now ask Congress but to confirm what they have done. It will afford me pleasure to vote for that confirmation at the earliest possible moment."

Here, sir, is high authority, coming as it does from a gentleman of talents and spirit, a gentleman who has, from my first acquaintance with him, commanded my highest regard and friendship; and I would commend his arguments, made then, to all who doubt the propriety of admitting a State into this Union because Congress has failed to pass an enabling act.

I will pass by the fact, merely alluding to it, that by some able men it has been contended that the Kansas-Nebraska bill was of itself an enabling act. It was certainly intended by that act to allow the people to regulate their affairs in their own way; and I am at a loss to understand how those gentlemen, who oppose the admission of Kansas into the Union because the constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people, can deny that the organic act was an enabling act; for they say that it was the true intent of that bill that the constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people. Then the act must have conferred the power to create a constitution; for how could it be submitted until it was first framed? To those gentlemen whose action here is attempted to be justified by precedents, I would observe, that, on that score, the cases are about equal. It must be known to every one who has given the subject any attention, that there are precedents on both sides of the question. Acts of Congress were passed previous to their admission, authorizing the States of Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, Missouri, and Wisconsin, to form constitutions preparatory to their admission into the Union. But in the cases of Vermont, Tennessee, Maine, Arkansas, Michigan, Florida, Texas, California, and Iowa, no such acts were passed.

But, sir, whilst I have referred to these precedents, I have done so more for the benefit of those who rely much on precedents than for the purpose of justifying my own action. As for my part, whilst I am always anxious to know what has been the course pursued by the great and good men of the past, yet, I confess that I have but little faith in what are termed precedents. I believe that every measure ought to stand or fall on its own merits, regardless of all precedents; and I will endeavor always to shape my course so as to do what I think to be right and just and proper, though a thousand precedents may be against me.

Thus, sir, it will be seen that resistance to the admission of Kansas into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, for the reason that Congress has failed to pass an enabling act, is neither justified by reason and argument, nor by precedents; and, having said this much with regard to this part of the subject, I pass to the other objections urged by those who have taken grounds against the Administration on this question.

It has been said, that because the whole constitution was not submitted to a vote of the people for their ratification or rejection, the great doctrine of popular sovereignty was violated; and that for this reason we ought to refuse to admit Kansas into the Union. I do not agree with those who argue thus; for, sir, whilst I would not object to the principle of allowing the people of any Territory or State to vote directly on their fundamental law, yet I can, by no means, come to the conclusion, that because they have seen proper to do otherwise, and delegate to their representatives the power to form their constitution, the doctrine of popular sovereignty is violated. Our governments, State and Federal, are representative in their character. Can it be said that the laws which we enact here do not embody the will of our constituents, because they are not all submitted for their ratification, after we have enacted them? And is it true that the Legislatures of the various States, in regulating the domestic concerns of the people, do not represent the popular judgment? Are not their enactments in fact the acts of the people? It may not be true, sir, and doubtless it is not true, that every law which has received the sanction of the Legislature does reflect popular sentiment properly and entirely; but in the meaning of the phrase, when applied to our system, it is true in theory, that the representatives of the people are the people. Sir, it was the business of the people of Kansas, not ours, whether they would have their constitution submitted to themselves for ratification. They did not see proper to do so. If sovereignty resides with the people, the right to delegate their authority is inseparable from their sovereignty. The right to delegate their power is as important to the people as the right to act for themselves. The people of Kansas, through their lawful agents, the delegates, framed their constitution in their own way, and ratified it in their own way, as was very forcibly argued by my friend and colleague, [Mr. AVERY]; and, in my humble opinion, if we complain that they have formed their constitution in their own way, as they had a right to do under the wise provisions of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and demand of them before they are admitted that they shall form it in our way, or as we may choose to dictate to them, or that they shall ratify it in a manner prescribed by a majority of Congress, we violate the great doctrine of non-intervention, and open afresh the wounds which have so long afflicted the country. A majority of the States that have been admitted into the Union since the formation of the Federal Constitution, came in without having had their constitutions first submitted to the vote of the people. Many of them did thus vote upon their constitutions, and ratify them; and to that plan I offer no objection, where the people of the Territories themselves see proper to take that course.

But shall it be said that all those States which have been added to the Confederacy, which did not take that course, committed great outrages and violations of sacred principles? Does any one assert that an outrage was committed when my own native State was admitted into the Union, because her people had confidence in the integrity and honor of the delegates who molded her fundamental law; and because they saw proper to abide by its provisions without having first voted on it themselves? It strikes me, sir, that it would be going very far for any one to assume that position; and that it cannot successfully be maintained by any course of reasoning. Sir, they who are the real friends of popular sovereignty, and who honestly believe that the doctrine, when fairly and properly construed, leads to a submission to the vote of the people of every question involved in the fundamental law, may be excused for their course, to some extent, on this question. If they believe that in no other manner can the popular will be made manifest, I say, sir, that in my heart, I can find some excuse for their action, were this the only consideration involved in the question; but I can find no excuse, even for them, when I consider the other great results which a wrong step may bring about. But, as for the Black Republican party—that party which has for its fundamental doctrine that Congress has full and entire authority to legislate in all things whatsoever for the people of the territories, and which denies to the people thereof the right to govern themselves in their own way—it has no excuse for its pretended love for the will of the majority; and I confess that I can hear them prating about popular rights and the freedom of the people with no other than feelings of disgust.

Sir, have they not resolved in their platforms, and published it to the world, that Congress has authority to legislate in all things for the people of the Territories? Have they not pledged themselves, before the people and on this floor, time and again, never to vote for the admission into this Union of any State in which slavery is tolerated, though all its inhabitants might favor that institution? And will one honorable member of that party rise in his place and announce that he is ready to vote for the admission of a slave State, under any circumstances? No, sir; no, sir. Take this from their platform of principles, and the party would be at an end. And yet we are, from day to day, having long speeches from members of that party, arguing that Kansas ought not to be admitted because, they say, the Lecompton constitution is not the will of the people, and because there has been no enabling act. Is it not remarkable to hear gentlemen arguing thus, when they know, and when we all know, that not one of them would dare to vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, had they proof "strong as Holy Writ" that every man, woman, and child in the Territory approved it? Sir, who that has been at all observant of the course of the Black Republican party on these questions, believes, for a moment, that there is any sincerity in these pretended objections which they urge to the admission of Kansas? Does not every one know that the true reason which actuates them is their deep-rooted and eternal hatred to the South, her people, and her institutions?

There is one gentleman [Mr. HICKMAN] who has spoken on this subject, who, in the very beginning of his remarks, told us that he was an early, earnest, and sincere advocate of Mr. Buchanan's election to the Presidency of the United States, and he now expresses his deep regret that he is forced to differ with the President in relation to his present policy. Sir, that member was here as a Representative in the Thirty-Fourth Congress; and to those who observed his course then, I suppose it is no matter of surprise that he occupies his present position on this question. To those who witnessed his desertion of that Spartan band of Democrats who were here in that Congress, in the hour when, of all others, they could not well spare a man from their ranks—I say, sir, it is no matter of astonishment that he is found in the company he is now in. If the President ever expected him to come here and sustain his Administration on this question further than the gentleman thought it would advance his own political ends, I say, sir, Mr. Buchanan is not so good a judge of men as I had given him credit for being, and by far more hopeful in his disposition than most of his friends on this floor. The member was kind enough to warn us not to read too many men out of the party. Sir, I claim no authority to read anybody out of the party, nor do I think that the Democracy have yet conferred that power on any member here. But, sir, if they had conferred it, and were I the one who was to act in the capacity of "reading out" refractory members, there are some whose sins are so heinous, and whose treachery to Democratic principles so palpable, that I would not stop to read them out; no, sir; I would be in such hot haste to get rid of them that I would resort to some more summary method of ejecting them.

But, sir, so far as the member from Pennsylvania is concerned, there would be no necessity for either of these processes of getting rid of him. Sir, if he was ever a Democrat, (I deny that he ever was, except in name,) he has read himself out of the party; and no one need put himself to any further trouble on his account. If he was ever a member of the great Democratic church, I am sure he did not "enter in through the strait gate;" he must have climbed over the walls; and you all know the category in which a certain high authority places such a character.

But the most remarkable portion of the gentleman's speech was his closing sentence—remarkable because it contains an imputation upon the people of the northern States—upon his own constituency. He says:

"The time has come at last, and not too soon, when a new requisition will be made by northern constituencies—an earnest and manly defense of northern honor and of northern rights, whist giving the utmost demands of justice to their brethren of the South. If unpardonable to insist upon so much equality, then we have reached the end of national platforms, and the beginning of sectional Presidents—to my mind the last calamity to be survived; for then will begin those acts of aggressive interference which, leading to protracted and desolating wars, must end in establishing among children of the same blood the cruel relation of conqueror and captive."

Did the member from Pennsylvania mean to insinuate that, up to this time, northern constituencies have not required a "manly and earnest defense of northern honor and northern rights?" Does he mean to say that heretofore they have been content to be not equals, but inferiors in this Confederacy? If he does, sir, I, from my knowledge of the character and history of my countrymen in the northern States, deny the truth of his insinuations; and I have no hesitation in asserting that they are not the cringing, submissive vassals which his language makes them appear to be.

The gentleman assumes to himself the leadership in making these "new requisitions," when, as he says, northern honor and northern rights are to be vindicated, in that day when "national platforms are to have an end," and when "sectional Presidents are to have a beginning," which are, in his opinion, to lead to "protracted and desolating wars," and which "must end in establishing among children of the same blood, the cruel relation of conqueror and captive." Sir, I would regret to see such a state of things; but if unhappily it should ever come, I am very sure I will be on the opposite side from the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Yet I would regret to see the brave and generous people of the northern States under the leadership of a man, who, if he prove not more true to this new cause, which he assumes to be theirs, than to other causes which he has espoused, may leave them without a commander when most they need one.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] took the ground that in voting for the admission of a State we thereby indorse the provisions of its constitution. Sir, I was astonished that a gentleman of so much reputation as that member enjoys, should have taken such a position; and I was the more astonished when I remembered that he professes to be a Democrat. It would not have astonished me if the senior member from Ohio [Mr. GOODINGS] had taken that position; for he boldly declares that he has a right, and it is his duty to look into the provisions of State constitutions, and reject them if they do not suit his taste. But, sir, I have ever thought that the doctrines of the Democratic party forbid us looking further into the constitution than simply to inquire whether it is republican in form. What else is the doctrine contended for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but intervention of the rank and most odious nature? If his doctrine be correct, he can never vote for the admission of a slave State, no matter how large a majority of its citizens may favor the institution of slavery; and he will see that he has placed himself upon distinct Black Republican ground.

In voting for the admission of Kansas and of Minnesota, (and I expect to vote for both,) I do not understand that I indorse every provision in either of their constitutions. There are, doubtless, provisions in both of them that I do not like; and, indeed, I know of clauses which, had I been a citizen of either Territory, I would have opposed. Yet these constitutions are republican, and the people have made them to suit themselves, and I hold that it is no business of ours that they have seen proper to incorporate provisions in the fundamental law which I cannot approve. If the rule argued for by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be correct, I doubt whether another State, free or slave, could ever be admitted into this Union, for the representatives coming from thirty-one different States could rarely ever agree that any constitution was perfect, in their opinion. There is but one legitimate inquiry for us to make, after we have decided that the people of any given Territory are entitled to a State government, and that is: do they present us a constitution republican in form?

But it is alleged here, and in the other end of the Capitol, by the press of the Opposition, and by their orators, that frauds have occurred in the recent local elections in Kansas; and, sir, they are loud in their denunciation of these frauds and these pretended outrages upon the rights of the people of Kansas. They condemn the constitution framed at Lecompton, as not having received the sanction of the majority of the people, and call that document a fraud and an outrage. I shall not endeavor to exhibit the folly and falsity of those assertions, by showing that every man, who had a right to vote in Kansas, could have voted at the election for delegates to frame the constitution, and, at a later election, on the adoption of that instrument; this task having been already performed by the clear, explicit, and patriotic message of the President accompanying the constitution now before Congress. My object is simply to call the attention of the country to the inconsistency and insincerity of those who clamor so violently about popular rights and popular sovereignty, as it relates to Kansas; because one of the institutions of the southern States is involved in the question, and lightly pass over greater frauds and outrages, and a greater violation of popular rights charged to have been committed nearer home, in a State adjoining to this District—ny, sir, I may say almost in the very shade of this Capitol—a violation of the dearest rights of freemen, in which the white men of the country alone are interested. I speak of these things without having any personal knowledge of their truth or falsity; but we have the same authority for the one that we have for the other. During the past fall, two elections were held in the State of Maryland; one in the city of Baltimore for local officers, and the other throughout the State for State officers and members of Congress.

It is charged, sir, that, at the first of those elections, fearful outrages were committed; that old men, who were born in that city, and who had for more than thirty years exercised the highest as well as the dearest right of freemen—the right of the elective franchise—were driven from the polls; that hundreds of others, legal voters, were scourged and beaten, and prevented from voting; hundreds more, who were entitled to vote, through fear of the armed bands who surrounded the polls, kept away, preferring rather to lose their votes than to lose their lives. It is charged, further, that, while our party was thus outraged, the other, the dominant party, not only had free access to the polls, but the ballot-boxes were permitted to be packed with fraudulent and illegal votes, and this in the most open and daring manner. In the late elections for State officers and members of Congress, it is a matter of history that these things were so notorious that the Governor of the State felt called on to interpose his authority to protect the people in their rights. His late message to the Legislature of Maryland discloses circumstances (if true, and I have no reason to doubt them) compared with which the alleged frauds in Kansas sink into insignificance. Baltimore is but forty miles from this capital. She is a great commercial emporium. Her people are civilized and educated. Kansas is far out upon our borders; and her citizens, though intelligent, in a wild and newly-settled region could not be supposed, in the very nature of things, to be so obedient to the laws and regulations of society as the people of a great commercial city. Yet, sir, whilst the Black Republican members and others grow indignant over the few instances of violated law in Kansas, as yet I have seen no outbursts of patriotic indignation about the rights of the people of Maryland. Sir, is it not a significant fact that a whole country is to be aroused, and the very existence of the Government itself put in jeopardy by agitators, on account of alleged frauds in Kansas, when alleged frauds of mightier magnitude, occurring within forty miles of the Capitol, scarcely elicit a passing notice?

Sir, it occurs to me that no man can doubt for a moment the lessons which are to be derived from the scene which is now being enacted in this Capitol. Having an eye to the past history of this question, and accurately observing the position which men and parties are now assuming, I am deeply impressed with the conviction that the lessons which we are to draw are anything else but flattering to the future welfare of the country. Whatever reasons may be assigned by gentlemen, and however specious and accurate their reasons, for refusing to admit Kansas into the Union now, I suppose, sir, that no man doubts that the secret cause which is operating on the minds of members to hold her out of the Union, is the fact that her constitution establishes the institution of African slavery there. There may be, and doubtless are, some exceptions to this proposition. If this be so, sir, and I think it was clearly shown by my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] and I am sure that a large majority of those who differ from me on this question will not deny it, I ask, what is the proper and legitimate inference to be drawn by those of us who represent southern States and southern constituencies here? It is this, sir—and it is an inference which must sink deeply upon our minds—that henceforward no more slave States are to be admitted into this Union. In other words, that the time has come when we are to take an inferior position in the Confederacy; when the Government is to mark us and brand us with all the epithets which our Abolition enemies have been heaping on us for years; when we are to be the vassals of the Government, paying our due proportion of the taxes, and bearing our part of all the burdens, in peace and in war, without the right equally to participate in the blessings which the constitution confers. Sir, if Kansas is unworthy to come into the Union as a State because she has institutions like ours, then are we unworthy of our places here; if Kansas is unfit for the association of the States, so are we unfit.

Sir, this is a matter which strikes at the personal honor of every true southern heart. By declaring, as did the senior member from Ohio, [Mr. GWINN,] in his speech this morning, (and the sentiment pervades his whole party,) that he is unwilling to associate with any State whose constitution tolerates slavery, he flings a direct insult into the faces of the southern people. Born under a southern sky, nurtured in the lap of a southern State, which in intelligence and virtue, in noble bearing, in council, and upon the field of battle, has shown herself to be equal in everything to the proudest State in the Confederacy, as one of her humblest children, I stand ready to resent the insult and hurl it back into the teeth of those who offer it. They are unwilling to admit Kansas into the Union, because her constitution tolerates the institution of slavery. Sir, had this sentiment prevailed when the Constitution was made, we had had no Government. It did not prevail then. It did not prevail after the Constitution was made, in the earlier and better days of the Republic. It was reserved for the Black Republican party to announce a doctrine which directly strikes at the honor and independence of fifteen States of this Confederacy. These are conclusions which must force themselves upon every mind; and if they be fair and proper conclusions, strange as it may seem and revolting as it may appear to patriots everywhere, if my own native State of Tennessee were out of the Union she could not get in. No, sir; bright and glorious as has been her history, with the blood of her sons reddening almost every battle-field since she has been a State, loyal to the country, true and devoted to the Constitution, with the bones of her Carrolls and her Coffees, her Jacksons and her Polks, quietly reposing beneath her soil, under the operation of this principle of excluding States, because their institutions do not suit the tastes of Abolition traitors, were she to-day out of the Union, and come and humbly ask for admission, she would be hurled back with scorn and contempt.

If this is to be the ruling in the future, it is but right that the people who are to suffer from it should know it. I am not here to threaten or intimidate anybody. I expect every member to be guided by his own convictions of duty. I speak for a people who are not given to threatening, but who always deal candidly with friends and with enemies. But when the startling fact is made known to the people of Tennessee that hereafter they are to be considered as inferiors and not as equals in the Confederacy, whilst I do not assume now to say what they will do, I am warranted, from their past history, in asserting that they will take a position. It will be a position, too, not inconsistent with their honor, their independence, or their past history. And when they plant themselves upon a principle, they will stand by it. I say, sir, I do not know what they may do; but whatever steps my native State may see proper to take, I expect to go with her, and stand by her through storm and through sunshine, though her footsteps may lead through fire and blood and desolation. I have thought proper to say thus much, sir, but not in the spirit of unkindness or menace. I trust that wise and prudent counsels may govern us; and, above all, I call upon members to remember to do justice to every part of the Confederacy. It is only through just measures that the spirit of our Constitution can be administered. I call upon you of the North who have the courage, to stand up boldly in the midst of the storm, to heed not the appeals of demagogues, who urge you to flatter in your devotion to the constitutional rights of the people.

In some of the remarks which have been made on this subject, gentlemen have attempted to depict to those Democrats of the North who are standing by the President in this issue, the political graves to which their course is leading them. Sir, might we not infer from this that questions of political success, and not of principle, govern those gentlemen in their course on this question? And may we not come to the conclusion that it is "fear," and not "duty," which actuates them in opposing this measure of justice? The true hero is he who, when he knows the right, pursues it with a firm step and a steady eye, and lets consequences take care of themselves. In morals, in politics, and in war, he is a coward who consults anything else but his own convictions of duty. Had Washington listened to the "siren song" of those who counseled selfishness, the Revolution would not have been fought, nor American independence achieved; and had the immortal hero of the Hermitage heeded the warnings of false friends or the threats of coward foes, the crowning act of his life would have proved a failure, and his great name would have been shorn of half its glory.

Then I ask you again to be guided alone by your convictions of duty. Remember that perhaps upon the fate of this question depends in a great measure the confidence which one portion of the Confederacy, the weaker one, is to repose for the future in the justice of the dominant section. For if you succeed, as I trust you may not, in fully convincing the minds of the people of the southern States that they have no hope in the Confederacy but in degradation and oppression, you know too well the spirit which animates the children of the revolutionary fathers to doubt the result. The crowning feature of our Confederacy, and that one which wins for it admiration throughout the civilized world, is equality. I ask you not to destroy this, but let your energies be aroused, and your arms nerved, to maintain it and perpetuate it forever. If this be done, then will we not bring shame upon the memories of those who staked so much in the achievement of our liberties. But, sir, if tyranny and oppression are to take the place of independence and equality; if one section of this Union is to assume to govern the other because that other is the weaker; if, in short, the unbridled will of mere numbers is to rule without constitutional authority, then is the glory of our system departed, and we shall soon see the beginning of those scenes which foretell and foreshadow an end too dark and sad to contemplate without shuddering.

Let us hope, sir, that a spirit of justice and moderation may prevail, and that soon, very soon, our constituents may be made glad by the announcement that their Representatives have so guided and directed public affairs as to bring peace and quiet to the whole country, and give new assurances to the world of the wisdom of the framers of our noble form of government, and our high appreciation of the blessings which it confers.

Mr. MORSE, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen who have spoken on this side of the floor, on this Kansas policy, have stated all the facts. I shall not go over that ground. I regard this whole business, from the repeal of the Missouri compromise to the measure which is now sought to be forced through this body, as one undivided indivisible crime, and so it is regarded everywhere in the free States. We care not to dwell on the odious particulars; as a whole and in all its parts, from its inception to the depth to which it is now sunk, it is a blot on the face of this continent. That picture of fanaticism and ignorance which disfigures the basin of the great Salt Lake, described in nervous and graphic language some time ago by my friend and colleague, [Mr. THOMPSON,] has in it no colors and groupings so frightful and forbidding as that scene which, for four years past, has been presented on the soil of Kansas. In Utah we witness a social system, organized by men who, by their ignorance, low culture, and mental and spiritual debasement, belong to the ninth century, rather than the nineteenth; and its developments are the natural outgrowth, in any age, from any body of men so low and homogeneous in their civilization. In Kansas, on the contrary, the events are unnatural and monstrous, in the degree in which the actors and instigators are enlightened and exalted. The one spectacle we look at as on any slough in the abhorred past, which mankind has struggled through, but in which they were once mired. The other we regard as a violent assault on all that is best in our present life. The one is an excrescence on the American soil; the other dishonors the American name.

The facts, Mr. Chairman, I say have been stated, but the question recurs, why have these facts happened? Why, in the last four years, has the moral sense of the nation received shock after shock, till faith is weakened, not only in the stability of our institutions, and in the integrity of our public men, but in the virtue of mankind in our day? Four years ago an act was done here, which five years ago would have been looked upon everywhere, South as well as North, as an impossible crime; and yet we find here a Congress from the people, with a majority to sanction and even laud the act, and a President of the United States elected by the people, seeking to carry it to its ruthless consummation. The primal instinctive idea in the breast of every American man and boy, the central idea on which his citizenship rests, is that the election precincts should be sacred as a temple. Yet that idea has been mocked at, that sacred place invaded and defiled like butcher's shambles, and now we find a hundred men on this floor, who, if they do not excuse it, not only refrain from denouncing this violation of the most distinctive idea of American life, but are willing to avail themselves of it as an auxiliary to their ends. Where would this Kansas question be now except for the profanation of the ballot-box? It would not be in this House.

I know the special pleading, the fine-spun theory, under which men here claim the right to avail themselves of these frauds; but their reasoning is a flimsy form of words, satisfying neither themselves or others. I shall not attempt to reply

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

TUESDAY, MARCH 23, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 78.

to it. In all the concerns of life, not in legal only, but in all social arrangements, fraud vitiates where it touches; no technicalities, no casuistry can make it anything than infamous, or give credit or stability to any structure founded on it. We have seen worthy, honest men deny that there can be a law for the people higher than the Constitution, and charity should be extended to the inability to see so fine a truth; but the doctrine that a fraud must be acquiesced in merely because it has fully accomplished its object and enthroned itself in the place of law, can only be characterized as revolting and absurd. Yet, men here; men high in position; that portion of the great Democratic party which now controls the country, contend for this monstrous proposition; and the President of the United States has insulted the moral sense of Congress and of the country, in reasoning to the same conclusion. A fraud has been successful, and so it is to be honored as a right. There has ever been a class of thinkers who professedly and practically hold that nothing is intrinsically right or wrong, but that either is made by the dictum of power. Government determines what shall be moral and right, not morality and right what shall be government. Clothe a wrong in the form of law, cover it with the most ragged habiliments of law, and straightway it is to be respected and honored like the right in unspotted ermine. Politicians of this creed are not now for the first time heard of. The rights of conscience have never been violated in modern times; truth and liberty have never been betrayed and slain, except under form and color of law. Power, though backed by the minions of power, unscrupulous judges, and willing bayonets, seldom in history has ever dared to assault the rights of man, except under some pretext such as the President now urges; but I will venture to say, that for two hundred years—not since King James the Second attacked the liberties of England under this same old stained and dishonored guise—have the men of our blood and language, on either continent, been so assaulted in their most cherished rights, as in this Kansas policy.

To reach the result which is now attempted to be consummated, what has been encountered and overcome? The cherished traditions of our race were in the way, and they have been set at naught. The ballot-box was in the way, and it has been destroyed. The consciences, the bias of the well-meaning men of the Democratic party in favor of order and truth and right, were in the way; but now men are everywhere found among them to uphold a lie. The dignity of the President's office, the integrity of his pledged word, the respect which he owed to his own good name and his gray hairs, were all in the way, and they have all been set at naught to accomplish this purpose. I make no exaggerated statement. Men are aghast and appalled at these rapidly-maturing events. In every village in the North, in every school district, on the porch of every church, on the corners of every street, men ask each other the meaning and the wherefore of these things. Language fails them to give expression to their confounded thoughts. They find themselves precipitated in a new era, transferred in four years from a state in which homage was paid to truth and right, to one in which both are perverted and defied.

Mr. Chairman, it is my purpose to inquire whence comes this condition of things that now so weighs on us and on the country? The most superficial observer may see that it arises from a conflict of principles, of principles, too, which reach the foundations of society. In the North, we have all the elements evolved and beginning to work harmoniously, of the grandest civilization which man has yet reached; and at the South, another, and antagonistic system has arisen. They are derived from two opposite principles, which I must attempt briefly to indicate. In the North we have learned that it is the business and destiny of man in this world, and in every world, to work, each man for himself. That unceasing individual labor is his only means of acquiring those material, mental, and spiritual possessions which are within his reach; and that material wealth can be had in profuse and exhaustless abundance from nature only. In the South, the meaning of labor and the resources of nature are not understood, and of course the true mode of acquiring wealth is unappreciated. Men there seek it in some other way than by going themselves for it to the great storehouse. They hope to find it through the labor of their brothers, but fail to seek it themselves in the lap of their bounteous mother. The people of the one section flourish by positive production, of the other by what I may call aggression. The people at the South have not learned the mighty secret of the treasures locked up for them in nature; they have not learned that they prosper most when their brothers prosper, and that it is folly to try to acquire anything for themselves at the cost of others, when by so doing they must leave riches untouched which utterly beggar the present gains of men.

The North has some just perceptions of these truths. The effect of this principle at the North, and of the civilization which it has created there, is to make men averse to aggression; but the South are still laboring on the exploded theory that they can prosper by disregarding the rights of others. The one theory has quickened the entire North into a noble life, has heaped up on every side material riches, has stimulated the intellect to the highest efforts, and has, with thousands, opened the spirit to see the meaning and significance of this life, and of all this labor and strife in it. The other theory, that there can be any source of prosperity than hard individual labor, has measurably deadened the activities of the South, paralyzed their industry, and done much to pervert their best intuitions and instincts. The North is at this moment the most prosperous and progressive nation in Christendom; in every element that gives the highest dignity to man, it is the most hopeful and advanced; the South, deceived and betrayed by the other principle, so malign and hostile to everything good, presents an anomaly in the history of our Anglo-American race; its soil is neglected; from its people little is added to the intellectual wealth of the world; and how distorted are some of their spiritual perceptions may be seen from the fact that quotations are made from the Bible, on this floor, to prove that slavery accords with the law of eternal justice!

Under our national Constitution, then, two distinct and opposing forms of civilization are found. The one governed by the grand idea of the living present, that the true life of man in this world, and in all worlds, is unceasing individual labor; the other governed by the idea of the barbarous past, that men can prosper at the cost of the rights and labor of others.

These two principles, so antagonistic, have met in conflict in Kansas, and it is no marvel that the scenes enacted there should be marked by aggression and violence. The vital principle of the movement which we are resisting, of necessity involves the use of those means. When the President's special message on Kansas affairs was read here, we listened in consternation. But its false statements, its forgetfulness that there was any conscience left among men, its assumption that gross wrong should be sanctioned because successful, are the natural and necessary emanations from the principle which underlies the civilization of the southern States. It is, however, a valuable paper, for it verifies more completely than anything which has yet occurred how fully this principle pervades our national organization and animates the highest functionaries of the Government, and it has compelled the settlement now of the issue, which of these ideas shall shape the destinies of the country. The alternative is the triumph of one or the other under the Union, or the working out of each of its own destinies outside of the Union.

Can this present domination continue? The career it has been pursuing for four years past has shaken from all allegiance to it the majorities of all the free States. The time seems near by when it must give way to its antagonist; and it is a question of deep interest whether this surrender of power which it must so soon make will be temporary, as heretofore, or perpetual.

What are the reasons, Mr. Chairman, for believing that the North will hereafter be the controlling political power in the Republic. No man, even the most sanguine of northern men, can appreciate the inherent essential power of industry guided by science. It is this alone that gives vigor and vitality to nations. The expansion and growth of the free States, derived from this sure source, founded on eternal law, cannot cease, or, for a day, be stayed. Every part of the old States, and I may say every settled portion of the new, are filled with earnest working men, and though many or most of them may not be conscious of the end to which they toil, they are laying broad and deep the foundations of an empire which must exist, till higher conditions for man have been developed than any he has hitherto enjoyed. The lands of Nebraska, Kansas, Minnesota, Dacotah, and of States not yet born and named, in the West, have been kept pure and clean for the theater of the triumph of the race over a large share of the evil and barbarities of the past. Northern men have not been unmindful of the significance of the fact, that these gardens of the earth have been reserved for the men of the present age. Many see with eyes which are not mortal, are told by a voice which never deceives, that this combination of science and work, trained and ready, and so vast a field for their exercise, is not arranged to be frustrated. They know that through all this fluctuation of events, there runs an eternal purpose that man shall, from time to time, attain higher stages of life; and they see the future to which these western Territories are destined, with as much certainty as if it had now been achieved. I may say here, it was the impulse of such thoughts and anticipations that sent so many earnest men to Kansas from the North; their purpose was not to rescue that country from the South, but to save it for mankind, free from any blight or stain. These irrepressible activities within the free States cannot be thwarted by any political action; they may be dammed up and checked, but only to flow on in a fuller tide.

The stimulus of these transactions in Kansas, the warning of this message, have quickened and intensified the conviction, which had already penetrated the North, of their duty and destiny on this continent. Hitherto occupied with their private pursuits, the tendency among them has been to be neglectful of public concerns. Though national legislation had been adverse to their interests, they had learned to accommodate themselves to it; and, with a versatility as great as their energy, had found new channels of industry, preferring rather to yield to the encroachments of power, than to turn aside from their more lucrative and congenial work to arrest them. But it is a fact with our northern people, that when, by their neglect, political wrongs accumulate, and the mischief therefrom becomes intolerable, they pause from other pursuits, and with spontaneous and irresistible impulse, restore the right to its proper status.

The late charter election in the city of New York has a national significance in this respect. That city government had passed into the hands of men who act from what I have called the principle of aggression, and not of industry; and the inevitable results of misrule, violence, and corruption followed. The people at length combined to put down the evil. On the one side stood the true workers in northern life, and on the other its opponents, backed by the Democratic party, and by the President of the United States, with the power of his office. The result of the contest is before the world. So it ever is when right and wrong meet in the last encounter. The just thing is often postponed for the unjust; but, in the end, in the final summing up, the right and the might are ever found to be one. The principle which underlies and regulates the whole northern life is yet to master this continent. In its unfathomable depths lie untold wealth and strength and knowledge and purity and glory; political wrongs and lies and barbarities will drop therein like rain, and disappear; it winds through all channels of society; it pervades the North; it will penetrate the South; it will dispel all false lights; and it will shame and rout and confound that other principle, and all its hosts, which has so long controlled the action of this Government, and with which we are now contending on this floor. The most sagacious statesmen of the South have long seen this coming result. When Mr. Calhoun, a few years before his death, advanced the doctrine that an equilibrium between the northern and southern States should be maintained, he discerned the preponderating, though then in many respects latent, power of the North, and thought to check it by an abstraction; but he overlooked the fact that the North derived its strength, not from any constitution or statute, but by her men working in conformity with a law higher than all constitutions or statutes. Other statesmen think this growth can be balanced and checked by adding to the Union new Territories near the tropics; but they do not realize that infinite nature coöperates with the North; that her subtle forces transcend any lines of latitude and longitude; and that there is more wealth and national power in the little Merrimac river than in the Territory of Arizona. Others endeavor to contend more directly, hand to hand, with this power; but the example of Kansas shows how futile has been this, and ever will be any such attempt. That country has now concentrated in it a larger share of the best spirit of the North than any other equal portion of the West; and, instead of being conquered, has been made the vigorous, tried, and intelligent advanced guard of the best northern ideas. Others, and perhaps all, have endeavored to resist this power by controlling it through the Federal Government; but the result they have now reached demonstrates how feeble and powerless is legislation against just ideas—official influence against a living principle.

Sir, the result of this contest has never been doubtful to men who looked beneath the surface and considered the principle from which the energy and growth and wealth of the giant North comes. It has been obvious that, for a long time, the national power has been kept from the North, not by the proper strength of those who kept it, but by political stratagem and management. The control of this country cannot permanently be held by such means; but when, at length, force and fraud are practiced to such a degree as to make all former party meanness and trickery seem legitimate and respectable, the consummation, the felo de se, has been reached. The special message of the President has inaugurated a new era. Already do we feel, while he and his party are still in office, that the scepter has been taken from them.

The success or defeat of this measure can have little bearing now on the doom of this national Democracy. The fact is apparent that the party which represents the sentiment of the North is about to take possession of the Government; and what party or class, North or South, has not reason to regard this event with satisfaction?

What should be the feeling of the masses of the Democratic party at the North towards it? Have they not reason to rejoice at the emancipation which awaits them? There is no despotism like that of party. The constitution and temperament of most men incline them to yield to it, though they may at heart repudiate it. In no country has there ever been a thralldom more tenacious and binding than the discipline of this Democratic party. Its subjects or victims, from year to year, have been compelled to sacrifice their personal independence and freedom of political thought. Many yielded their assent to national legislation which their judgment assured them was prejudicial, not only to the interests of the country, but to their own private interests. Others—and they number by thousands—have been forced by this master to reject and degrade the very cornerstone of their faith, and to sacrifice their highest moral convictions as to their duty in the guardianship of the Territories. They saw the whole influence of the party and of the Government, the Constitution, the judiciary, and the Army, perverted and abused in repeated attacks on the traditions and conscience of the free States, and on their own proclaimed and cherished principles; and yet they still sat mute, abject, and helpless, under this party control. An exodus escaped from it when the Missouri compromise was repealed. The shock of the act startled many into a consciousness of their true position, of their recreancy to themselves and humanity, in longer adhering to a party which made the approval of such a deed a test of political faith. Still, there were enough left in the party to return fifty members to this Hall from the free States; and to bring this remnant to a like consciousness, a still stronger and more effective remedy was needed. That remedy has been administered. They are now required to approve of, and make themselves parties to, directly or indirectly, all the crime and turpitude of these Kansas transactions. They are specially required to approve of this message of the President, a document which cannot be characterized by language fit to be used in this Hall. This is a lower deep to which not even party discipline could carry the masses of its most conservative adherents. At last their manhood has aroused itself, and they, too, have thrown off these fetters.

I say, then, is there any portion of the Democratic party at the North who can regret that this domination is at an end? As they look back at the hard and barren path which they have been drilled and marched through with bleeding feet, will they not rejoice to find themselves out of it? and will not even the most undying adherents of party, who would cling to it as long as it had any life, rejoice to be relieved, by its death, from a fidelity which must be so odious? I say, then, that the Democracy of the North are ready for the advent to power of the party representing the ideas of the North.

I would like now, sir, to consider what will be the sentiment and action of the South at this change? Will our countrymen of the South dissolve the Union when they find the Government in the absolute control of the most advanced northern thought?

While the southern people, for the most part, I believe, have given up the notion that what they call abolitionism extends to the interference with slavery in the slave States, they charge that we are Abolitionists, because we object to their carrying their slave property, and the laws which regulate it, into the Territories. The Territories, they say, are their property as well as ours; but that if we prevent their carrying their slaves thither, we necessarily exclude them from their share of the estate; for the effect of this exclusion, as they contend, will be to concentrate and hem in their redundant and increasing slave population within the limits of the present slave States till that property becomes valueless and unmanageable. They admit that though slave labor, as they say, produces quick and large profits, it exhausts the soil, and hence requires an indefinitely large area to expand upon and exhaust. Therefore, they claim the right to take possession of these Territories for this purpose. Whether or not this pretension is a just one has been the issue before the country; and as it has been decided against them, what will they do in the advent to power of a party to carry out this decision?

The party of the free States contend, on this point, that this admission of the slave owners is conclusive against them, for they can have no right to injure and exhaust the soil which we hold in common with them. We do not exhaust it; we dig into it and fertilize it; we ransack science and art to fructify it; we publish newspapers and books, and institute societies, to illustrate the best manner of improving it, and therefore can never admit that it is the privilege of our tenant in common to waste it. "Then," say our coöwners, "divide it; give us our share to use after our own fashion, and you take yours." We answer, "the division was once made; you took your part and have it still, and now claim ours. Henceforth, all this property, acquired, as you say, with our common blood and treasure, shall be held in common, and neither party shall use it to its detriment. It shall be used as the lands of all civilized nations are used. No rude, barbarous, blighting tread shall crush the processes of industry and science, which alone can develop the wealth hidden in its depths. Its wastes and wildernesses shall be made the homes of happy men, the homes of southern men as well as northern; and it shall not be converted into an empire of negroes, from which the industrious sons of the South, as well as the North, will be alike excluded." Though firm in this determination, the North is not indifferent to the problem as to what shall be done with slavery in the slave States if excluded from the Territories; they are far from being indifferent over the apprehensions of the South on this grave question. The condition of the South no man can regard without deep solicitude. No nation was ever in a more painful strait. Every pulsation of slavery is against the law of production, and where it exists it will waste and dry up every source and spring of prosperity. It can only flourish by expansion; but expansion over fertile and beautiful virgin lands, in like manner to curse and blight them, is an alternative which the voice and arm of the North and of the nation will never permit.

As an offset to this evil of slavery with them, southern gentlemen on this floor have adverted to, and quoted statistics to show, the huge masses of poverty, degradation, and want in the northern cities. The existence of the frightful fact we admit to its fullest extent. It is, as our southern friends charge, a cancer on the fair face of the North. It, like slavery, weighs heavily on our national life; and both seem beyond removal by this generation. What may be their ultimate fate, who can determine? For myself I would say that my faith is, that science is now a child; and when its power shall grow, these and like evils will be resolved by its resistless analysis. But as to the course now to be adopted, of one thing only we are positive: if we cannot remove them, we can and should prevent their extension. Slavery and poverty both come from the same source—the fruitful source of all evil; they come from perverted and vicious ideas of the value of human labor; and their removal can never be effected while those ideas are fostered, fought for, and defended as eternal truth. In reference to this matter of slavery in the slave States, a suggestion has been made on this floor which is worthy of scientific and careful scrutiny. There are tropical and equatorial lands on this continent suited to negro labor; and in the developments of the future, it may be that this redundant negro population will flow in that direction, and leave our southern brethren free from that incubus, and at liberty to join us at the North in a right career.

But, sir, the South accept none of these views. They deny and vilify them, and threaten that a party which avows or tolerates them shall never control this country. The answer to these threats is a brief one. When the party of the North ceases to act in obedience to the great principle which underlies the civilization of the North, it will find no support there; but while it does so act it will commend itself to the candid, thoughtful, controlling men of the South. We do not claim that this party will be, or is, spotless. We do not pretend that there are not, and will not be in it, sordid, selfish, sectional, narrow-minded men; and that men of that character will never hold office under it of trust and dignity. We know too well that, in the North as well as the South, every stratum of society is crowded with men of low aims and instincts. But I say here, and in saying it I utter a truth that finds its home in the breasts of thousands of noble men, that the one grand aim of the Republican party—I will not say of the Republican party, I will discard all party in stating the fact—the one aim of the intelligence, thought, refinement, spirit, and genuine true life of the North which now finds its best expression through the Republican party, is to bring this whole nation—the South as well as the North, the slave States as well as the free, Kansas and Mississippi, Georgia and New York—under the dominion, not of any party called by any name, new or old, or originated in any latitude, North or South, but under the dominion of just ideas and eternal principles under the dominion of that incessant presence, which, brooding over the concerns of men, has already lifted this nation to a new plane of national life, and will carry it, and every part of it, yet higher, in spite of all ignorance, obloquy, and prejudice in the southern States. This now dominant party, I assert, has no sectional ends in view; its sole purpose is to give full scope and development to the power of human industry; and through that, as the only possible instrumentality to add to the strength and well-being of every community. Its devotion is not to the interests of a section, but to a principle—a principle on which all that is valuable in the world rests.

Why should the men of the South resist this sway? They have tried the operation of the opposite principle; and are they satisfied with the experiment? Has it carried them to the heights of this century? Has it given them riches equal to the North? Has it invited population among them? Has it driven penury and ignorance from the masses of their people through their broad country? Has it dotted their land with schools and colleges? Has it given them a literature? Has it infused among them an enlightened, catholic perception of the best thought of the present day? I do not wish to underrate the gains of the South. I am not unmindful that that great country, in many parts, exhibits wealth and growth, and that in every part it is adorned by men of high aims and culture; that the virtues and graces of hospitality, charity, and good will, abound; and that patriotism and a generous enthusiasm find there a natural soil. The men of the South, in blood, lineage, and endowment, like the men of the North, are foremost in the files of time; they, with us, are the inheritors of the ages; and, of course, under any circumstances, however adverse, must collect around them much that is valuable and elevating. But the most superficial observation shows, and statistics prove, that, though they have as fertile a soil, a more genial climate, and are under the same political institutions, yet, in their progress and prosperity, they halt far behind their sister States. They have had the control of the Government, and have used it for their own benefit; but the trouble in their midst has proved beyond all remedy or relief from that quarter, as administered by them. The North, governed in its most essential economy by a principle discarded at the South, presents a boundless prosperity, ever young and vigorous; while the South, under the other control, presents the picture I have hinted at, and which it is painful to dwell upon. These two systems have been tested. The South have ever existed under the one; and will they now refuse to receive any influence and aid from the other? Is the fruit of the tree under which they live that of the tree of life?

Here on this point, and in reference to this matter directly before us, let me ask how they relish this Kansas-Lecompton policy of the Administration, the necessary legitimate product of that tree? How do they like being compelled to keep silent at that violation of good faith committed in their name by the repeal of the Missouri compromise? How do they fancy being made the allies of that horde of ruffians who elected the Kansas Legislature in 1855? How do they feel at being obliged to take John Calhoun to their bosom, and to keep silent over the frauds, villainies, and outrages committed in Kansas, in furtherance of what is supposed to be their interests? They see in all their deformity and hideousness the facts on which our opposition to this Lecompton constitution is founded, and must regard the policy under which that instrument is enforced as disgraceful to themselves and the age under which they live. The men of the South claim to be men of honor; that honor is their star; that their skies are not brighter and purer than is the escutcheon of their sons. We, too, admit that honor is not a tradition among them, but a living, vital essence; it marks their popular life at home and accompanies their Representatives to this Hall; and therefore, I ask, are they not restive under this necessity of upholding these Kansas transactions; the offspring of brutish, vulgar men, marked by meanness, lying, treachery, and blood, as well as by the violation of law and the rules to which civilized men conform? Do the men of the South willingly uphold these villainies? Do they voluntarily unite themselves with such foul allies? Do they wish to advance what they conceive to be their interest in the Republic by the sacrifice of all law and principle and precedent, and by the aid of force and fraud and crime? I ask, are the people of the southern States, their gentlemen, their men of honor, willing to stand in the presence of the sun as the aiders and abettors of these deeds? Are they satisfied to be recorded in history as seeking to promote even what they may regard their rights by means so shameful? I cannot believe that the light of honor—the peculiar glory of the South—has become so faded and dim in our southern horizon. I believe it would be a libel to say that the people of the South, in their own home convictions, do not repudiate these deeds, and revolt at being dragged through such foul waters.

Mr. Chairman, what is the meaning, then, of the fact that we have no expression from the people of the southern States denouncing all this business done in their name? Why is it that these things are either defended, as the President defended them, and as they are defended on this floor, and in the southern press, or else an ominous silence is observed? Why do we wait in vain for a loud, indignant, trumpet-tongued disclaimer of all participation in this unclean thing? I will do them the justice to say that I believe they abhor it, but that they are forced by this, their evil genius, this principle and law under which they live, into this startling submission and acquiescence; and, I ask, can they see no reason to be reconciled to the necessity which is now upon them, of trying some other policy of government and life than one which produces such results? While I do not claim for the North any special exemption from the vices of meanness and illiberality, or from any other vices, greater or smaller; and while I may admit that in their personal dealings and intercourse with each other and the rest of mankind, they are marked by no higher and more scrupulous sense of honor than their southern fellow-citizens; yet I assert that this Kansas policy never for one hour would have been tolerated by northern men if attempted in their name, and by an Administration controlled by their influence and for their interest. They would not touch with gloved hands, they would abhor as sacrilegious, accursed, and ill-gotten, any acquisition by such disreputable measures. The southern constituencies would not be obliged to send Representatives to this House, chosen with the sole intent to prevent such a policy. They would not now be watching the proceedings of Congress from day to day with painful apprehension lest grosser wrong may disgrace the nation. The sentiment of the North would itself rebuke the outrage, and put it to shame, and take care that no stain from it should be left on the garments of the people. Such instrumentality to aid northern progress would be regarded as destructive to its own end, and no party which adopted and approved it could survive one election.

The contrast here presented is a fact which is well worth the study of our southern friends; and it is commended to their consideration in view of the other fact, that the Government henceforth is to be controlled by the ideas of the North. If this assertion which I make be a fact, do they not recognize in it a true thing, and feel that the spirit which calls it out is that which will and should possess the Government?

Sir, there is no contest by the North with the South, though the southern people persist in assuming that there is one. The contest which the North is waging, and will carry on from generation to generation, is with the obstacles which delay human advancement, and in this fight they desire to meet the South as allies, and not as foes. If the institution of slavery is one of those obstacles—and however gentlemen may argue here and elsewhere, the experience of the southern States proves that it is a mighty one—they are ready to aid, as far as possible, in obviating the evil it engenders. They believe in the inexhaustible power of science, and that when its calculus is brought to bear on this matter of slavery, a way in which the southern States may rid themselves of it will be discerned. But they engage in no Quixotic enterprise, and believe the southern people will have to study and solve the problem for themselves. But while this is true, the North have more than a mere negative opposition to slavery. Like every other impediment to the progress of man, it is hateful to the North. Regarding it as the offspring of a principle deadly hostile to their own highest life, they will drive it, and every influence arising from it, from their borders. When the southern people claim the right to introduce it in the Territories, it is considered by the North that they are not asking anything valuable and beneficial for themselves; but are claiming the right to obstruct the expansion, not of the North and northern interests, but of those principles which contain the best and highest hopes of the South as well as the North. We do not claim the right to exclude slavery from the Territories to increase northern political power; but to hasten the civilization of the continent, and the redemption of man from the thralldom and barbarities that have hitherto beset him.

Our southern friends may be unable to see, or may refuse to see, the earnestness and integrity of these connections and purposes; but whether appreciated or not, and though they may be misrepresented and maligned, they cannot be shaken; and we shall continue to fight the battle, for the South and the North, and for humanity, in resisting the introduction of slavery into the Territories. Here we take our stand. No interference with slavery in the slave States, except that which science and sympathy will necessarily create; no influence from slavery in the free States; and no print of a slave's foot on the soil of the Territories.

Are all these principles so odious to the southern people that they will not try their operation? or will they try them, and submit, submit not to the North, but to the truth and eternal law?

Mr. SMITH, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, in rising to address the committee on the all-exciting and engrossing subject, the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, I do not flatter myself that I can say anything new or that will interest the members of this House; but I owe it to my constituents and to the people of my State, that my views should be known and declared on this question. Sir, I earnestly protest against the issue which is attempted to be made in this House upon the Kansas question—that it is a question of slavery and anti-slavery. So far as I am concerned, and so far as the Democratic party of Illinois is concerned, the question of slavery has nothing to do in the admission of Kansas into the Union. We are as ready to take Kansas into the Union with as without slavery. The only question with us is, "Does the Lecompton constitution express the views and wishes of the majority of the bona fide settlers of Kansas?" That is the only fact we want to know. That was the question upon which the late presidential contest turned—the right of the people to form a constitution for themselves, unawed and unmolested. While I believe, with the President, it to be the true policy to lay down a rule that no new State shall be admitted into the Union unless its constitution has been submitted to a vote of the people, and approved by a majority of the actual settlers thereof; still, in this case, satisfy me that the Lecompton constitution embodies the wishes of a majority of the actual residents of Kansas, and I will vote for admission to-morrow; but until I am convinced of that, I cannot and will not vote for the admission.

The Lecompton constitution is evidently obnoxious, not only to the people of Kansas, but to a large majority of the people of the whole country. To show this, I shall quote from some of the prominent public journals North and South, and from the opinions publicly expressed by many of the distinguished Democratic statesmen, who have long stood prominent in the ranks of the party, and whose eminent public services have gained for them the admiration and confidence of the people throughout the Union. When I find opinions expressed by distinguished Democrats agreeing with my own, I prefer indorsing them to expressing my own.

I quote from Mr. Bancroft's eloquent letter to the people of the city of New York, in relation to the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. He says:

"The policy of enforcing the Lecompton constitution on an unwilling people is neither wise, nor expedient, nor possible. Principle is the true diviner's wand, by which the President of a free people sways the millions, and secures majorities for his measures in Congress. The neglect of principles for temporizing expediency always loses the respect of majorities in Congress and out of it. The ship of State is water-logged; throw the fraudulent Lecompton constitution overboard; let principle take the helm, and the bark will spring forward on its way as in the best years of our Republic. Ours is the cause of peace, of order, of true Democracy, of union, freedom. All good omens are with us. For our part, we are resolved to walk in the central path of humanity, stunning sectionalism and fanaticism on the one side, and subservience to dictation on the other. True Democracy inscribes on its banner the rights of the States and the sovereignty of the people; it upholds freedom to the individual in the State, freedom to the State in the Union, and the indefeasible right of the majority, whether in a State or in a Territory, calmly, deliberately, and undisturbed, to form and accept, or reject, a constitution for themselves."

Mr. Bancroft is too well known as a statesman and a sound Democrat to require any indorsement from me.

Again, I read from the letter of the Hon. John A. McClernand, to the people of Illinois. He says:

"The Topeka and Leecompton constitutions alike deserve the condemnation of all just men—the first as a rebellion against the authority and laws of the United States; the latter as a fraud and usurpation upon the rights of the people of Kansas. One was an act of moral treason against the Government; the other is an act of moral treason against the people. Nor does the submission of the slavery clause to the vote of the people of Kansas extenuate the enormity of the Leecompton outrage; on the contrary, it aggravates it—aggravates it by adding insult to injury. Why not submit the whole constitution? It is answered, because it would have been voted down! If so, is not this the very reason why it should have been submitted, and should not be forced upon the people of Kansas?"

The South never had a firmer or truer friend. Many of the members of this House will recollect his course when a member, and his uniform support of the constitutional rights of the South.

Mr. Chairman, the Leecompton constitution, not having received the ratification of the people, and not fulfilling the requirements of the Kansas act, and disregarding the Democratic principle of popular sovereignty, should be treated by the President and Congress as a nullity until it receives such ratification. It is passing strange that certain public journals and individuals, who were loud and bitter against the Leecompton constitution before the commencement of this session of Congress, are now its warm and zealous advocates. I would call upon an enlightened and honest community to judge in regard to the means and influences which have produced this sudden and marvelous change in their opinions and actions. The Leecompton constitution is the same now as when it was framed by the convention; and, sir, I can see no reason for such sudden conversions of gentlemen, unless it be to enable them to bask in the smiles of the Administration, and participate in the favors it has to bestow.

Let me call the attention of the committee to certain articles from the New York Herald before the commencement of this session of Congress:

"KANSAS IN A NEW SHAPE." * * * * "This is a coup d'état which nobody outside of the secret affiliations of this convention could have anticipated. It is, in fact, a revolutionary movement, which puts the local affairs of Kansas in a more critical shape than any of the many other phases through which they have passed. It appears that the Solons of this aforesaid convention have decided—

"1. A strong pro-slavery State constitution, which is not to be referred to the people.

"2. A separate reference of the slavery question to a vote of the people, which will not affect the slavery provision of the constitution in the slightest degree; either one way or the other.

"3. That Governor Walker is deposed.

"4. That the regular Territorial Legislature is superseded.

"5. That a regency or provisional government is established, with dictatorial powers, of which Mr. John Calhoun is the chief, under the title of Governor, and that this regency is to go into operation immediately.

"Now, this beats the Topeka government of Generals Lane and Robinson all hollow. It surpasses anything that we have seen of the political pretensions of Brigham Young; for with all his assumptions of divine right and squatter sovereignty, he has never so flatly repudiated the supreme authority of the General Government as these Leecompton constitution makers. Their proceedings are without a parallel, and there is nothing like a precedent for them in the case of any other Territory of the Union, past or present. On the contrary, the Federal Constitution, the organic law of Kansas, all popular rights, and territorial claims and usages, are boldly set at defiance by these Kansas dis-organizers.

"The proceedings in question would amount to nothing more than a contemptible farce did we not know that they are intended for mischief, and that the mischief makers are dispersed over a much larger area than that of Kansas Territory. It is thought that the design of this Leecompton regency is to stifle the Legislature and the popular voice of Kansas upon the main issue, in exciting a general squabble among all parties in the Territory upon the local question of jurisdiction. It is further supposed that this regency, through this cloud of smoke and dust, will push off to Washington and attempt to hurry through the admission of Kansas upon the basis of their pro-slavery constitution, in advance of the meeting of the Territorial Legislature.

"The party of the Topeka constitution some time ago, in an irregular attempt to set up their peculiar government, were dispersed by the United States troops; and if a milder process should prove inadequate against any overt act of this Leecompton regency, the dragons should again be called into requisition. We have no fears of the ultimate issue of this Leecompton movement. It will fail. The parties interested in it cannot entertain a serious hope of its success. We presume that their objects are agitation, sectional discord, and a southern ultra-sectional rebellion. We believe that their immediate purpose is to cast the fire-brand into Congress upon which our southern fire-eaters have resolved to cut loose from the Administration, and to set up a sectional party on their own account for the next Presidency."—New York Herald, November 18, 1857.

Little did I think, Mr. Chairman, during the late presidential campaign, when contending against the Republican party, led by Colonel Fremont, and backed by the New York Herald, that this same Herald would read me out of the Democratic party the first year of Mr. Buchanan's administration; and that many politicians who have been as vacillating in their politics as the Herald, would join in the hue and cry of reading Democrats out of the party, who never gave a vote for President to any one but the regular nominee of the party. The Herald, when writing the above, was the warm friend of the Administration, and it is fair to presume that he expressed his views at that time.

The Union, I believe, has been the organ of the Administration since it came into power. I quote from an article of that paper, of the 7th July, to show the opinions of the Administration at that time on Kansas affairs:

"We repeat, that the constitution of Kansas must come from the people of Kansas. Other power to make such an instrument there is not under heaven.

"We do most devoutly believe that unless the constitution of Kansas be submitted to the direct vote of the people, the unhappy controversy which has heretofore raged in that Territory will be prolonged for an indefinite time to come. We are equally well convinced that the will of the majority, whether it be for or against slavery, will finally triumph, though it may be after years of strife, disastrous to the best interests of the country, and dangerous, it may be, to the peace and safety of the whole Union.

"Again: this movement of the territorial authorities to form a constitution is made, not in the regular way, in pursuance of an enabling and authorizing act of Congress, but in the mere motion of the Territorial Legislature itself. Nay, it has been begun and carried on in the teeth of a refusal by Congress to pass such an act. This irregularity is not fatal. There are other cases in which it was overlooked. But it can be waived only in consideration of the fact that the people have expressed their will in unmistakable language. If we dispense with the legal forms of proceedings we must have the substance.

"We think, for these reasons, that Governor Walker, in advocating a submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, acted with wisdom and justice, and followed the only line of policy which promises to settle this vexed question either rightfully or satisfactorily. In this respect, at least, he has done nothing worthy of death or bonds."

I am not unaware of the means and measures resorted to to affect public opinion. Already prominent Democrats are being removed from office, and, as I believe, for no other reason than that they are against the admission of Kansas under a constitution to which three fourths of the people are opposed, and because they rigidly adhere to the true principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, which guarantees to the people the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. I look, Mr. Chairman, with fearful forebodings to the future, if opinions are to be changed for offices or patronage in the gift of the President; if the principle of popular sovereignty is to be set aside, and the rights of the people of a Territory disregarded, because the President, on the ground of expediency, recommends it, while he admits that the opposite course is just, are we not on the road which, if pursued, will lead to despotism or dissolution?

The President, in his annual message, says:

"Under the earlier practice of the Government, no constitution framed by the convention of a Territory preparatory to its admission into the Union as a State, had been submitted to the people. I trust, however, the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions. I look it for granted that the convention of Kansas would act in accordance with this example, founded, as it is, on correct principles; and hence my instructions to Governor Walker, in favor of submitting the constitution to the people, were expressed in general and unqualified terms."

Governor Walker acted upon these instructions, and says, in his letter to the Indiana Democracy, in speaking of his pledges that the constitution should be submitted to a vote of the people:

"These pledges, and these alone, it is conceded, prevented revolution and civil war. And why should they not now be redeemed? For myself, these pledges have been thus far most faithfully maintained, and they will be redeemed by me, if necessary, with the last drop of my life's blood, and to the latest hour of my existence. These were pledges well known to the President and all his Cabinet. They were pledges given by me in good faith, and any abandonment of them now on my part, after the people had accepted and acted upon them, would be to cover myself with infamy and dishonor. Whatever, then, may be the action of the wavering, timid, or corrupt—menace and proscription have no terrors for me. I will continue to tread the path where conscience and duty call me, regardless of all consequences or sacrifices, personal or political."

Governor Walker proceeds to argue the case.

He grows indignant and eloquent as he considers how this case is treated by the Executive:

"Where are we, and in what direction are we drifting? Are we upon the banks of the Bosphorus or Danube, or upon soil consecrated to popular sovereignty by the blood of the Revolution? Is it Executive edicts or sovereign rights that constitute the liberties of our country? Are we freemen 'who know our rights, and knowing dare maintain,' or are we vassals, serfs, or slaves, palace slaves, that will cringe or change at the stamp of the foot of a master? Is it the people and the States, as represented in the Senate and House of Representatives, who are to record their votes as indicated by their unbiased judgment; or are they merely to register Executive edicts, under penalties for refusal, of denunciation and proscription? Is the President the master, or servant of the people, that he should thus dictate to them or their Representatives, under threats of exclusion from the party of their choice? Is Democracy a name and shadow, or a substance? It means the power of the people. This is its vital essence. Or has it lost its true significance, or are we moving from it with viewless but rapid strides towards despotic power, to make and unmake the rules of political faith under pains and penalties abhorrent to the souls of freemen? Is this the eighty-second year of our Independence, or is it the first year of American monarchy that is now dawning upon us? Let the people—let the masses composing the true Democracy, arouse from their slumbers. Let them break the chains that would fetter their free thought and free opinion, and assert their blood-bought rights, and especially the great indefeatable sovereign right of self-government."

It is clear, by his instructions to Governor Walker, that the President designed to have the constitution which should be framed by the convention, submitted to the people for their decision, and that they should be protected in the expression of their wishes at the ballot-box, for or against the constitution. His present opinion is, that Kansas should be admitted under the Leecompton constitution, on the ground of expediency. He regrets that it was not submitted to the people for their action, but thinks it will be sufficient to satisfy justice, to submit to them one clause of that instrument. We differ from him in this opinion. The convention might better have refused the whole, than to select one clause and say that was the only part upon which the people should vote. The course pursued by the convention is an arbitrary assumption of power, not warranted by the act calling a convention, nor by the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and is in violation of the spirit and genius of our institutions; and is such a course as might be expected only from a despot who dared not trust his subjects to express their wishes in relation to a matter in which their dearest rights and interests were involved.

I ask, Mr. Chairman, are those of us who are opposed to the Leecompton constitution to be denounced as renegades and traitors to the party, while we stand upon the principle which the President himself says is right; and because we are unwilling to yield that principle on the ground of expediency?

Talk, Mr. Chairman, about reading the anti-Leecompton men out of the Democratic party! When you read out such men as Governor Wise, Governor Walker, Stanton, Bancroft, Senator Douglas, and other prominent Democrats opposed to this constitution, when you expel the Democracy of Illinois, with the rank and file throughout the country, the Democratic party will be as powerless as was Samson when shorn of his locks.

I give an extract from the Louisville Democrat. It says:

"We publish this morning the letter of Henry A. Wise to the anti-Leecompton meeting at Philadelphia. It is only one of a number sent to that meeting by prominent Democrats, and among them DOUGLAS, the Senator from Illinois. The Democrats of this Commonwealth will recollect that, since 1851, no names have stood higher in the Democratic party than those of STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS, of Illinois, and Henry A. Wise, of Virginia. If they are not Democrats, who are? If they are not entitled to be heard, who are? Read this letter of Wise's, and say if it be not sound Democracy, and as sound sense, too, as you ever did read. DOUGLAS and Wise are not mere party Democrats; they are such from impulse and principle, and protest against this Leecompton business with all the energy of their natures. Flippancy scribbles who deal in cant may call them renegades. There is no danger that they will ever grapple with the argument of this letter, or that of DOUGLAS's speech. Does the Leecompton constitution embody the will of the people of Kansas? Until this is made out, the Democrat who supports it may be honestly doing what he thinks best on the ground of expediency; but he departs from his creed, and will live to repent it when he sees its fruits. The Democratic party has been invincible, because it has been generally true to its antecedents and its faith."

I read from a letter of an old editor, addressed to the editor of the States, to show the position of the German papers in the Union on the Leecompton ton constitution, and the impolicy of reading them out of the Democratic party:

"That among the one hundred and odd German Democratic papers published in the Union, but three are sustaining the Kansas policy of the Administration, namely: the Philadelphia Democrat, the Buffalo Democrat, and the St. Louis Chronic; and, if it should be found necessary, it can be proved that the just-named three papers are 'in for it,' for very material reasons at that. Now, if you like, gentlemen on the Lecompton side, read the millions of heretofore faithful German Democrats out of the Democratic ranks!"

Mr. Chairman, it is both the right and duty of a political party to lay down principles and establish platforms; but it is not the right of either a minority or majority of such party to compel its members to violate the principles agreed on as rules of action, and, on their refusal, to deny them the name, and dismiss them from the party whose principles they would maintain.

To speak of reading out the Democracy of Illinois from the party is absurd. Sir, they have fought many a hard battle in that cause, and have always come off conquerors; while the Keystone, the Empire, and many southern States, have, at different times, fallen in the fight. The men who fought at Buena Vista and Cerro Gordo, and their friends, are not to be driven from the support of measures which they know to be just and Democratic, by the fear of being read out of the party. They stand upon the Cincinnati platform, and will abide by the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and are adhering to that principle, which the President admits to be correct. He says:

"I trust, however, that the example set by the last Congress, requiring that the constitution of Minnesota should be subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State, may be followed on future occasions."

Those of us who oppose the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, are not to be driven from our course, because, on this question, the Republican party are found voting with us. We oppose the admission for different reasons. We, however, agree on one point—that the Lecompton constitution is a fraud upon the people of Kansas; and being such, we rejoice in their aiding to prevent the outrage of forcing a constitution upon a people against their wishes or consent.

I read from the letter of a distinguished Democrat, published in the Bardstown (Kentucky) Gazette, to show the position of a large portion of the southern Democracy on the Lecompton question. The writer says:

"Let the friends of the Administration attempt reading out of the party those who will not bow down and worship the Lecompton swindle, and they had as well assign. They had better never been born. If Lecompton has become the test of Democracy, the party is dead sure enough. I am opposed to such a test. Let us differ, if necessary, and do so without quarreling or fighting. Douglas is right, as sure as the sun shines. Harey is right, and so is Wise, and so is N. The South seems mad. Pass Lecompton, and all faith in southern honor in the North is destroyed. Read Douglas and Co. out of the party, and we are as much sectionalized as was Sam in '56."

"But, say the Lecomptonites, Douglas is acting with the Black Republicans! Demolishing logic! Black Republicans eat good dinners—ergo, Douglas must confine himself to saw-dust pudding, or he is not a Democrat. Free-Soilers drink good wine—ergo, poor Douglas and Co. must confine themselves to cistern water, or they excite suspicion. Pshaw! for such sophistry! and pshaw! for the asses that use it. Let us stand by the right, whether the Black Republicans are for or against it. We are pledged by our platform, for our solemn promise to the North, to leave this cursed question of slavery to the people of the Territory—this, as well as all others. An overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the Lecompton constitution. Then, as a Democrat, I am opposed to it—opposed to forcing it upon a protesting people, even if they are Free-Soilers."

"One word by way of prophecy. Pass Lecompton, and not insult Douglas and Co., and we may survive. Pass Lecompton, and ostracise Douglas and Co., and the Democratic party is broken down; and when it perishes, our glorious Union perishes too."

Mr. Chairman, the anti-Lecompton Democrats stand precisely where the Democratic party stood in the late presidential contest—fighting for the right of the people of each State and Territory to regulate their own affairs in their own way, without any interference from abroad. We shall be found in opposition to all those who disbelieve the doctrine of popular sovereignty, be they who they may, Republicans or southern ultraists. The Kansas question was the great, indeed the only, question at issue between the parties in the late presidential contest; and I hazard the assertion that if Mr. Buchanan, after his nomination, had declared the views expressed in his message accompanying the Lecompton constitution, no free State in the Union would have given him its vote. Illinois was carried for Mr. Buchanan, by convincing the people that we intended in good faith to carry out the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska act; that the actual citizens of the Territory should have the power and means of determining the form of constitution which they would adopt. Mr. Chairman, the recent election in New Hampshire shows the effect upon the free States of the position of the Administration on the Lecompton constitution, and proves the position I have taken, that if you admit Kansas with the Lecompton constitution, you will defeat the Democratic party in all the free States except Illinois. There the Democracy are united against Lecompton, and will maintain their ascendancy. I read from the Concord Patriot, the leading Democratic paper in the State, of the 10th instant. It says:

"The Kansas question has again crushed us with its ponderous, blind, unreasoning power. Before the Lecompton constitution question was brought before the country, our prospects for success were highly flattering; our triumph seemed to be certain; that matter, with the course of the Administration upon it, fell like a wet blanket upon the rising courage and earnest zeal of our friends, and from that day we were doomed; our defeat was certain and apparent to all well-informed persons. Yet the Democracy, hoping against hope, continued the struggle with a courage and zeal never before excelled by them, even under the most encouraging circumstances. They hoped the people might be induced to think and act with reference to their own immediate interests, and they labored to direct their attention to the sole questions to be affected by the election; but their labors were vain. 'Kansas' and 'Lecompton' were the magic words which directed the action of thousands of honest voters."

It was charged by the Republicans that the repeal of the Missouri compromise, and the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska act, were for the express purpose of making Kansas a slave State. They wished slavery excluded from Kansas by an act of Congress; we were for leaving that, with other points, for the decision of the people of the Territory, subject to the judicial tribunals and the Constitution of the United States.

During the canvass I was repeatedly questioned in regard to my course in Congress on the admission of Kansas, if I should be elected. My reply was ever, that if Kansas applied for admission, and presented a constitution which was republican in its provisions, and I believed acceptable to a majority of the actual settlers of the Territory, I should vote for admission, with or without slavery; but if fraud or improper influences had been used in procuring its adoption, and if it were not, in my opinion, in accordance with the desire of a majority of the people, I should vote against it, without regard to any clause it might contain. This was the stand taken by Democratic speakers in southern Illinois during the campaign of 1856; and the reason of my present opposition to the admission of Kansas is, not that the Lecompton constitution admits slavery, but that it is a wanton violation of the principle of popular sovereignty, since it does not express the views of a majority of the people who are to be governed by it, and should not be forced on them by Congress, when every member here must be aware that more than three fourths of the people are strongly opposed to its provisions.

I quote from the New York Freeman's Journal, a Catholic and Democratic journal. It says:

"What is the practical difference between the 'royal prerogative' claimed by the weak and tyrannical Stuarts, and the executive influences so imprudently flaunted in our faces by the advocates of the fraudulent constitution of the Lecomptonites? The only difference is, that this 'executive influence' is viler in its nature, more demoralizing, and more potent, than the 'royal prerogative,' which lives in the execration of free men. We have been told, day by day, by the servants and the seekers of the Government pelf, that some ten millions of dollars of patronage are to be employed in buying the absence or the votes of a sufficient number of the Representatives of the people, to secure the passage of an act deadly to the interests of the country, and to the fundamental principles of our institutions."

Mr. Chairman, it is argued by many in favor of admission under the constitution presented, that the people could have voted for delegates to the convention which framed it, and not having done so, have no right to complain of its provisions. Let us hear what Secretary Stanton says on this question:

"On my arrival in the Territory in April last, in advance of Governor Walker, I confess that I had an imperfect knowledge of the real condition of affairs. I supposed the question of slavery to be the only cause of dissension and difficulty among the people; and, in my brief inaugural address of the 17th of April, I treated this as the chief subject of difference upon which a submission to the people would be likely to be demanded. I soon found, however, that this view was altogether too limited, and did not reach the true ground of controversy. The great mass of the inhabitants of the Territory were dissatisfied with the local government, and earnestly denied the validity of the existing laws. Asserting that the previous Legislature had been forced upon them by the fraud and violence of a neighboring people, they proclaimed their determination never to submit to the enactments of legislative bodies thus believed to be illegitimate and not entitled to obedience."

After the arrival of Governor Walker, Mr. Stanton says:

"I was often with the Governor when he addressed the people, and gave my best efforts in aid of the great purpose of conciliation. It was too late to induce the people to go into the June election for delegates to the convention. The registration required by law had been imperfect in all the counties, and had been wholly omitted in one half of them; nor could the people of these disfranchised counties vote in any adjacent county, as has been falsely suggested. In such of them as subsequently took a census or registry of their own, the delegates chosen were not admitted to seats in the convention. Nevertheless, it is not to be denied that the great central fact, which controlled the whole case, was the utter want of confidence by the people in the whole machinery of the territorial government. They alleged that the local officers, in all instances, were unscrupulous partisans, who had previously defrauded them in the elections, and who were ready to repeat the same outrages again; that, even if intruders from abroad should not be permitted to overpower them, they would be cheated by false returns, which it would not be possible for the Governor and Secretary to defeat. Although, at that time, these apprehensions seemed to me to be preposterous and unfounded, it was impossible to deny the earnestness and sincerity with which they were voiced, or to doubt that they were the result of deep convictions, having their origin in some previous experience of that nature."

Mr. Chairman, let it be admitted that many who had the right to vote for delegates to the convention did not exercise that right. Their reasons for that neglect may be justifiable. Great excitement existed at the time, and violence and outrage were constantly occurring in their Territory. Fear of personal injury, or the thought that aiding in the election would in a measure commit them to the constitution which might be framed, may have prevented many from voting for delegates. They may have believed that taking no part in the election would tend to conciliate their opponents, and that their wishes might be more regarded were they to remain quiet, and if the constitution framed did not meet their wishes, they could then, as in the case of Minnesota, have the power of voting against its acceptance. Be this as it may, the only question which it seems to me Congress now has to determine, is, whether the Lecompton constitution expresses the opinion of a majority of the residents in Kansas, and whether they have been left free to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

In what manner were they required to vote on the adoption of the constitution? I will read the clause prescribing the mode of voting:

"The voting shall be by ballot, those voting for Kansas as a slave State shall vote a ballot with the words 'constitution with slavery,' and those voting for Kansas to be a free State, shall vote a ballot with the words 'constitution with no slavery.'"

Sir, when the people found that the convention refused to submit the whole constitution for their ratification or rejection, they urged upon acting-Governor Stanton the necessity of calling a session of the Legislature to protect them, and provide for submitting the constitution to a vote of the people. I quote from Senator Douglas's minority report. He says:

"The power of the Territorial Legislature over the whole subject was as full and absolute on the 17th day of December, when the law was enacted providing for the submission of the constitution to the people at the election on the 4th of January, as it was on the 19th day of February, 1857, when the Legislature passed the act calling the Lecompton convention into existence. The convention was the creature of the Territorial Legislature, was called into existence by its mandate, derived whatever power it possessed from enactment, and was bound to conduct all its proceedings in strict subordination to the existing territorial government, as well as 'in entire subservience to the power of Congress to adopt, reject, or disregard them at their pleasure.'"

The Legislature, in addition to the law providing for the submission of the constitution to a vote of the people, adopted a preamble and resolutions, setting forth the facts in relation to the election of delegates to the convention, and protesting against the admission of Kansas into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. Copies of this preamble and resolutions were forwarded to the President and both Houses of Congress.

"Preamble and joint resolutions in relation to the constitution framed at Lecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857."

"Whereas a small minority of the people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory availed themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates of the constitutional convention recently assembled at Lecompton; and whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connection with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living within the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention, were not recognized in its organization, or in any other sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers; and whereas a minority—to wit, twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention—have attempted, by an unworthy contrivance, to impose upon the whole people of this Territory a constitution without consulting their wishes and against their will; and whereas the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas the action of a fragment of said convention, representing as they did a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the Nebraska-Kansas act, and violates and tramples under foot the rights and the sovereignty of the people; and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts it clearly appears that the people have not been left free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, but, on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing:

"Be it therefore resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State; and the representatives of said people do hereby, in their name and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission."

"Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority."

"Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves."

"Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from the Territory."

From the facts set forth in the foregoing preamble and resolutions, it is evident that the Lecompton constitution does not express the wishes of a majority of the people of Kansas. They were not allowed to vote for or against the constitution. If they voted at all, either for or against slavery, they must vote for the constitution; they could not vote against it.

I will read what Governor Wise says on this point in his letter to the Philadelphia convention:

"No man was allowed to vote for slavery who did not also vote for the constitution; and no man was allowed to vote against slavery who did not vote for the constitution. He might reject slavery or adopt it, provided he would vote for the constitution; his vote for or against slavery was not allowed to be counted."

"But it is argued in the message that the people, if opposed to slavery, might have voted it out of the constitution on the 21st of December. I deny that they could have voted for or against slavery under this schedule, unless they voted also for the constitution. As I have said, nine hundred and ninety-nine might have gone to the polls and voted for or against slavery, and yet have been out-voted by one man, if they voted against the constitution and the one voted for it. In a word, no one who voted against the constitution could vote at all? How unfair, then, to urge that those who were opposed to the constitution, though for or against slavery, stand away from the polls on the 21st of December, and let the election go by default. Could they have voted at all if they were against the constitution? Could they be counted for or against slavery, unless they voted for the constitution? Why hold the people responsible for not attending the polls, when, if they had attended them, they were not allowed to vote but in one way, not all allowed to vote in their own way, and the minority of one was given the majority of one over a thousand? Do you call this election? Election has which of the two 'at least to choose.' But here there was no alternative but in respect to slavery, and that was not allowed unless you voted the one way on the constitution. Such monstrous injustice and inequality never offended the moral sense of freemen before in this country."

Mr. Chairman, it does not seem wise or statesmanlike to force upon a people a constitution obnoxious to them, even though they may have committed an error, or might have prevented a wrong. If they have committed an error in failing to exercise a right in the election of delegates to the convention, could our act be called by so mild a name if we forced upon them a constitution to which four fifths of them are opposed?

Now, sir, I ask if there is any member of the committee who has any doubt on this question? If any one has, I would refer him to the vote given at the election on the 4th of January, in accordance with the law of the Legislature of the Territory. This was a legal act, and the President instructed acting Governor Denver to protect the rights of the people at the ballot-box.

The result of the election of the 4th of January on the ratification or rejection of the Lecompton constitution was officially announced by the Governor and presiding officers of the two Houses of the Legislature of the Territory, in the following proclamation:

"In accordance with the provisions of an act entitled 'An act submitting the constitution framed at Lecompton under the act of the Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, entitled "An act to provide for taking a census and election of delegates to a convention,"' passed February 19, A. D. 1857, the undersigned announce the following as the official vote of the people of Kansas Territory on the question as therein submitted on the 4th day of January, 1858: the vote against the Lecompton constitution, 10,236; for the Lecompton constitution with slavery, 138; for the constitution without slavery, 24."

"January 26, 1858."

From the official proclamation it is shown that the Lecompton constitution was rejected by the people by a majority of 10,064 votes.

At the election held on the 21st December, the reported vote for the constitution with slavery was 6,143, and for the constitution with no slavery 589; leaving a majority in favor of the constitution with slavery of 5,574, as presented to Congress for admission.

It is stated in the same proclamation that more than one half of this majority was cast at those very sparsely settled precincts in the Territory, two of them in the Shawnee reserve, on land not open for settlement, viz:

Oxford, Johnson county.....	1,266
Shawnee, Johnson county.....	729
Kiekapoo, Leavenworth county.....	1,017
Total.....	3,012

At the election on the 4th of January, the majority against the constitution was..... 10,064

At the election on the 21st of December, the majority in favor of the constitution, as presented to Congress, was..... 5,574

Showing a clear majority against the constitution, on comparison of the returns of the two elections, and supposing each to have been fair and legal, of.... 4,490

If, from this calculation, we deduct the fraudulent votes, according to the statement of the presiding officers of the two Houses of the Legislature, who were present at the opening of the polls and the counting of the votes, by the invitation of the president of the convention, we have a majority of more than eight thousand, or four to one of all the legal voters of Kansas, in opposition to the constitution.

Mr. Chairman, I consider it the duty of the American Congress to reflect the will of the majority of the people in their legislative acts. It is in this that our Government differs from others, and is superior to them. It is a just cause of pride, that our Government confers upon every citizen enjoying its protection, the right to have a voice in the election of those who are to make the laws that are to govern him.

It is one of the cardinal principles of the Democratic party, that the representative is bound in honor to carry out the wishes of the people he represents. I believe this to be correct; and sir, I would not retain an office one hour, after knowing that I could not carry out the clearly expressed views and wishes of a majority of my constituents. No question has arisen since I have been in public life, on which the people in our State are so nearly unanimous as on this. The friends of the Lecompton constitution in Illinois "are few and far between." Of some sixty Democratic papers published in our State, over fifty are against the Lecompton constitution, and five or six in its favor. All, as I believe, who support it, either hold office under the Administration, or have Government patronage, or expect by their course to obtain it. I will read a few extracts from the Democratic Union at Peoria, to show how that paper stood on the Kansas question at the opening of Congress, and its position now:

"We are loth to give credence to a thousand rumors afloat that President Buchanan sanctions the outrage which the convention of Lecompton is attempting to impose upon the people of Kansas."

"The Washington Union claims to be the organ of the Administration. We do not believe, nor can we believe, without evidence beyond what we have yet seen, that President Buchanan subscribes to its grossly anti Democratic sentiments. They belie the political professions of his whole life. They speak a language which has never, on any occasion, come from his lips or his pen; a language that no southern would utter unless he had first become besotted in his mad devotion to the peculiar institution; a language which no national political organization could proclaim and live for a twelvemonth; a language more revoltingly sectional to the northern mind than the insane ravings of the wildest Abolition enthusiasts. That President Buchanan approves of sentiments so utterly subversive of State sovereignty, and which, if nationally predominant, would carry slavery into every one of the northern States, we do not for a moment credit."—Peoria Union, December 5.

"The Democratic party will see that the Nebraska bill triumphs in the assertion of that great Democratic principle, that the people shall make their own laws and establish their own institutions. They will frown out of existence the work of the Lecompton convention, because it attempts to override the voice of the people, and they will establish upon an impregnable basis the right of the freemen of Kansas to govern themselves in their own way."—Peoria Union, December 9.

"Admit Kansas, we say, under the Lecompton constitution, and her people will be left perfectly free to regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, and this everlasting agitation will cease. The South will be satisfied in having earned this abstraction, their honor untarnished, and the North will be content with the prize, and the harmony of the party and the peace of the Union will be restored."—Peoria Union, February 8 and 9.

The editor came here to procure public printing, and said he would have it. He succeeded, and his paper now advocates the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

I read from the Joliet Signal, a Lecompton paper, to show the popular will of the Democracy of Illinois. This editor is postmaster at Joliet. His remarks are candid and temperate, and I fear it may lose him his office:

"That a great majority of the Democratic party of Illinois sustain the views of Senator DOUGLAS relative to the Kansas imbroglio, is doubtless true. Evidence of this comes to us from every quarter. The Democracy of Illinois are proud of their distinguished Senator, and will stand by him as long as he recognizes his party obligations, and is devoted to the great national principles which have united the party since the days of Jefferson."

"The fact that a large majority of the Democratic party of this State should endorse Senator DOUGLAS's course, is no evidence that they are not devoted to the great national party, and to its head as represented by the present Chief Magistrate of the nation."

"The Democracy of Illinois have never wavered in their defense of the Constitution, the rights of the States, and the great national principles enroled upon the Democratic banner. Amid the confusion which has reigned in the political arena, and the yielding to sectional and factious temptations which has been manifest in other quarters, the Democratic party of this State, with true devotion to the national platform, has ever been found faithful. There has been no pandering to popular prejudice, nor bending to present policy, displayed in our State contests, but the enemy have been met on broad national ground and vanquished."

Again I read from the Bureau County Democrat of February 18, 1858:

"We have, for weeks past, expected to be removed, and we expect it still, and say, let it come; but, our readers will learn, when the blow comes, that we can look above and beyond the mere bounds of personal feelings and considerations. We do not think the Princeton post office, or our own private feelings or interests, of so great importance as the perpetuation of the Democratic party, and, in no event, will we make open war upon the Administration, or advocate or approve any course of action that would tend to the disruption of the party. As to the present Kansas difficulty, we think it would have been proper as well as politic to submit the Lecompton constitution to the people; we believe that Mr. Buchanan acted unwisely in committing himself and the Administration to that constitution, instead of merely giving all the facts of the case and turning it over to Congress to be decided upon its merits rather than to be decided upon as an Administration measure. We think Mr. DOUGLAS's view of the case accords with the spirit of the Cincinnati platform, and we regret that his views have not been carried out."

Since this article was written I believe Mr. Pine has seen new light, and goes for Lecompton.

The minority on this question, in my district, is so extremely small, that it cannot well be said there are two opinions on the subject. I know the opinion of my constituents, and, although I regret to be found in opposition to the majority of my Democratic friends here, I shall sustain the views of my people, and vote for what I believe correct principles, resisting any attempt to oppress or trample upon the dearest rights of the people of Kansas. No power could induce me to vote for the admission of that Territory into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution, while I believe three fourths of the people are opposed to its provisions. Mr. Chairman, I would rather have the approval of my course by the people I represent on this floor, than, by misrepresenting them, to receive the highest office or honors in the gift of the Administration.

I am somewhat surprised at the anxiety of my southern friends to bring Kansas into the Union, under this constitution, when, I believe, they admit that a majority of the people are not in its favor. What permanent advantage will, in that case, accrue? Is it believed that it will give peace to Kansas to force her into the Union with a constitution which she has unmistakably repudiated by her vote of 4th January?

Let me here quote from Governor Wise's letter. In answer to the deceptive suggestion that the people of Kansas may at once repudiate the constitution, when Congress accepts it, and they have acquired State sovereignty, the Governor says:

"In other words, Congress is to do a thing in order that it may be immediately undone! Why do it to be undone? Is Congress to give the Territory a constitution obnoxious to a majority, in order that that majority may have State sovereignty to put it to the torture of its indignation? Why not rather allow the sovereign people, directly and at once, to select for themselves the form of government they prefer, instead of submitting to their passions an instrument which the argument admits they abhor."

The Governor puts a case to show that now it is the southern bull that is going the anti-slavery ox. Supposing the majority in the Territory were pro-slavery, the minority anti-slavery, and the minority were oppressing the majority, as now in Kansas, he asks what would be the consequence, and thus answers:

"I tell you that every southern man would have been in arms, and would be roused to the shedding of blood, rather than submit to Congress fastening upon a majority of pro-slavery people an arbitrary rescript of a mere convention, unauthorized to proclaim its constitution without an express grant."

Supposing further that the swindle should be forced through Congress, the Governor goes on to predict the consequences:

"The ulterior effects of adopting the Lecompton constitution, with its schedule annexed, will be worse than referring back the question to territorial decision. It will arraign this Administration and the Democracy and the South for demanding more than is right, and for forcing resistance to wrong. It will be juggling the lion of a majority whilst the hand of a minority is in his mouth. It will return the chalice to our own lips when the Kansas question again and again arises in North Texas, in New Mexico, in Mesilla Valley, and in all our boundless domain of unsettled and fast settling territory. It will drive from us thousands of honest Democrats in the North, who would willingly stand by us for justice and equality, but who must leave us when we demand more, and refuse justice and equality to others. It will raise the Black Republican flag over the Capitol, in the next struggle for power, and that then will raise the last dread issue of union or disunion! Are not some aiming to drive us to such extremities as will raise that issue past being laid?"

No one can doubt Governor Wise's devotion to the South, and all her interests and institutions. His long and distinguished public services have given evidence of this, and entitle his opinions on this question to great weight.

The Memphis (Tennessee) Eagle of the 4th instant repeats, "in the most earnest manner, that the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution is a precedent fraught with imminent peril to the South. There are great constitutional landmarks erected by the fathers of the Republic by which the priceless blessings of liberty and law are perpetuated to after times. But break down those barriers against illegal party enactments, and the future will bring nothing but anarchy and ruin." The New Orleans Bulletin, one of the most reliable and steadfast State-rights journals in the South, in referring to the Lecompton constitution, says:

"While desiring that Kansas may be admitted, in order to get rid of the whole vexed question, we frankly confess that we think the President labors under a 'grave error' in thinking that this instrument represents the real voters of Kansas in any proper sense. It seems to us clear as noon-day that it does not. The testimony on this point comes from various sources, and is entirely conclusive that the people of Kansas do not recognize this instrument as theirs, do not approve it, and do not wish to come into the Union under it. Shall they be forced to? Out of twenty newspapers or treatises published in the Territory, only one, it is alleged and not contradicted, is in favor of the Lecompton constitution. The State officers just elected under this constitution have formally protested against admission under it.

"Was such a phenomenon ever before witnessed in this country of forcing a Territory into the Union, against the solemn protest of its public representatives, of its public press, of three fourths, at least, of its voters? And was such a threat ever before heard, that unless Kansas be now thus forced in against her will, the Union shall be dissolved? But why did not the legal voters of Kansas exercise their elective franchise when they could have done so? The President, it seems to us, is in a mighty fog upon this point. The real reason, it seems beyond dispute, was that they thought they could not do so without stultifying themselves. They were actually compelled to vote for the constitution or not at all. However obnoxious portions of the instrument might be to them, they were obliged to vote for it or not vote at all.

"None know better than those in Congress who oppose the Lecompton instrument that the question of slavery or no slavery in Kansas is not, in fact, involved in the question of its reception at all. That question was settled long ago. Wise, Stringfellow, and every other southern man, know this as well as the Black Republicans do. The rejection of the Lecompton instrument, if rejected at all, will be due to the failure of its friends to submit it to the legal voters of the Territory; and they foolishly refused to submit it, because they undoubtedly felt sure that it would be indignantly rejected by them. And yet we are told that if Kansas be not admitted into the Union under this extraordinary and unprecedented state of things, it will show a settled purpose on the part of the North to admit no more slave States, and will be good ground upon which to dissolve the Union. If the politicians attempt this latter game, we imagine the people will have a word to say in the matter."

Many of the pro-slavery journals of Missouri are very severe upon the Lecompton constitution. The Northwest Democrat, published at Savannah, Missouri, has the following comments on the subject:

"As for ourselves, as citizens of a slave State, and opposed to the agitation of that 'pestiferous question' here, we should have preferred similar institutions for our neighboring Territory; but we say frankly we are not, and have never been in favor of forcing that, or any other institution on them, against their sovereign will. We go further. The late election, which appears to have been as fair as the nature of the case would admit, indicates a large free-State majority, and that being so, as is generally admitted, that majority should have the undoubted democratic right of molding their own institutions to suit themselves.

"We think the convention gravely erred in refusing to submit their work to the voice of the people to be governed by it. To deprive the people of their inherent right of passing on their organic law, is to strike at the very foundation of our Government, and the attempt must prove futile. As well attempt to stay the waters of Niagara with a feather, as to stem the will of the majority with mere parchment. It would have been better policy, because more correct in principle, for the whole constitution to have been voted on direct, ay or nay; and if the majority voted it down—there let it lay. To say they shall 'not vote at all,' because it is feared they are opposed to it, is to concede at once that it does not spring from the popular will. And if that is so, vain will be every expedient to stave off the inevitable result. It will be only a question of time; sooner or later the popular torrent, gathering only additional impetus by the attempted obstruction, will break through every barrier, and irresistibly vindicate that great axiom of our Government—the right of the majority to rule."

Gentlemen will be deceived if they hope to strengthen the South in this manner. Instead of strengthening the South, you will prostrate the northern Democracy, throwing them into a minority in every free State in the Union. You will render powerless a class of men who have always stood firm and unwavering in defending the rights guaranteed to the South by the compromises of the Constitution. Strike down the national Democracy of the North, and where is the safety of the South? Where is the safety of the Union? The perpetuity of the Union depends on the conservative doctrines and principles of the Democratic party being in the ascendant. I am surprised to find gentlemen from the South so strenuous in having a free and a slave State admitted at the same time into the Union, and seeming to fancy that this course is necessary in order to protect them in their rights and to prevent aggressions from the North upon their domestic institution.

Their security is not in this. It lies in the deep devotion of the northern Democracy to sustain and sacredly protect all the rights conferred by the Constitution upon every part of our Union; not as conferring a favor, but as fulfilling an obligation under which we were placed by our fathers, who achieved for us liberty and independence, and framed for us a Constitution which, if we are true to ourselves and worthy of being their descendants, we shall cherish and preserve at all hazards.

Mr. GARNETT then obtained the floor; but yielded it to

Mr. BONHAM, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. Bacon reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. PEYTON, (at fifteen minutes past nine, p. m.) the House adjourned till Monday next.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, March 22, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. A. HOLMEAD.
The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of John Claiborne, special agent appointed by the Commissioner of Patents, to collect information in relation to the consumption of cotton in Europe; which was ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontiers of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union was made the special order for ten o'clock to-day. If, however, Senators have petitions to present, or reports from standing committees, and insist upon it, they must be received.

Mr. BRODERICK presented the memorial of Andrew Glassell, praying compensation for services as assistant United States district attorney for the northern district of California in the year 1856; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

ADMISSION OF LADIES.

Mr. SEWARD. There are a great number of persons attending who take an interest in this debate, and I move that the rules be suspended so that ladies may have the privilege of access to the floor.

Mr. PEARCE. I object to it.
The VICE PRESIDENT. The rules cannot be suspended, except by unanimous consent.

KANSAS—LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. STUART spoke for nearly three hours in opposition to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. BAYARD entered into the general argument in support of the bill.

Mr. BRODERICK followed in opposition to the bill; and, at the close of his remarks, the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock.

On reassembling, Mr. DOUGLAS proceeded to address the Senate; and he occupied its attention for three hours in a general review of the various topics that enter into the Kansas controversy.

Mr. TOOMBS replied, and his observations elicited comments from Mr. KING and Mr. STUART.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

At eleven o'clock the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, March 22, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. Mr. DEAN.

The Journal of Saturday was read and approved.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. HICKMAN. It has been brought to my notice that in the proceedings of the House of the 12th instant, reported in the Daily Globe of the 13th instant, my colleague [Mr. PHILLIPS] announced to the House, that in consequence of indisposition I was absent from the House, and had paired off with Mr. SICKLES. At the same time, or immediately thereafter, Mr. SHORTER announced that I had paired off with Mr. MOORE. I desire to say that I paired off with Mr. SICKLES, on that occasion, and not with Mr. MOORE.

JOHN W. WOLCOTT.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I wish to offer to the House a resolution, relating to the case of

John W. Wolcott, who is now in confinement, by order of the House, for a contempt of its privileges.

The resolution was read, and is as follows:

Whereas, on the 15th day of February last, the House, by its resolution, did commit John W. Wolcott to the common jail of the District of Columbia, for an infringement of the privileges of the House in refusing satisfactorily to answer certain questions put to him by order of the House, and is still held in custody under said order; and whereas, afterward, in pursuance with the provisions of law, the Speaker of the House did certify to the district attorney of the District of Columbia the facts pertaining to said case, and the same were laid before the grand jury of said District, and a presentment was thereupon found against said Wolcott for the same offense; and whereas, the court, in which said presentment is pending, have determined that said Wolcott cannot be tried on said presentment, so long as the House holds him in custody under its rights of privilege: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms is hereby authorized and directed to cause said Wolcott to be released from jail, and to deliver him over to the marshal of said District of Columbia, or other person authorized to receive him, to answer to the presentment pending in said court.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask for the reading of the first and third sections of the law passed last Congress, in reference to witnesses.

The sections were read, as follows:

"Sec. 1. That any person summoned as a witness by the authority of either House of Congress to give testimony or to produce papers upon any matter before either House, or any committee of either House of Congress who shall willfully make default, or who, appearing, shall refuse to answer any question pertinent to the matter of inquiry in consideration before the House or committee by which he shall be examined, shall, in addition to the pains and penalties now existing, be liable to indictment as and for a misdemeanor in any court of the United States having jurisdiction thereof, and, on conviction, shall pay a fine not exceeding $1,000, and not less than $100, and suffer imprisonment in the common jail not less than one month, nor more than twelve months.

"Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That when a witness shall fail to testify, as provided in the previous sections of this act, and the facts shall be reported to the House, it shall be the duty of the Speaker of the House, or the President of the Senate, to certify the fact under the seal of the House or Senate, to the District Attorney for the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be to bring the matter before the grand jury for their action."

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I now ask for the reading of the finding of the grand jury against this party.

The presentment was read, as follows:

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
Criminal Court, March Term, 1858.

United States } Presentment returned by the grand vs. John W. Wolcott. } jury, in the following form, viz:
District of Columbia, County of Washington, to wit:

The jurors of the United States for the county aforesaid do, upon their oath, present John W. Wolcott for failing and refusing to answer questions propounded to him by order of the House of Representatives, through one of their investigating committees, as required by the act of Congress entitled "An act more effectually to enforce the attendance of witnesses," &c., &c., approved January 24, 1857, on or about the 27th of February, 1858, on the evidence of Benjamin Stanton, a member of the House of Representatives of the United States.

Attest: J. A. SMITH, Clerk.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This resolution that I submit provides for the discharge of this witness by the Sergeant-at-Arms. I ask that, for further information, the letter from his counsel be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

March 6, 1858.

MY DEAR SIR: I send you a copy of the presentment found by the grand jury in your case. In order to expedite the matter, I proposed to the district attorney to try you on that; but both he and Judge Crawford are of opinion that you cannot be brought out for trial. Their understanding of the case is that as you are committed by order of the House, you cannot be brought before the criminal court so long as that commitment is in full vigor.

It is complicating the matter more and more, and the effect is that the House imprisons you for an imputed contempt, and certifies that fact to the district attorney. The district attorney brings it to the notice of the grand jury. The grand jury charge you with a misdemeanor under the act, and the court declines to try you because it cannot take you into its custody. There must be a remedy somewhere.

Yours, respectfully,
J. W. Wolcott, Esq.

JOS. H. BRADLEY.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. From what has been read, it must be clear to the House that, this person being in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms for a violation of the privileges of the House, this is a question of privilege, and as such I present it to the House. I do not desire to discuss the subject at all, and move the previous question.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I ask the gentleman from Georgia whether it would not be as well to withhold offering his resolution for the present until the members of the committee which has charge of this subject are in attendance. I believe the chairman is not now in his seat. I will further state, for the information of the gentleman from Georgia, that I believe it is the intention of that committee to offer a similar resolution to-day; and I think it would be better for it to come from the committee. I hope, therefore, the gentleman from Georgia will withdraw his resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I cannot withdraw it, because it is my duty to present it.

Mr. LETCHER. Has the Chair decided that this is a privileged question?

The SPEAKER. The point has not been raised.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the introduction of the resolution.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I present it as involving the question of privilege. The party is in prison for a violation of the privileges of the House, and it is clear to my mind that this is a question of privilege.

Mr. HOUSTON. May I ask the question whether the committee has made its report, or whether it is likely to do so very soon? I shall object to handing over or discharging this witness until the committee shall have reported to the House and been discharged.

Mr. STANTON. I do not wish to make any objection on the ground of a question of order, or to raise the point of its being or not being a question of privilege. If it be the pleasure of the House to discharge the witness, I certainly shall not interpose any technical objection to prevent his discharge.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the resolution involves a question of privilege.

Mr. LETCHER. As I understand questions of privilege, they relate to the members of this House. Now, I do not understand that Mr. Wolcott has any privilege here at all; and, if he has not, I do not understand how this can be a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The witness is under the execution of the sentence of the House. The order of the House has not been executed. It is being executed. The witness is imprisoned because of a breach of the privilege of the House, inasmuch as he was adjudged to be guilty of a contempt of the House in refusing to answer a proper and pertinent question propounded to him by one of the committees of the House. The matter came before the House as a question of privilege. He was imprisoned by virtue of the order of the House arising out of that question of privilege; and the Chair is of opinion that the resolution presented, under the circumstances, involves a question of privilege.

Mr. LETCHER. The order of the House, as I understand it, was in consequence of a law upon your statute-book; and he was imprisoned for violating that law. That was the offense for which the House sent him to jail.

Mr. SEWARD. The rule was applied strictly to me last week; and I must object to all debate.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us wait until the committee have made their report, and then he may be handed over to the court.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I call for the previous question upon the resolution.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Will the gentleman from Georgia allow me to have read a substitute for his resolution. It provides merely for suspending the order of the House. I desire to accomplish the same object as the gentleman.

The substitute was read, as follows:

Whereas, under the order of the House, of the 15th day of February last, the Sergeant-at-Arms did commit to the jail of the District of Columbia one John W. Wolcott, for a contempt of the authority of this House, and said Wolcott is still kept in custody under said order; and whereas, the grand jury of the criminal court of the District of Columbia has found, as a true bill, an indictment against said Wolcott, for a violation of the provisions of the act of Congress, passed January 24, 1857, relating to witnesses, arising from the same transaction for which he is now in custody: Therefore,

Resolved, That the further execution of the order of this House in relation to said Wolcott be suspended until said indictment be disposed of; and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to hand over to the authority of the district court for action under said indictment, and upon the termination of the proceedings under said indictment, the Sergeant-at-Arms keep him as directed under the order of February 15th last.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I would suggest that this merely provides for suspending the execution of the order of the House, as the witness has in no manner purged himself of the contempt committed against the House. And it leaves it in the full control of the House whenever it sees fit to act upon it.

Mr. LEITER. Is debate in order? If it is, I propose to call the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman from Alabama will withdraw that motion for a moment, and that the previous question will also be withdrawn. The select committee on this subject, at whose instance Mr. Wolcott was imprisoned, wish to make an explanation, and I think it is due to them that they should have a few minutes to explain.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will accept the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS,] as a substitute for my own; and I demand the previous question upon it.

Mr. STANTON. I desire to inquire if I understand the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as he does?

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Georgia accepts the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania I will withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman from Alabama withdraws the motion to lay on the table, I will renew that motion. I think Mr. Wolcott was wrongfully imprisoned by order of the House. I will vote for the resolution of the gentleman from Georgia to hand him over to the authority of the court, and there leave him; but I will not vote to retain him longer in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is debate in order?

Mr. STANTON. If the House will allow me, I wish to say a word or two. The committee expect to close the evidence in this investigation in the course of the present week. The view of the matter taken by them was, that while the trial was in progress, and before the evidence was closed, it would certainly be improper to discharge Mr. Wolcott so long as he refuses to testify. After we have closed the taking of testimony in the case—perhaps during the present week—we proposed to report a resolution handing him over to the judicial authorities for trial. It would certainly be improper to discharge him during the trial, and thus deprive us of any possibility of obtaining his testimony, and allowing him, by going at large on bail, perhaps to frustrate the object we desire to accomplish.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will state to the House that the extreme indisposition of the wife of Mr. Wolcott is the reason why I think the House should act upon the resolution I have offered, and pass it speedily.

Mr. STANTON. I will state to the gentleman from Georgia that a messenger of the committee has been in Boston recently, and from the information we have, there is no serious indisposition on the part of Mr. Wolcott's wife. However, Mr. Speaker, it is perfectly clear that it comes with a bad grace from a witness who might at any moment purge himself from contempt by answering the questions propounded to him, to appeal to the humanity of the House to postpone action upon this matter.

Mr. SEWARD. I object to further debate.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have a word in reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. SEWARD. I withdraw my objection for a reply, and for nothing else.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. The information which I have received may be wrong, but it is such as I believe. I do not know to whom the gentleman alludes, to what messenger of the committee, but the information that the wife of this gentleman is really ill is such as I believe.

Mr. STANTON. I dislike the resolution of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It occurs to me that when the witness is once discharged from the custody of the House, it is improper to remand him; that we ought to hold him so long as we think the purposes of justice require, until the contempt of the House is purged, and the object of the investigation is answered. Then we may discharge him finally.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia objects to debate.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew the motion to lay upon the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. Is it in order to move to postpone the whole subject for a week?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the motion to lay upon the table, or the demand for the previous question.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Tennessee withdraws his motion to lay upon the table, will it be in order then?

The SPEAKER. Not pending the call for the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. At the request of friends I adhere to my original preamble and resolution, and give way for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to offer his resolution as an amendment.

Mr. PHILLIPS submitted his resolution as a substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, called for the previous question.

Mr. HUGHES. In order that every phase of this question may be presented to the House, I hope the gentleman from Georgia will consent that I may offer, as an amendment to the amendment, the resolution I sent to the Clerk's desk the other day.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I will hear the gentleman's resolution.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman send it to the Clerk's desk?

Mr. HUGHES. I will draw it up in a moment.

Mr. NICHOLS. Was not the previous question called?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. NICHOLS. Then I object.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the resolution and substitute be laid upon the table.

Mr. CLEMENS. I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 59, nays 123; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Bliss, Branch, Cobb, Cox, Crawford, Darnell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Eustis, Foster, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hickman, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jenkins, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, John C. Kunkel, Leach, Leidy, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Miles, Montgomery, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Parker, Pettit, Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Reagan, Ricard, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Aaron Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, Robert Smith, Spinner, Stanton, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Walton, White, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—59.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Boock, Bonham, Bowie, Brayton, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Campbell, Case, Claflin, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, John Cochran, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, English, Farnsworth, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Greenwood, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Horton, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Kelsey, Knapp, Lamar, Landy, Leiter, MacLay, Mason, Maynard, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Pendleton, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Savage, Seales, Searing, Seward, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, Stevenson, Talbot, Tappan, Thompson, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburne, Watkins, Whiteley, Wilson, Wood, Woodson, and Zolliecoffer—123.

So the House refused to lay the resolution and substitute upon the table.

Pending the above call,

Mr. McQUEEN stated that Mr. TRIPPE was detained at his lodgings by sickness.

Mr. FENTON stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. KELLY.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that he was absent when his name was called, and asked leave to vote.

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HUGHES] has sent up the following amendment to the amendment:

Whereas, it does not appear by the record of the proceedings in the case of John W. Wolcott, a witness now in custody for alleged contempt of the House, that he was imprisoned for refusing to testify in a matter in which the House had jurisdiction and power to enforce the testimony of witnesses by attachment for contempt: Therefore,

Resolved, That the said John W. Wolcott be, and he is hereby, discharged from custody.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I have no objection to allow the gentleman to offer that as an amendment, and I withdraw the previous question, and yield the floor to him for that purpose.

Mr. HUGHES. I submit it, then, as an amendment to the substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. STANTON. I should like to know how the gentleman gets the floor again in preference to all others to renew the call for the previous question. If the gentleman yields the floor to the gentleman from Indiana, to offer his amendment, I suppose anybody is entitled to the floor who can get it.

Mr. HUGHES. I presume that I have the floor, as I submitted the amendment.

The SPEAKER. Nobody sought the floor but the gentleman from Georgia.

Mr. STANTON. I do not understand that the gentleman from Indiana yielded the floor.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia yielded the floor to the gentleman from Indiana to submit his proposition.

Mr. STANTON. My point is this: the gentleman from Indiana having obtained the floor, for the purpose of offering an amendment, he is entitled to it absolutely; and that, to renew the call for the previous question, the gentleman from Georgia must get the floor de novo. I do not understand that the gentleman from Indiana has surrendered the floor.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand that the gentleman from Indiana had the floor.

Mr. STANTON. He must have had it to submit his amendment.

The SPEAKER. If objection had been made, the gentleman from Georgia had no right to surrender the floor to the gentleman from Indiana to submit his amendment; but there was no objection.

Mr. HUGHES. If I had retained the floor, I would have renewed the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood, too, that the gentleman from Georgia retained the floor all the time.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES. I ask that the question be divided—taken separately on the preamble and resolutions.

The SPEAKER. That is always done.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Do I understand that we are brought to a direct vote upon the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana?

The SPEAKER. The first question will be upon the amendment of the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. CAMPBELL. That, I understand, was accepted by the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Georgia permitted it to be offered, that the House might vote upon it, stating that he did not accept it.

Mr. STANTON. Are there two substitutes pending?

The SPEAKER. There is a substitute and an amendment to the substitute pending.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I understand the Chair to have decided this to be a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair did so decide.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Would it not be in order to take up any single one of these propositions at any future time?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair, it would, as a question of privilege.

Mr. HUGHES. I wish to put a question to the Chair. Is there any better time to dispose of this question than the present?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Does the gentleman want a categorical answer?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it might be postponed a month or two very well.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I call for the yeas and nays upon the amendment. All the propositions amount to the same thing, and I want the yeas and nays here.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 22, nays 161; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bennett, Bliss, Bowie, Campbell, Claflin, fee, Cockerill, Covode, Burton Craige, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Hughes, Jewett, George W. Jones, Leiter, Maynard, Quitman, Royce, Henry M. Shaw, Tappan, George Taylor, Thompson, and Walbridge—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bishop, Blair, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Clingman, Cobb, John Cochran, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Crawford, Curtis, Darnell, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garrett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gimer, Gooch, Goode, Granger, Greenwood, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Haskin, Hatch, Hawkins, Hickman, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kellogg, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lawrence, Leach, Leidy, Letcher, Lovejoy, MacLay, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Milson, Montgomery, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Isaac N. Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Pettit, Phillips, Pike, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Searing, Seward, Singleton, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Watkins, White, Whiteley, Wilson, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, Augustus R. Wright, and Zolliecoffer—161.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. SEWARD said: The House has decided this question, and it has been acted upon. I want the decisions to be uniform, and although I objected to the jurisdiction in the first place, I shall, for the reason I have stated, vote "no."

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I concur in a very great degree, in the facts stated in the preamble and resolution; but understanding that the courts of the District have taken jurisdiction of the case, and believing that it is better to let the matter have a judicial investigation, I shall vote "no."

Mr. BLISS. I wish to state that I am opposed to this resolution; but, at the same time, I prefer to vote for it rather than to put ourselves in the custody of any court whatever to guard ourselves or to guard our rights; I therefore will change my vote, and vote in the affirmative.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

The question recurred upon the substitute for the original resolution.

Mr. THOMPSON. I wish to inquire what the effect of that substitute will be? I understand that the original resolution says, that the court declines to try this gentleman, upon the ground that he is held in custody by the House. Now, sir, the substitute proposes simply to elongate the chain, and swing him out into the possession of the court.

Mr. EDIE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to debate, then.

Mr. THOMPSON. Then I call for the reading of the substitute.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. First read the original resolution and then the substitute, and then the House will understand the difference; and I hope they will vote down the substitute and adopt the original resolution.

The resolution and substitute were read.

Mr. STANTON. I rise to another question of privilege. I desire to state to the House that Mr. Wolcott's attorney is upon the floor of the House, in violation of the rules of the House—a man who is himself proved to have received $4,000 of this money to assist in the passage of the tariff act—and members are running to him every moment for instructions as to what vote they shall give. I move that the Doorkeeper enforce the rules of the House, and show him the door.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will enforce the rules of the House; and close the doors upon all persons not entitled to admission.

Mr. HUGHES. I rise to a question of privilege. I understand the gentleman from Ohio to say that members upon this floor were going to the attorney of this party for instructions how to vote.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has entertained one question of privilege already; and another cannot be entertained until the first one is disposed of.

Mr. HUGHES. I want the gentleman to specify what members he refers to.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HUGHES. Is it in order to move to lay the substitute on the table?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. HUGHES. I make that motion.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay both resolutions on the table.

The SPEAKER. That is the effect of the motion of the gentleman from Indiana. If the substitute be laid on the table, it carries the original resolution with it.

The House refused to lay the substitute on the table; there being on a division—ayes 57, noes 87.

The question was taken on the adoption of the substitute; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. STEPHENS's resolution.

Mr. COBB called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 125, nays 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adran, Ahl, Anderson, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bishop, Blair, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Brayton, Bryan, Bufanton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Campbell, Case, Chaffee, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Daves, Dewart, Dodd, Dowdell, Edie, English, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hill, Horton, Hughes, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Lamar, Landy, Lawrence, Leidy, Leiter, McClay, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miller, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Pettit, Peyton, Phillips, Pike, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Savage, Seafes, Scott, Searing, Seward, Aaron Shaw, Henry M. Shaw, Robert Smith, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Tappan, George Taylor, Thompson, Underwood, Walbridge, Waldron, Wade, Watkins, White, Wood, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollieffler—125.

NAYS—Messrs. Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bonham, Branch, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clingman, Cobb, Cox, Crawford, Danrell, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Dean, Durfee, Edmundson, Eustis, Farnsworth, Foster, Goode, Greenwood, Harlan, J. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walton, Warren, Ellihu B. Washburne, Winslow, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—67.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question recurred on the preamble.

Mr. STANTON. I would suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that there may be a difficulty in this matter, as there is now no marshal of the District.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would say to the gentleman that the Sergeant-at-Arms will of course deliver the witness to nobody but the marshal.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, there is no marshal to deliver him to.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Well, the nomination of marshal is before the Senate, and I suppose they will reject or affirm it. That is not our business.

The question was taken on the preamble; and it was agreed to.

ORSAMUS B. MATTESON.

Mr. SEWARD. I rise to a question of privilege. The special committee to which was referred the resolution affecting the right of the gentleman from New York [Mr. MATTESON] to hold his seat, has directed me to report. I desire to present that report now, together with a statement made by the gentleman from New York; and I understand there will be also a minority report presented. I ask to have all these papers printed, and to have the matter made a special order for some day in the future—say next Wednesday or Friday.

Several MEMBERS. Say Saturday.

Mr. GROW. Is it understood that the papers which accompany the report will be printed?

The SPEAKER. Yes; and the views of the minority.

Mr. GROW. There is no minority report.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the gentleman from Georgia that there is

Mr. CURTIS. I submit the views of the minority.

The report and accompanying papers were ordered to be printed, and the subject was postponed till Saturday next.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. If agreeable to the House, I will now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] has the floor; and I understand that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] has to leave town this evening, and is anxious to speak before he leaves.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bockock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 306, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, upon which Mr. GARNETT was entitled to the floor.

Mr. GARNETT. I am well aware, Mr. Chairman, that to address the House on the Kansas question at this period of the debate is

"as a twice-told tale,

Vexing the dull ear of a drowsy man."

And yet, sir, I am constrained by the importance of the question to give utterance to my earnest convictions of the consequences involved in the true issue presented for our decision. To recognize the existence of a new sovereignty amongst the Powers and principalities of earth, and to admit it as one of the allied members of the Federal Union, is always a momentous act. Yet, so accustomed are we to the noble spectacle of the birth of another republic, and its addition to our system, that we usually pass it by almost unnoticed. It excites no more emotion than the announcement, year by year, from the astronomers, that a new planet or asteroid has been found wheeling in its appointed course through the heavens, according to the same laws that govern and guide the elder luminaries. Even at this time, three new States, crowned with the emblems of sovereignty, appear at our door, and demand seats at our council-board—Minnesota and Oregon and Kansas. The Roman general boasted that he had but to stamp on the ground, and armed legions would spring up at his command. With greater truth might we say, that the footstep of the American pioneer is no sooner heard upon the wilderness, than a sovereign republic springs into being around him; and he erects empires to mark the successive stages of his dauntless march.

One republic on the headwaters of the Mississippi, and another on the shores of the Pacific, ask admission, and no word of objection has been heard from any quarter. Why, sir, is Kansas alone singled out for opposition? Disguise it as you may, gentlemen; deceive yourselves, or deceive others, with specious pretexts and technicalities; there can be but one answer from any straightforward, plain-minded, disinterested man—the true reason of opposition to the admission of Kansas is, that her constitution recognizes African slavery, while the constitutions of the other two new States prohibit it. The existence and recognition of slavery in Kansas is the very core of your opposition; this alone supports and gives it vitality. Gentlemen may talk about irregularities as much as they please; they may tell me that they object to Kansas because there was no enabling act—I demand of them, why do they not object to Oregon? What enabling act does she come under? Why have they not objected to the many States that have heretofore been admitted into the Union without enabling acts?

I grant that the regular course is for Congress to withdraw the Federal jurisdiction, so as to enable the people of the Territory to form a State government; but such a procedure—commonly called an enabling act—is not always pursued, nor is it essential; for Congress is competent to waive the objection, as it has frequently done. It is immaterial for the argument whether the Nebraska-Kansas bill was an enabling act or not, in the present case. That bill organized a government in Kansas, with all rightful powers of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States. The validity of that government, and of its acts, has been recognized in every possible way. A Delegate, elected under its authority, admitted on this floor. The obligation of contract, the tenure of property, the protection of life and limb, the sanctity of marriage, all depend for their guarantees and remedies upon the authority of this government. In every act of daily life, Democrats and Black Republicans alike have recognized this government as the only government de facto now existing in Kansas, or that has existed there since 1854.

Well, sir, the people of Kansas, acting in the only way a people can act, as a political community, through the forms and by the voice of the actually organized and recognized government, called a convention to make a State constitution. That convention was elected; it met, made and adopted a constitution; and, then, in reference to one article, submitted an alternative proposition to the popular vote. Could any procedure be more regular? Its result comes here as the act and deed of the people of Kansas, speaking through the only political organism by which they are a people at all, and acting by authority of the Government de facto, the only Government known to them at the time. Governor Walker and Mr. Stanton, themselves, the new lights of the Black Republican party, admitted that all was fair and legitimate up to the meeting of that body. But then you object that the convention did not submit the constitution to a popular vote, which you contend was necessary to its validity, and you bring up all kinds of loose, outside evidence to show that a majority of the inhabitants are against it. If so, why did they not say so at the polls? Why did they elect a Legislature that called a convention? Why, when that Legislature had positively refused to insert in the act that called it a provision requiring the constitution to be submitted to a popular vote, why, then, did they not reject that act at the polls? It was submitted to their vote; they had the opportunity to reject it; but fully knowing that it contained no limitation on the powers of the convention, they yet approved it. Why, next, did they not elect such a convention as would submit the constitution to the popular vote? Sir, they had every opportunity, and they neglected to use them, either because they really were in a minority, or because they belonged to the factious party which was in open rebellion against our laws, and which desired to perpetuate the agitation and anarchy on which they thrive. In neither light are they entitled to any consideration at our hands. We cannot listen to those who refuse to take their lawful part as citizens, and still less to men who come in rebellion—Beecher rifles in their hands, and treason and murder in their hearts. We can only know the will of a people, that is, of a body politic, by its lawful acts. Lawful and orderly government is at an end if we depart from legitimate forms of ascertaining the sense of the people, and those forms give every facility to the citizen to exercise his just share of influence. Depart from them, and you have the rule of the mob, not of the people.

But I am told that one of these forms, established by a natural right—by a sort of higher law—is, that the constitution shall be submitted to the popular vote, and ratified by the numerical majority, and this, even when the people have refused thus to limit the power of the convention. I deny it. Sir, the sovereign people may act, when they choose, in their highest political capacity, through a convention; and I deny that they are bound thus to restrict their own authority. On what grounds do gentlemen base such an assumption? Surely not on precedent, for that is decidedly against them. Many of the present State constitutions, and all of the Old Thirteen—those standards of republican government and practice—never were submitted to a popular vote. The Federal Constitution itself, which, to the extent of its powers, is the constitution of each several State, was never submitted to a popular vote; it was adopted and ratified by the people of each several State, acting through a convention. As the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] said, the other day, quoting from Webster:

"When ratified by the people, then it had a voice, a de facto authenticity. Every word in it had received the sanction of the popular will, and was to be received as the expression of that will."

Thus his own authority identified the people and the convention, and accepts the latter as an authentic and final expression of the will of the former.

Mr. Chairman, this assumed necessity of submitting a constitution, in all cases, to a popular vote, rests in a radical misconception of the true nature of popular government; it rests upon the idea that the true sense of the people can only be ascertained by the numerical majority of the aggregate inhabitants; that a people does not mean an organized political community, but the mere residents within certain geographical boundaries, and even then only their numerical majority. On the contrary, sir, I assert that the mere majority of numbers is one of the least authentic means of ascertaining the sense of the people. It is only when you allow to all the diverse interests and sections of the community a fair representation, and a controlling voice in their own protection, that you have truly an expression of the will of the people; then only is the vox populi indeed the vox dei. Frequently it may be expedient to submit a constitution, adopted by the people in convention, to a ratification by the numerical majority at the polls. It may be well to do so, where the interests of the sections and classes are nearly identical, and where the people are intelligent, harmonious, law-abiding, orderly, and peaceful. But suppose a State, torn by civil dissensions, where there can be no election without grave charges of fraud and violence; suppose factious men expelling the registers of voters and the commissioners of elections, and refusing to vote, in order to make a pretext for anarchy; suppose an armed rebellion against law, and an organized war upon the property of a portion of the citizens; suppose, in one word, the very case existing in Kansas: and I ask you, shall we submit to the rebels the constitution whose very object is to restrain their disorders, especially when they have refused to use the abundant opportunities of participating in its formation? The government of the majority of mere numbers is the absolute form of popular government: unlimited and unrestrained, it is as truly a despotism as can be the government of one man; and it is more oppressive, because stronger. A constitution imposes these limits and restraints. Its primary purpose is to protect the minority, the weak against the strong; and there may be, and are, cases where it is neither expedient nor just for a majority, which has given evidence of its disposition to oppress and plunder, to determine the measure of that protection. Both parties, the weaker as well as the stronger, have a right to a voice in making that compact; and both parties had it in the calling and election of this convention.

I cannot, therefore, attach any importance to such objections—either to the want of an enabling act, or to the loose and irresponsible assertions that there is a numerical majority opposed to this constitution, or to the fact that the convention did not submit it to another vote. Nor, sir, can I think that the real motives of the Opposition are to be found in any of their objections. Oregon has formed a constitution without any enabling act; and yet these same gentlemen who oppose Kansas will vote to admit Oregon. It is doubtful whether the constitution of Minnesota was adopted by a convention at all; and though it was nominally submitted to the popular vote, yet nobody was allowed to vote who did not also vote for State officers. But the Opposition make no objection there. Kansas, and Kansas only, excites their hostility, and the burden of their song is the existence of slavery there. And, in the same breath, they tell me that there are very few slaves in Kansas; that slavery can never go there; that climate and isothermal lines exclude it; that it is not a practical question; and they ask me why force such an abstraction upon them? It is only a principle involved, and that is all they care for. Yes, sir, and that is what we care for; we, too, know the inestimable worth of a principle! The more you assert that there is no practical advantage to be gained by the slaveholding States, the more odious becomes your opposition; the more plainly do you avow your fixed determination never to admit another State that is actually slaveholding, when you thus bitterly resist one which you tell us is slaveholding only in theory. I agree fully and entirely that the principle is involved and the issue fairly raised, perhaps the more fairly, because you assert it is not practical. And that you may not escape or conceal the true issue, I mean to show, from the constitution of Kansas, how completely the legal question is raised, and how every guarantee and protection that could be devised is given to the slave property, which, however small, now actually exists in the Territory.

First, sir, slavery is there at this moment as an existing fact. The slaves may be few in number. Perhaps so. Yet there they are, under the authority of the Constitution of the United States; and while this Kansas constitution endures, they cannot be emancipated without the consent of the owners; and while they are there, the Legislature cannot prohibit the introduction of others. Let us read part of clause two, of article seven, of the constitution:

"The Legislature shall have no power to pass laws for the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners, or without paying the owners, previous to their emancipation, a full equivalent in money for the slaves so emancipated. They shall have no power to prevent emigrants to the State from bringing with them such persons as are deemed slaves by the laws of any one of the United States or Territories, so long as any person of the same age or description shall be continued in slavery by the laws of this State."

You see the power to emancipate is denied, except upon a double condition—compensation and consent of owners. Both are necessary. The power to emancipate with consent is a matter of course, especially as a subsequent clause gives the Legislature a power to pass laws to permit owners to emancipate. It would be unmeaning and superfluous, except as coupled with the power to emancipate upon compensation, which it explains, defines, and limits. This is made still clearer by other clauses. Thus, the preceding clause asserts that the right to slave property is sacred, and higher than constitutional sanctions. How inconsistent with this it would be if the Legislature could emancipate, that is, divest, property, without the owner's consent. In another place, it is even declared that "no alteration [in the constitution] shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves." Again, the bill of rights copies the Federal Constitution in declaring that no man shall be deprived of his property except by due course of law. The Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case, says of this provision:

"An act of Congress which deprives a citizen of the United States of his liberty or property, merely because he came himself, or brought his property, into a particular Territory of the United States, and who had committed no offense against the laws, could hardly be dignified with the name of due process of law."

But, sir, if this clause in the Federal Constitution forbids emancipation by Congress in the Territories under its jurisdiction, equally does the like clause in the constitution of Kansas forbid emancipation by the Legislature there. Sir, any other construction would have this strange result, that slave property in Kansas might have been more secure had this slavery article been struck out than with it in. For in the former event, it was expressly provided that "the right of property in slaves now in this Territory shall in no manner be interfered with;" no, neither with nor without compensation.

But the constitutional guarantees of slavery do not stop even here. The constitution itself cannot, in my judgment, be lawfully changed until 1864. It was seen that the property of a part of the citizens was peculiarly exposed to the assaults of the lawless fanatics who had so long been waging war against the Government. It was known that in a new State there is especial danger of hasty change and rash innovation in the forms of government; and by a wise foresight, as I deem it, the constitution secures a fair trial for the government it erects, and a reasonable stability for organic institutions and fundamental laws, by forbidding change for six years. I know, sir, that this has been denied; and it is asserted that the people of Kansas have a natural right to abolish their government at pleasure, and that this right they have asserted in the bill of rights, by declaring:

"All political power is inherent in the people, and all free governments are founded on their authority, and instituted for their benefit, and, therefore, they have at all times an inalienable and indefeasible right to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper."

Mr. Chairman, I heartily subscribe to this declaration; but it asserts a natural right—a right of revolution, which, like all other natural rights, belongs to the people individually, to be exercised in extreme cases on individual responsibility, and not to the people as an organized political community or State. Sir, this point has been so well treated by Mr. Calhoun, in a letter addressed to my colleague, [Hon. WILLIAM SMITH,] that you will excuse me for adopting his words, so much better than any I could offer.

"With this answer to your second question, I shall now proceed to reply to your third. It is in the following words: 'After a State has been admitted into the Union, has the numerical majority of the people of such State the right to alter or abolish the constitution, regardless of the mode prescribed for its amendment, if any; and where there is none, of the refusal or assent of such State?'

"I answer—no; neither after nor before admission. If the right exists at all, it must be either a natural or acquired right. It cannot be the former; because all such rights belong to man in what is called the state of nature—that is, in the state which is supposed to precede the existence of government, or what is called the political state. Although the human race cannot exist without society, nor society without government, yet, in the order of things, man must have existed before society, and society before government. And hence it has not been unusual for elementary writers on morals and politics, in treating of the rights and duties of man, to regard him in each of these states. In his natural state, he is considered simply as an individual, with no superior; and his rights and duties are deduced from those faculties and endowments, physical, intellectual, and moral, which are common to the race. Regarded in this state, all are equal in rights. In it, each individual is the sole master of his own actions; and there are neither majorities nor minorities, nor the rights of majorities and minorities. In the other, or political state, he ceases to be regarded in this isolated and independent character, and is viewed as a member of a body-politic, or a State; that is, a society organized under a government, which represents its sovereign will, and through which it acts. It is in this state, and this only, that majorities and minorities are known, or have, as such, any rights. Whatever rights they possess, are political rights—the whole class of which are acquired—and are called conventional; that is, rights derived from agreement or compact, expressed or implied. How absurd, then, is it, to suppose the right of a majority to alter or abolish the constitution is a natural right—a right belonging to man regarded as existing in a state of nature—when, in that state, majorities and minorities are unknown."

"If, then, the right of the majority exist at all, it must be as a conventional right; and fortunately for the decision of the question, if it really exists in that character in our system, there will be no difficulty in finding it. The provident foresight of our ancestors has not left to conjecture or implication, in whom the right to abolish constitutions, or forms of government, resides; or how, for the most part, it is to be exercised. In every case (including the Federal Constitution) except New Jersey and Virginia—and recently Rhode Island—the authority by which it is to be exercised, and in what manner, is designated in the constitutions themselves."

"Now, as the right, if it exists at all, must exist as a conventional right—that is, a right founded on express agreement or compact, or, in the absence of such an one, implied, it follows, from the statement, that it does not exist by express agreement or compact, in any of the cases where provision is made for amending the constitution; nor can it exist by implication, in any State, unless in the only two where constitutions make no provisions on the subject."

"Why was it not left to the discretion of Congress to add the State Legislatures, to call conventions, or propose amendments to the people for their ratification? It is not because the power of doing either was doubted, but because those who framed them, while they were too wise not to see that amendments would become necessary, were, at the same time, too deeply impressed with the danger of frequent changes in the fundamental law of a State, to permit amendments to be made with too much facility. 'To meet the one, it was necessary that they should be left open to amendments,' and to guard against the other, that restrictions should be imposed on the amending power; or, without them, the numerical majority of the Legislature might call conventions, or propose amendments at pleasure, to be adopted by a like majority of the people. The consequence would be, that constitutions might be changed with almost the same facility as ordinary acts of the Legislature. It is to restrain this facility, that in all cases, where the constitution provides for its amendment, it imposes restrictions on the power of amending, which would not otherwise exist."

"In denying, however, the right of the numerical majority, as such, to alter or abolish the constitution of a State, regardless of the forms prescribed, or where there are none, without the consent of the Government, I am far from denying that the people are the source of all power; and that their authority is paramount over all. But when political, and not natural rights are the subject, the people, as has been stated, are regarded as constituting a body-politic, or State, and not merely as so many individuals. It is only when so regarded that they possess any political rights. Viewed individually, as the elements of which the body-politic is formed, they possess none but natural rights. Taken in either light, the people may alter or abolish their constitution; but with this difference—that in the former they can only do so by acting according to the prescribed forms, where there are such, and when there are none, through the agency of its representative and organ, the government of the State; while in the latter they act individually, and on individual responsibility. The one is a political, and the other a natural right, or, as usually called in such cases, the right of revolution; and can be resorted to, rightfully, only where government has failed in the great objects for which it was ordained—the security and happiness of the people; and then only where no other remedy can be applied. In such cases, the individuals who compose the con-munity rightfully resume their natural rights, which, however restricted or modified they may be in the political state, are never extinguished. But as a natural right, it is the right of individuals, and not that of majorities; although it may not be so safely and prudently exercised by one man, or a minority as a majority, it belongs to one as well as the other."

This admirable reasoning, Mr. Chairman, leaves us only to inquire, what mode has Kansas provided for the amendment of her constitution? The fourteenth section of the schedule answers:

"After the year 1864, whenever the Legislature shall think it necessary to amend, alter, or change this constitution, they shall recommend to the electors at the next general election, two thirds of the members of each House concurring, to vote for or against calling a convention; and, if it shall appear that a majority of all citizens of the State have voted for a convention, the Legislature shall, at its next regular session, call a convention, to consist of as many members as there may be in the House of Representatives at the time, to be chosen in the same manner, at the same places, and by the same electors that choose the Representatives. Said delegates, so elected, shall meet within three months after said election, for the purpose of revising, amending, or changing the constitution; but no alteration shall be made to affect the rights of property in the ownership of slaves."

The time here named—after the year 1864—is as much a part of the prescribed mode of amending as the two-thirds vote, or any of the other conditions. It goes to the very essence of the provision, and wisely, I repeat, as a guarantee against rash and precipitate change. Suppose the clause had said that, whenever the Legislature think it necessary to amend, it may, at its regular session, by a two-thirds vote, call a convention; would it follow that, at an extra session, a mere majority vote might call a convention? Surely not; and neither does the power of two thirds to call a convention after 1864 imply the power of a majority only to call one before. The constitutional prescription of a particular mode of exercising a power precludes all other modes; in legal phrase, "expressio unius, est exclusio alterius." This clause determines who shall amend—a convention; who shall call a convention—two thirds of the Legislature; and the time when—after 1864. It defines the entire amending power.

Sir, I go a step further. I say that even a convention cannot divest or destroy the rights of property in slaves already there. Provided it does not impair the security of that property, it may prohibit the future introduction of slaves, or any other species of property; but it cannot emancipate slaves already in the State. For I agree with the declaration of natural law in the Kansas constitution that—

"The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction."

Yes, sir, property is not the creature of legislation; but it is coeval with government, with society, with man himself. It springs from those instincts and capacities with which man is endowed by his Creator, and which find their inevitable development in his social institutions—the power to love, which becomes real in the family and its relations. Property, in all its varieties and incidents, arises from the power and the wish to subdue the material world, to endow matter with the forms of mind, to contract with his fellow; from the capacity and instinct of the superior races to command, and of the inferior to obey, and thus mutually to aid each other in fulfilling the work of God in the universe. Upon these instincts, divinely implanted in the human breast, spring the relations of the family and the rights of property—the primordial elements of man's social existence—and to protect and preserve them is the primary object of government, which Divine Providence instituted when man was created a political as well as a social being.

Therefore, it is true, that the rights of property exist independently of, and above, constitutional sanction. And it is equally true, as this article in the Kansas constitution goes on to declare, that—

"The right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MONTGOMERY] lifted up his hands in horror at this assertion, and said that no statesman would maintain so monstrous a proposition. I do not know whether the gentleman will think I forfeit any title to the name of statesman, yet I unhesitatingly tell him that I maintain it. And more than that, let me tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the people of Kentucky, who ratified their constitution, and the convention who adopted it, maintained it; for the words are copied verbatim et literatim from the constitution of Kentucky, made in 1850; and it is now the almost universal faith of the southern States. The right of property in slaves not as sacred as the right to any other property? Why should it not be? Because, I am told, it is essentially local, and dependent upon local and positive laws. I tell the gentleman, on the contrary, that African freedom is local, and dependent upon local law. I tell the gentleman that there is not a civilized country in the world where the African can claim his freedom, except by positive law. I say that the natural status and condition of the black is slavery. After the splendid argument of the Senator from Louisiana, the other day, I need not speak on that point. The civil law recognizes it, the common law recognizes it. I might quote the father of philosophy, the immortal Staggyrite himself. Aristotle says:

"It is clear, then, that some are free by nature, and others are slaves by nature; and that in the case of the latter, the lot of slavery is both advantageous and just."

Go back to the oldest monuments of the human race, search the catacombs, explore the temples and pyramids of Egypt, and wherever you find the African depicted, he is represented as a slave. Penetrate the recesses of central Africa with Barth and with Livingstone, and there still you find slavery existing now, as ever before; still you find the lighter colored tribes subduing, mastering, controlling, and enslaving the darker. From that great laboratory of the black race, from that teeming womb of mysterious Africa, one unbroken stream of emigration has poured through all the ages, still winding its sable line through the deserts and the forests, until caravans and fleets should receive and bear it away to fulfill its destiny and attain its highest point of civilization under the control and care of the Caucasian races. Continue your investigation, sir; open the oldest written records, the Divine books of the Hebrews. The gentleman from Pennsylvania quotes God's promise to Noah, that the fear and the dread of him should be upon every beast of the earth and every fowl of the air, and that every moving thing should be delivered into his hand. Why did he not go a little further, and quote the Divine decree that the descendants of Ham should be the servants of Shem and of Japheth, and of their posterity? Some one near me says it did not suit his purpose! So I am aware! Why did he not go to Sinai, and read from the tablets of stone, written by the finger of God Himself, thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's man-slave, nor his maid-slave, nor his ox, nor his ass, nor anything that is his? I can reply for the gentleman; this Divine recognition and sanction of slave property did not accord with the prejudices of modern philanthropy; it did not square with the Wilmot proviso, for which I am told he voted.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I should like to know how that is? I anticipated all this attack, and am ready to reply.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman would not permit any interruption the other day. I must decline to yield.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Does the gentleman refuse to give me an opportunity to set him right? I will say to the gentleman that I now stand in the first legislative capacity I ever occupied in my life; and I could not very well have voted for the Wilmot proviso.

Mr. GARNETT. I understood the gentleman was in favor of it; and advocated it in some political meeting in Pennsylvania. I did not intend to misrepresent him.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I would like to have the gentleman allow me to put this matter in the proper shape.

Mr. GARNETT. Well, be that as it may, he advocates what is equivalent in the case of Kansas.

I repeat, therefore, when I am asked if any statesman can maintain that the right of property in African slaves is as sacred as any other right of property, I reply, yes! a thousand times, yes! It is consecrated by reason, which points out that Providence has assigned different parts in the economy of the world to different races, and this seems the natural condition of the African. It is consecrated by our own experience, because under it the negro has attained a far higher civilization than he has ever known in any other condition, and because it has been the foundation of a highly refined culture of the richest and most potent industry of a powerful empire, and a rational, a stable, and a noble freedom for the white race in our own southern States. It is consecrated by the experience of ages. Search the records of history, and point me to mighty empires founded; systems of jurisprudence established, not merely for the day, but as possessions and rules for all time; the bounds of human knowledge enlarged; turn to deathless strains of poesy, or eloquence, or heroic deeds performed, which still vibrate along the chords of feeling, and thrill the human heart from generation to generation; and I will point you to a nation of slaveholders, whose sons achieved these glorious deeds! Yes, sir! it is sacred because it is hoary with the prescription of six thousand years of human history, and its origin runs so far back into the misty past, that, like the Nile of its native Africa, its source cannot be explored. It is consecrated by religion, because it has brought millions of benighted heathens within the bosom of the Christian church; because the church has sanctioned it in all time; because Christ and His apostles recognized it; because it was baptized amid the thunders of Sinai, and its title deed was sealed by Almighty fiat, when the black race was created to obey as servants, and the white to command as masters.

I say then, Mr. Chairman, that while the constitution remains unchanged, the Legislature cannot abolish slavery, or prohibit the entry of slave property; that the constitution cannot be lawfully changed until after 1864, and that even then no vested rights of property can be impaired or destroyed. And, I say, finally, that it is for these reasons, openly avowed on the Republican side, at least, of Congress, that the admission of Kansas meets with such opposition. Sir, take away that party, and what opposition could be left? Would the dissentient members of our own party ever dream of it? Doubtless amongst them there are gentlemen who personally have no objection to the admission of another slave State, but they are constrained by the fear of the power of the Black Republicans at home. Their course is at least an evidence that their constituencies are unwilling that another slave State shall be added to our Union, and it is the sentiment of the northern people, not merely of the northern members, which is important for us truly to know. But for this anti-slavery feeling, either in themselves or their constituents, little would they care for these alleged irregularities—as little as they regarded them in the case of California. She came with a constitution framed by a convention assembled by military authority, and under executive dictation and advice that unless she prohibited slavery she never could obtain admission, or indeed a regular government at all. They vote even now for Oregon and Minnesota whose irregularities I before noticed. And yet they cannot overlook like flaws in the claim of Kansas! No, sir! the Senator from New York disclosed the true secret, when he declared that it was a dynastic struggle between North and South whether another slave State could be admitted into the Union. And on that issue hang the most momentous consequences.

I beg you, Mr. Chairman, to look back at its history. In 1820 we were excluded from more than nine tenths of our common territory; slavery and slave States were forever prohibited in nine hundred and sixty-five thousand square miles of the Louisiana territory, while only one hundred and ten thousand miles were left open to southern immigration and the possible extension of southern institutions. For the sake of union we submitted to this unjust decree. In 1845, Texas, a sovereign State which had formed and maintained her institutions outside of the Union, came in by annexation. And here let me warn my southern friends that if our Federal boundaries are to be further enlarged, it is far safer to annex slave States, ready formed to our hand, than to acquire Territories to be struggled and disputed for.

A few years after, we acquired a vast region on the Pacific—some four hundred and sixty-four thousand square miles. But were we of the South allowed to enter on its possession as equals? Gentlemen on the other side tell me, yes; the Massachusetts man could no more carry a slave there than the Virginian. Sir, when the man of the North went there, he took with him all his property, all his institutions, his whole system of society; he was free to give honor and power to his native land by establishing another New England, kindred and sympathizing republics, on the Pacific shore. But the southerner had no such privileges. He must qualify himself first by selling his property, by severing the kindly ties and life-long affections that bind master and slave together, and by abandoning the institutions under whose shelter he was born, and amid which he was proud to live and hoped to die. Here was a vast and almost uninhabited region; its secular silence was unbroken, save by the monotonous roar of the Pacific waves and the sighing of the wind amid the gigantic trees, which seemed relics of the elder world—fit shelter for the Titanic races of an earlier creation. At last, the man of fate, the Anglo-Norman, came, the Aladdin of a more wondrous story than ever Arabian dreamed. The forests fell; light broke through their primeval shades. The wilderness blossomed. Streams, lately dark and turbid, rolled bright o'er golden sands, and mountains, but yesterday somber and barren, now gleamed and glittered with the shining metal that shot and sparkled through every vein. But when the Virginian, or the man of the South, came to the portals of this mighty region, he was denied admission. He found the gates spread wide. He saw all the tribes of the earth—the Celt and the Teuton, the copper-visaged Chinese and the swarthy Hindoo—gathering like eagles to the banquet. He saw, day and night, the restless stream of northern emigrants pouring through the gates; the men of New England and New York, bearing with them their property and their laws, their households and their household gods, their Lares and Penates. All, all were admitted; he only excluded! In vain did he recall that his valor had helped to unbar those portals; in vain did he tell that one Virginian had driven back the foe in northern Mexico, while another made a march, more wonderful than Cortez's, from Vera Cruz to the palace of the Aztecs; in vain did he recount how the Mississippi rifles stemmed the tide of battle at Buena Vista, and the Palmettoes reaped the harvest of death and of glory amid the fires of Churubusco; in vain did he point to the honorable scars upon his body, won in many a tented field—still, still he was forbidden to pass, unless he would first despoil himself of his property, abdicate his duties as a master, desert his household, and forswear his nationality. He might then, indeed, degraded, enter; but he must never sing the song of his own country, or transplant its laws into that strange land. And this, we are told, is equality!

Even now my heart thrills to the gallant northern men; and I thank them, wherever they may this day stand, that they came to our aid in 1854, and forever wiped from the statute-book the law of exclusion which dishonored it, and declared that henceforth the Territories should be our common and equal domain. That great repealing legislation of the Kansas-Nebraska act has resulted in this application of Kansas for admission; and I appeal to you to crown and consummate the work of justice and constitutional equality by showing us that another slave State can be admitted into this Union, even though the North has a majority in Congress.

I ask gentlemen to consider calmly the effects of an opposite course, and its pledge that there shall be no more slave States. You may dot our entire territory over with new free States; you may spread over all Mexico, which now threatens to fall to pieces; you may, and probably will, if this policy is adopted, some day incorporate with your Union her entire territory and population as free States: I ask, sir, when this dynastic triumph, as Mr. SEWARD calls it, is achieved, what use will you make of your power? He proposes first to overthrow the Supreme Court, to subvert the independence of the judiciary; or, as he more politely phrases it, to reorganize it until it is made the pliant organ of northern popular will. I suppose the next step will be to amend and overthrow the Constitution itself. And then comes the last fell act of all—the abolition of southern slavery. Even now you avow your desire to effect this by the moral influence of your cause; you yet disclaim the wish to interfere by law.

But how long can you resist, even if you are sincere, the raging fanaticism, which waxes strong upon every concession you make, and every step it advances? You rashly venture into the current; but the cataract is at hand, and you are helplessly swept downward, you know not whither. And when all is done, when the work is finished, when your long wished-for abolition is attained, where will you be? Suppose slavery abolished to-morrow, and sooner or later, if you persist in your present policy, and the South submits, it must be: what will you have gained? A Hayti or Jamaica of gigantic dimensions—from the Potomac to the Rio Grande, an unproductive barbarism—instead of populous, powerful and civilized States! You will have satisfied a blind fanaticism, and lost the staples that gave employment to your population, wealth to your Treasury, and the command of the world's commerce, and peace to your hands. You will have exiled from the seats of power the sons of your revolutionary compatriots; and, instead, representatives from the emigrants of all countries, and barbarian Senators from the colored races of Mexico, whose natural equality is part of your theory, will ascend the marble steps of your Capitol, and hold the curule seats and the fasces of authority! Such is the noble consummation of your policy! And where will be the security of your own property, when you have rudely thrust aside the protection which judicial independence and constitutional guarantees gave to ours? Your population already outgrows their means of subsistence; your city population increases at the expense of the country, and in many towns, as in New York, Cincinnati, and Chicago, it is half foreign born. When such becomes the general condition of your country, when the men without property are decidedly more numerous than those who have it, when the men who "live to toil, and toil to live," as a Senator from Maine described them, constitute far the greater part of your population, let me ask what is to become of you, with your doctrine of the Divine right of numbers and unlimited voting? Already, in New York, you have heard of the Socialist doctrine of a right to labor, and to support from the taxes of the property-holders; and the chief magistrate of the city pandered to their destructive sentiments. May you not hereafter need the conservative influence of the South in the Union, which, in times past, has been so often felt? I speak, sir, in no spirit of reproach. I make no invidious reflection on any portion of the people of the North. I know their intelligence, their energy, and their manly virtues. I admire the wonders they have wrought, the wealth they have heaped up, the cities they have built, the good they have done in their day and generation.

But, sir, I appeal to candid and conservative men there, to say whether there are not signs of a fearful proclivity among them to the despotism of numbers and the tyranny of mobs; whether the South is not comparatively free from this danger; and whether, if their progressive spirit is a valuable ally to us, they, on the other hand, could well spare our national conservatism, and its weight in the Confederacy; and whether they can afford to obliterate southern civilization, any more than southern cotton, from the Union and the world? Yet to both these results surely, inevitably, are we driven onward, if the doctrines of Mr. SEWARD and his Republican followers are to prevail, unresisted.

I say, sir, unresisted; for it may well be asked what will the South be doing meantime? I wish to say nothing that even appears like a threat. I but wish calmly to calculate consequences either way. The South does not desire disunion; but, I say, beware how you convince her that her institutions can never be extended on an equality with yours; that she must remain in the Union, unresistingly to submit to increasing assaults on her property, until, as a leading paper of New York has lately said, her planters work their plantations but as managers for northern owners, and her people are hewers of wood and drawers of water for a sectional majority! Do you believe she will submit to the consequences of such a belief and such a policy? If you do, I ask why? Is it that her pecuniary interest in slavery is so small? It is valued at not less than two thousand million dollars. Will it be because she is weak? She feeds all her own people, and holds the keys of the commerce of the world, and of the industrial fabric of England. Is it that she is torn by divisions and jealousies? Her population is the most homogeneous in race, and the most closely identified in interest and in social institutions, that the world has ever seen on so large a scale. Do you believe her people less brave, less jealous of their rights and their honor than yourselves? You would not submit to exclusion from the common property; you would not quietly be denied all participation in the appointed work and destiny of your race—the extension of your peculiar system of labor and civilization. Can you desire—do you think—that they will be less attached to their system, less determined to fulfill their mission in fairly and honorably upholding and strengthening it? Let their history answer! They may not be the equals of their revolutionary sires; it may seem to you that time has made them comparatively weaker; but "—that which they are, they are,

One equal temper of heroic hearts,
If weak by time and fate, yet strong in will,
To strive, to seek, to find, and not to yield."

Sir, I speak for myself, and the people whom I sincerely represent on this floor, and I think I can speak with equal confidence for the whole South, when I say that while we love our mother States above all things—first, last, and forever—yet we are sincerely attached to the Union of all the States; that we love every star which glitters on the azure field of its banner; we prize the common glories that consecrate that flag; we wonder at the beneficence of a kind Providence, which has made a vast granary in the northwest, which has lavished water power and mechanical advantages and ingenuity in the northeast, and has endowed the agricultural-loving South with the staples of man, and the scepter of his commerce; we are grateful to the wisdom that has united these different sections into one grand alliance, which secures a perfect free trade in the exchange of our varied productions, and the supply of our mutual wants; and we admire the universal peace which the Union has spread over a mighty continent. I say we value all these things, and it is, therefore, that we stand here this day, as in days past, to do battle for the only means of preserving these to you and to us—to defend the Constitution of our country. It is because we value them that we will ask nothing but what is right and submit to nothing that is wrong. And what is right is State equality in the enjoyment of our Territories, and the opportunity peacefully to extend our several institutions.

I appeal to you, then, in the name of the Constitution and the Union, to pause before you reject Kansas, and thereby declare that there shall be no more slave States. I appeal to Democrats on this side of the House. Your Republican opponents care nothing for Kansas; but they urge the rejection in order to keep open the agitation. They know that, once admitted, all sections will acquiesce in what cannot be undone, and their occupation will be gone; but if rejected, agitation may be kept up, and the Democratic party beaten next fall. And then the road is open to sectional parties. Church after church has been torn asunder by this fanatical sentiment of anti-slavery. Its remorseless waves have washed up the very foundations of the old Whig party, and scarcely left a ruin to mark its place. The pasteboard castle of the Americans has been blown down by its fierce breath. The Democratic party alone remains—the only organization coterminous with the Union itself. It alone knows all sections, and is just to all. Conservative, Union-loving, law-abiding men everywhere, are gathering within its camp. It has carried our country to its present grandeur. Amidst all the wanderings and fluctuations of its long campaigns, it has worked into the pure light of constitutional truth and State equality. It is endeared to the hearts of our people by many a glorious wound, received in bravely battling with the common foes of our hearths, our Constitution, and our Union. It stands this day and hour the last bulwark against fanaticism, the last defense against disunion. The enemy swarms about its position, and assails every weak spot in its line. Alas! that I should see amongst them men whom the Democracy has honored by gallant services in times past, or that any should desert their posts. Are they unconscious of what they do? My heart bleeds for them; and I say, God forgive them! Even now I appeal to them. It is not too late to redeem your error. The foe may have passed round your unguarded station; Randolph may have lost a rose from his chaplet; it may yet be replaced in his wreath, where it will bloom with an immortal luster; for it will be the memorial that you joined us in time to save the battle, and to crush out the fanatical enemies of State equality; that you aided to close up the dim vista of disunion which was seen through the breaches of the Democratic ranks, and you will share with us the triumphant defense of our Constitution and our Union, now and forever, one and inseparable.

Mr. POTTLE obtained the floor.

Mr. BISHOP. I would appeal to my friend from New York to let me have the floor now, as I shall be called away by the first train to visit a sick child, and I trust unanimous consent will be granted that he may follow.

Mr. POTTLE. I am anxious to speak now; but, under the circumstances, if I will have the floor for the following hour, and nobody objects, I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. HOWARD. I object.

Mr. POTTLE. Then I yield unconditionally.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, it would be much more gratifying to my feelings, at the present time, to remain silent; but I find that I cannot, in justice to myself and to those Connecticut Democrats whom I, in part, represent, permit this occasion to pass without expressing my views on this great question.

I find, sir, that an attempt has been made to create the idea, throughout the North, that the friends of the Administration from the North were restrained by fear, or some other cause, from expressing their sentiments on this subject. A intimation was thrown out the other day, by a gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRIS,] that but one Democrat from the North had, at that time, dared to open his mouth on this subject, and that the political crucifixion which was in store for him, had frightened the rest of us out of our consistency. The gentleman said:

"I doubt whether there is a single northern Democrat on this floor, who is sustaining this Leconte outrage, that does not feel he is stepping into his political grave, and that a fearful retribution awaits him at home."

Now, sir, that explains to my mind the motives by which some men are influenced in their action on this question. I will not say that they are preparing the way for a reelection to this House; I will not say that they have got their fingers upon the public pulse, and are administering medicine just as that beats faster or slower; but I will say that I thank them for the announcement which they make to the country and the world, that there are some northern Democrats still left so devoid of political ambition, so regardless of the evils which may await them, that they are willing to meet a premature political grave, and a fearful retribution, in order to carry out what they believe to be for the best interests of the country. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. When the gentleman quotes from my speech, let him quote in connection with what follows—let him quote the whole paragraph.

Mr. BISHOP. I was going to remark that I regretted that the gentleman, after having conferred this compliment upon a few of us, should have made a qualification to it; for he says:

"Relieve this question to-day of the pressure of the Administration, which has marked upon it the imprint of its power and its favor as plainly as the sun is marked upon the heavens on a cloudless day, and I have no idea that three Democrats from the North could be found willing to admit Kansas under the circumstances."

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is a very great pity that the gentleman should have marred the beauty of the compliment by such a qualification. What does he mean? Does he mean to say that all these men of the North who stand by the Administration on this question are actuated by base and unworthy motives? Does he mean to say that they have sacrificed their political honor and integrity for the sake of Executive patronage and favor? If he means to bring this charge against the Democracy of Connecticut, all I have to say is, that I very much doubt the propriety and consistency of a Representative from Illinois calling in question the integrity of Connecticut Democrats until the people of Illinois have paid our people at least the interest upon the money they owe them. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels it his duty to say that applause in the galleries cannot be tolerated—nor upon the floor—and hopes that these demonstrations of applause will not be repeated.

Mr. BISHOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, before proceeding to the Kansas question I wish to say a word or two in regard to the position of the Democratic party in Connecticut upon this important question, which for years has disturbed the peace and harmony of the country—I refer to the question of slavery. Under the Constitution of the United States, as understood by its framers, the Democracy of Connecticut accord to our brethren of the South the right to control and manage the institution of slavery in their own States as to them shall seem best; we accord to them the right to move into the Territories of these United States with their property whenever and wherever they please, so long as they are Territories; we accord to them the right to bring into this Union new States, either with or without slavery, according to the legally and fairly expressed will of the majority of the people of such States at the time of their admission. We believe, Mr. Chairman, that these were some of the great compromises of the Constitution which our fathers were willing to make in order to establish this Government—a Government which has done more for humanity and more for religion than any which has existed since the world began.

And because, Mr. Chairman, we are disposed to accord those constitutional rights to the South, we have been denounced by Abolitionists and Republicans as dough-faces—as northern men with southern principles. The charge is false. We are northern men with national principles. We take the Constitution as we find it, and not as we wish it was; and if gentlemen have any fault to find with that, let them heap their curses upon their slaveholding ancestors. If gentlemen really profess such sentiments as they seem to entertain in regard to the sin and wickedness of the institution, as recognized under the Constitution, let them go to some New England grave-yard, and there, amid the decayed and broken tablets, which mark the last resting places of their fathers, they will find one monument more conspicuous than the rest, which has not felt the withering effect of time, and which stands as bright and beautiful as it did upon the very day when the Legislature of some northern State planted it there as a feeble token of respect to their delegate in the national convention; and after having read the inscription which a grateful posterity has engraved upon its polished side, let them ease the vindictive feelings of their philanthropic breasts by inscribing beneath it: "here lies buried a man who has bequeathed to the country a heritage of infamy and shame; cursed be his name for ever."

If still their virtuous feelings oppress them, let them visit the consecrated soil of Mount Vernon, ransack its honored tomb, gather up the bones of the slaveholding Father of their Country, clothe them in the revolutionary garments which lie preserved within the walls of yon marble building, and hang them in effigy upon the nearest tree, as they hang in effigy those men at the North who only seek to carry out the obligations of the Constitution which such men have imposed upon them. [Applause in the galleries.]

Mr. KILGORE. I rise to a question of order. I protest against these demonstrations of applause from the employes of the Government in the galleries.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut will pause. The Chair once more appeals to gentlemen upon the floor and in the galleries not to make these demonstrations of applause. They are unsuitable to a deliberative body.

Mr. BISHOP. I do not ask any applause from the galleries.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hopes that gentlemen will remember that it is his duty to preserve order, and will not require that this matter shall be mentioned again.

Mr. BISHOP. I trust, Mr. Chairman, that these views of the Connecticut Democracy are satisfactory to all the conservative men of the South, and when we stand by them in all their constitutional and just rights, they can ask and expect no more. Such a Democracy as this it behooves our southern friends to strengthen, and encourage, and not to weaken and destroy. Most of our friends feel and appreciate this, but some there are, I regret to say, actuated, no doubt, by pure motives, but certainly by misguided zeal and an unfortunate judgment, who are doing more in a single day to weaken and paralyze our organization than all the combined forces of the opposition could accomplish in a year. I refer to that class of arguments so often delivered upon this floor in which the slave is compared with the free laborer of the North; in which slavery is set forth as a moral and religious institution; in which the crime and pauperism existing at the North are attributed solely to the absence of the reforming and enriching qualities of the peculiar institution.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the Democratic party in Connecticut is composed, to a great extent, of the bone and sinew of the State, of honest, faithful, hard-working men, who earn their bread by the sweat of their brows. If any gentlemen of the South really believe that they are not as good or as well off as the southern negroes, they have the right to think so; but it would be much more satisfactory to me, and much more gratifying to them, if they would only think so, and not incorporate their thoughts into their speeches, [Laughter:] for just as sure as one of these speeches is delivered on this floor, you find the Republican members on the other side subscribing for it by the hundred and the thousand, scattering it broadcast through the North; and the Republican orators read extracts from it to the people, and sneeringly tell them: "These, these, are the sentiments of the South, which place you lower in the scale of humanity than the African negro, and such are the men whom the Democratic party in the North is calling on you to sustain." They are put forth as the sentiments of the South; and I can assure gentlemen they do more to send Republican members to this House than any other cause that could possibly be invented.

Mr. Chairman, there is another argument which I have heard advanced on this floor by our friends, which injures us at the North, particularly among the moral and religious portion of our party—which constitutes a very large portion of it—and that is, such an argument as was presented the other day by my friend from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] in which he endeavored to prove that slavery was an institution from God, enjoined upon us by the inspired Word; and that it was necessary, in order to give an elevated tone to the morals of the community. Now, I have no doubt the gentleman really thinks so; he has a right to think so; but we do not think that God has got anything particular to do with it. [Laughter.]

I apprehend the gentleman from Georgia does not advocate the institution so much out of respect for the old Levitical law, as he does out of his zeal to promote the interests of his constituents and of his State. But if he does, Mr. Chairman, he must take the whole as well as a part of the law; and if he refers to chapter xi., verses 7, 8, of that same law of Leviticus, he will find the following:

"And the swine, though he divide the hoof and be cloven-footed, yet he cheweth not the cud; he is unclean to you."

"Of their flesh shall ye not eat, and their carcass shall ye not touch; they are unclean to you."

Now, when the gentleman from Georgia is again a candidate for reelection, should he tell his constituents from the stump that it was contrary to the Divine law for them any longer to eat pork or bacon, and that he considered it his religious duty to have that law made the law of the State of Georgia, I think it would be a long time before we should see him here on this floor again clothed with representative power. He would fall a martyr to his religious zeal. [Laughter.] Well, now, the Democracy of Connecticut are a God-fearing, Christian people. Their standard of morality is high.

Mr. GARTRELL. I dislike very much to interrupt the gentleman; but—

Mr. BISHOP. I cannot spare the time. They think they are right. The gentleman from Georgia may think he is right. If we are both right, let us drop the subject, and content ourselves with the reflection that your people are not our people, neither is your God our God.

But there is one more argument which does us at the North great injury, and which does the South no good: and that is, the argument in which the crime and pauperism existing at the North is compared with that existing at the South. Now it is true, Mr. Chairman, that according to the census there is more crime and pauperism at the North in proportion to the population than there is at the South. But it is not true in point of fact. In the State of Connecticut our paupers consist of the poorer portion of the laboring classes, supported at the public expense, who are either too young, too old, or physically disqualified for labor. I imagine that you have laboring people at the South; and I apprehend that your negroes, like white men, are born, have their childhood and their old age, have their times when they cannot work, and when they must be supported by their masters. I presume you have just as many of them with you, in proportion to your population, as we have with us; but ours go into the census; on the record, and yours do not. The only difference between us is, that our paupers are supported at the public expense, and yours by private individuals.

In regard to foreign criminals, the gentleman says we have more of them with us than they have with them. That is undoubtedly true. But it will be remembered that nineteen twentieths of all the foreigners in the country reside north of Mason and Dixon's line; that nearly every one that emigrates to this country emigrates to northern ports. In regard to the native criminals, the gentleman is right again. But why is this? Is it because there is really less crime committed at the South, in proportion to her population, than there is at the North? Is it because your people are not just as bad, and just as wicked, as ours are?—I will not say more so. The very fact that the census shows less crime at the South than at the North, in proportion to the population, is prima facie evidence either that your laws are less stringent or less rigidly enforced, or that the census-taker has not been as willing to expose your vices as ours has been. Why, Mr. Chairman, we have laws at the North which, if you had at the South, and enforced them, would imprison half your people. [Laughter.] We have Maine liquor laws, Sunday laws, swearing laws, gambling laws, lottery laws, horse-racing laws, and hundreds of other laws, which you do not have, or, if you do, do not enforce. We used to have a law in Connecticut which forbade a man kissing his wife on Sunday. How would such a criminal law be enforced in Georgia? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARTRELL. We would have no such law there.

Mr. BISHOP. Were such a law enforced there amongst that warm-blooded and affectionate people, every dwelling-house would be converted into a prison. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I will not pursue these points. I trust I have said enough to convince our southern friends that we are a very decent people in our way, after all, and that slavery would not improve our condition.

I have only alluded to these topics in the hope that gentlemen would abandon such a course of argument. The Democrats of Connecticut, and of the North, will stand by you in all that is constitutional and right, and you can ask no more. Do not, then, gentlemen, I implore you, weaken us—and by weakening us injure yourselves—through such unnecessary and useless comparisons. But, Mr. Chairman, I hasten to the consideration of the Kansas question.

In discussing the Kansas question, Mr. Chairman, I deem it unnecessary to go back any further than February, 1857, when a law was passed by the Territorial Legislature providing for the calling of a convention to adopt a State constitution. I am aware that it is claimed on the other side, that the Territorial Legislature was a bogus Legislature from the beginning and void of all legal authority. This was the claim made by the Republican party during the last presidential election. Every Republican orator throughout the North, with the report of the Kansas investigating committee for his Bible, and the bogus Legislature for his text, endeavored to convince the people that the Topeka Legislature was the legal Legislature of Kansas, and that the Territorial Legislature was a usurpation. Congress, by providing for the payment of the members of the Territorial Legislature, and by other provisions, has decided in the most solemn manner the legality of that body. The people of these United States, by a vote of two million seven hundred and fifty thousand against one million three hundred and seventy-five thousand, have acknowledged the validity of that Legislature.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Congress—

Mr. BISHOP. I cannot yield any of my time. The majority against the Topeka Legislature was one million three hundred and seventy-five thousand more than the entire vote in its favor. And not only this, but the free-State men of Kansas themselves have acknowledged the validity of that Territorial Legislature. Under the laws of that same body they, last October, elected a majority of the present Territorial Legislature of Kansas. Under those same laws, they elected the free-State Delegate to this House, who now holds his seat upon this floor; and not a solitary member has been heard to question the right of that Delegate to his seat here. Thus we find, Mr. Chairman, that the executive and legislative departments of the Government, that all political parties in Kansas, and all political parties in this country, have, by their acts, acknowledged the validity of the Territorial Legislature of Kansas. The verdict of the country is unanimous on that point; and it is now too late to claim that the Lecompton constitution is null and void because the Legislature which called it into existence had no legal authority.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is claimed that even if the Territorial Legislature was a legal body, still it had no power under the organic act to provide for the calling of a convention to form a State constitution. This is one of the chief arguments which is presented by Democrats who oppose the admission of Kansas. Upon what substantial ground that argument is based, I must confess I have been unable to discover. Certainly not upon precedent, for the precedents are every way. Not upon the Constitution of the United States, and not upon any prohibitory provision in the organic act. The Kansas and Nebraska bill, so far from denying any such power to the Territorial Legislature, in my judgment expressly confers that authority in plain and unmistakable language. The President finds the authority in that clause of the act which authorizes the people to form and regulate their institutions in their own way, and that would seem to be sufficient. But I find an additional authority. In section twenty-two of the Kansas bill, it is provided that the legislative power and authority of the Territory shall be vested in the Governor and General Assembly; and in section twenty-four it is provided that the legislative power and authority of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation not inconsistent with the Constitution or with this act. The first section provides by whom the legislative powers of the Territory are to be exercised, and the latter sections provide how far that authority shall extend. The power granted is general, and extends to all rightful subjects, not inconsistent with the Constitution, or with the organic act.

Now, will it be pretended, Mr. Chairman, that that Territorial Legislature can legislate upon no subject except what is specifically mentioned in the act itself? The idea is ridiculous; but yet such is the ground which gentlemen must assume in order to deprive the Legislature of authority to call a convention to adopt a State constitution. Why, under that idea, the Territorial Legislature would be a body devoid of all power—with no power to incorporate cities or prescribe their boundaries; with no power to enact criminal laws and punish offenders; with no power to preserve peace or protect the lives and property of their people, for not one of these powers is specifically mentioned in the act itself, but they are only included in the general clause "all rightful subjects of legislation."

In my judgment, therefore, Mr. Chairman, the legislative power of the Territory is just as full and ample as the legislative power of the States, except in so far as it is limited by the organic act. Not one word or syllable can be found in the Kansas-Nebraska bill by which Congress reserves to itself the right to prescribe the manner in which the people or the Legislature shall call a convention to adopt a State constitution. It is a "rightful subject of legislation," upon which the people are to act through their legal representatives. In my judgment, therefore, the Territorial Legislature of Kansas had as much right to call a convention to adopt a State constitution for Kansas as the Legislature of Connecticut has to call a convention to adopt a constitution for Connecticut.

This legal right the Legislature of Kansas exercised in 1857. They called a convention to adopt a State constitution; they decided upon the number of districts, and the number of delegates to be elected from each district. Whether the apportionment was equal or unequal, just or unjust, was a matter for the Legislature alone to determine. Under this law of the Legislature, delegates were elected, and by these delegates the Lecompton constitution was adopted. That portion of the constitution relating to slavery was submitted to the people for their adoption or rejection. A majority of those who voted, decided to have that constitution as the convention had left it. The convention was not instructed by the law to refer any portion of the constitution to the people. Inasmuch, therefore, as the Territorial Legislature was a legal body, endowed with full power to legislate upon all rightful subjects, I cannot for the life of me discover upon what ground it can be claimed that the constitution formed by the Lecompton convention is not a legal instrument.

Mr. LEITER. I should like to ask the gentleman a question just there.

Mr. BISHOP. I cannot yield. But it is said, Mr. Chairman, that in many of the districts no census was taken, no election was held, and no votes were cast. This is undoubtedly true; and the question arises, does the fact that several districts were unrepresented in that convention, either on account of the refusal of the people to be registered, or because the proper officers were by threats or fear prevented from doing their duty, or, if you please, because they themselves neglected or refused to do their duty, render the delegates from those districts where the census was taken, and where an election was held, legally incompetent to assemble in convention and adopt a State constitution? I hold not. Suppose that at our next election in Connecticut one third of all of the towns in the State should, on account of the negligence or refusal of their officers, fail to open their polls, and those towns should be thus unrepresented in the Legislature: will any man pretend to say that the delegates elected from the remaining towns would not constitute the legal Legislature of Connecticut, and that their laws would not be binding upon the people? for if the fact that twenty towns were unrepresented makes the Legislature void, the same fact would exist if only one town was unrepresented.

But we are told, Mr. Chairman, that if the steps were legal up to this point, still they ceased to have any binding force upon the people when the convention failed to submit the whole constitution to the people. There is no man upon this floor who has more respect for the principle of popular sovereignty than myself, or who will go further to secure to the people the right to govern themselves in their own way. But who are the people in a legal sense, and how do they express their will? Our Government is a representative Government, and the will of the people is expressed through their representatives. Will any man pretend to say that a law passed by the Legislature of a State, to which a large majority of the people are opposed, is illegal and void because the people would vote it down if an opportunity was offered? Most certainly not.

Why, Mr. Chairman, candidates are nominated as exponents of the will of their parties. If elected, the power and authority of the people is vested in them; and even should they turn traitors to those by whom they were elected, still their voice would express the voice of the people. The people of Kansas were asked to form and regulate their institutions in their own way. When a law was passed by the Legislature authorizing delegates to be elected to a constitutional convention, all the people were included in the invitation. They must have known the character and the opinions of the candidates. The majority refused to vote, and allowed the minority to elect their candidates, the legal presumption is, that they were satisfied with the result. How, then, can it be claimed that the Lecompton constitution does not express the legal will of the people of Kansas? The Legislature of Kansas being a legal body, being invested by the organic act with full power to legislate on all rightful subjects, having passed the law for the election of delegates to a convention to adopt a State constitution, having conferred on those delegates full power, without limitation or restriction, and the delegates elected not having transgressed the authority conferred upon them, not having violated the law under which they were elected, I cannot, for the life of me, see how the constitution framed by them was not a legal instrument.

I have thus far, Mr. Chairman, spoken of the constitution only as a legal instrument. The question now arises, is it right and just, under all the circumstances of the case, to admit Kansas into the Union under that constitution? I care not how strictly in accordance with law the constitution of a State may have been framed, if the people, whose rights are to be affected by it, have never had an opportunity of engaging in its formation, or of expressing their opinion upon it, I would avail myself of that little word "may," and never vote for its admission until such an opportunity had been offered. How stands the Lecompton constitution in this respect? Have not the people had a full and fair opportunity to elect just such delegates as they pleased, who would have adopted just such a constitution as they wanted? Has any deception been practiced upon them? Were they not told by the President of the United States—were they not told, in advance, by Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton—that the law providing for the election of delegates to this convention was binding upon them? Were they not warned of the consequences in case they refused to vote? Were they not warned not to delude themselves with the idea that the constitution would be submitted to them for their approval or disapproval? Were they not invited, urged, implored even, by Walker and Stanton, to vote? Most certainly they were. Why, then, I ask, did they not vote? No man can deny that a fair opportunity was offered to them. The faith of the Government was pledged to insure them a fair election. The Army of the United States was pledged to protect them against invasions from abroad and intimidation at home. Yet a majority, it is said, did not vote. They staid away, and allowed the two thousand men who did vote, to express their will for them. Why, I ask again, Mr. Chairman, did they not vote?

I can tell you why. The returns were to be made to Walker and Stanton. They were to count the votes; and they had no reason to believe that these men would cheat and defraud them. Why, then, I ask again, did they not vote? Ah! the soil of Kansas had already been seized upon by the Republican party as the proper field for political warfare. Her trials, her sufferings, and her blood, were necessary to furnish sustenance to that starving political organization. Republican Senators and wire-pullers were prowling about that Territory by day and by night, urging the people not to undertake to manage their institutions in their own way. The Republican press of the whole country, from the New York Tribune down, was giving them fatherly advice, and urging them not to vote. "Do not vote!" "Do not vote!" was the universal exclamation of those men who are now complaining and lamenting that the dear people of Kansas have been deprived of their sovereignty. Why, Mr. Chairman, did they tell them not to vote? Ah! they knew that if they voted, Kansas would be a free and prosperous State. They knew that when peace was restored to Kansas, the days of the Republican party would be numbered. They knew that when the wounds of "bleeding Kansas" should be healed, the life of Republicanism would be extinguished. Twice previous to the adoption of the Lecompton constitution, was the opportunity offered to the people of Kansas to assume the control and management of the affairs of their own government. The fact that, upon every occasion when they did vote, they were in the majority, is conclusive evidence that, if they had voted upon the other occasions they would have been in the majority. An opportunity was given to them to assume the control of the Legislature by which the convention was called. Opportunity was given them to elect the delegates to the constitutional convention; and the whole power of the Army of the United States, sent into the Territory at their own request, was pledged to protect them against invasion from abroad and intimidation at home. Guided by the advice of outside politicians, twice did they refuse the proffered boon.

After these two distinct refusals upon the part of the people of Kansas to have anything to do in the formation and regulation of their own domestic institutions, still, a legally elected convention of Kansas told them, "though you have declined to participate in this election; though you have defied our authority and trampled the laws under foot, still your voice may yet be heard upon that great question which has so long agitated the country, and disturbed the peace of the Territory." They told them, "though we have the power in our own hands, though we are anxious to make Kansas a slave State, still we will leave that question for you, and you alone, to determine." What was the response? "Away with your constitution; who cares about slavery? let us kill the whole constitution; let us undo all that you, the legal representatives of the people, have done; let us open afresh the wounds of 'bleeding Kansas'; let us keep up this agitation until 1860, until, upon this sea of popular excitement, we have wafted our candidate into the presidential chair, and you may make Kansas a slave State as soon as you please."

Under these circumstances, Mr. Chairman, Kansas presents herself for admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution. She asks to be admitted under a constitution legally adopted and republican in its form; and, so far as the facts now appear, I deem it due to Kansas, and due to the country, that she should be admitted. She has been forced upon us by the action of the Republican party as a slave State, with a slave constitution; and after that action, they now say they will raise the cry at the North, if she is admitted, "Behold how our prophecy has been fulfilled! We told you the effect of the Kansas-Nebraska bill would be the making of Kansas a slave State. See how our predictions are verified."

Well, it is true, Mr. Chairman, she may be a slave State in name, and in name only; and that for a brief period. I care not how deeply slavery may be ingrafted into that constitution; for there is an unwritten law, far above all human constitutions and laws, which must ever regulate and control that institution. I refer to the irrepealable law of nature—climate, production, and soil. That law I, as a northern man, am willing to trust. We have seen its operation in California, in New Mexico, in Oregon, in Washington, in Nebraska, and in Utah. Under the operation of the same law, behold slavery, limited as it is in Kansas, and even in Missouri growing "small by degrees and beautifully less." The South, Mr. Chairman, will get the legal principle, and the North the naked substance. If she is satisfied with the shell, we certainly should be with the oyster.

Now, if disgrace is to attach to any party because Kansas may be a slave State in name, let that disgrace fall upon the free-State men of Kansas, and the Republican party of this country. This dust which is being thrown before the eyes of the people of the free States will soon be swept away; and when they see, as they will see, that the negligence, the obstinacy, and the rebellion of these men have made Kansas what she is; when they see, as they will see, that the Democratic party was in honor bound to admit Kansas into the Union, whenever she should present herself with a constitution legally adopted, and republican in form; and when they see, as they will see, that every movement on the part of the Opposition has been to force that constitution with slavery upon the Democratic party, in order to heap the responsibility upon their shoulders, then will the current of public opinion be changed; then will the finger of scorn and indignation be pointed at the leaders of the Republican party, and to each one of them will the charge be brought home, "Thou art the man!"

I have but a moment left, and I will say a word or two in regard to the claim set up that the constitution cannot be altered previous to 1864. I take the position that, so far as the total abolition of slavery is concerned, it is not necessary for them to be able to change their constitution. I claim that, under this constitution, the Legislature of Kansas can, by the mere passage of a law, sweep slavery entirely from the State of Kansas without any alteration of the constitution, without any submission to the people.

I read from the second section of the seventh article:

That is the only section of the constitution of Kansas by which the power of the Legislature, in respect to slavery, is limited or restricted. They are only prevented from passing laws against the importation of slaves from abroad, so long as slavery exists in the State. As soon as slavery is abolished in the State, they can pass a law forever prohibiting the introduction of a single slave. Well, now, it is estimated, Mr. Chairman, that there are some one or two hundred slaves in the Territory of Kansas. What their assessed value would be, before a free-State jury, called together by a free-State Legislature, I do not know; but I imagine it would not be very high—perhaps $50,000. If the people of Kansas cannot afford to pay that to make Kansas a free State, then, of course, our Republican friends on the other side would willingly do it. But if they, too, should decline, I pledge my word that the Democratic party of the North will raise sufficient funds for the purpose, provided they give good security that it shall be faithfully applied to the object. [Laughter.] But it is not necessary, Mr. Chairman, that there should be any expense. I hold that every State has a right to take possession of private property for public use on paying a just compensation therefor. The free-State Legislature of Kansas can deem it extremely necessary for the public benefit of Kansas that she should own all the negroes in the State; can have their assessment made by a free-State jury, and can get them at a very small figure. Then they can turn round and sell them to the citizens of Georgia, Alabama, South Carolina, and the other slaveholding States, and can realize a tremendous speculation by the operation. [Laughter.]

Thus we see, that after all the talk of slavery being forever fastened on the virgin soil of Kansas, she can be made a free State in six weeks, and money can be made by the operation. But it is said, Mr. Chairman, "why force this constitution on the people?" Why, there is no force about it. She comes and asks us to take her with her constitution. I consider that Kansas is in a very unfortunate condition. She is very sick. She has been wild and wayward, and has committed many indiscretions, and it is necessary to administer a very severe dose; and though she may not like the remedy, though it may grate harshly upon her sensitive nerves, and somewhat reduce her system, yet she will soon come forth invigorated, fresh and blooming as a new-blown rose. She will then be at the age of maturity and discretion, and she can become the thirty-second wife of Uncle Sam without any charge of having adopted the Mormon faith.

I remember, Mr. Chairman, reading, while I was quite a boy, of a certain island which was created by the gods in the midst of the sea, and by them dedicated to warfare and bloodshed. On that island the tribes from the lands lying round about, were accustomed to assemble, in order to avenge their wrongs and to test their strength. So frequent and so bloody were these battles, that the chiefs of the several nations found their tribes diminishing, and the glory of their kingdoms departing. These chiefs assembled in council to devise means whereby the destruction of their tribes might be avoided and the strength of their kingdoms preserved. After considerable discussion of the question, an old chieftain, with gray hairs, arose and suggested that they should all kneel down and offer a fervent supplication to the gods that they would sink the island beneath the surface of the ocean. They did kneel down. A fervent prayer was offered up, and in an instant Neptune appeared on the island, struck it with his trident, and sent it hissing and bubbling to the depths below. The result was—

Mr. POTTLE obtained the floor.

Several MEMBERS. Go on; go on.

Mr. EDIE. I object. Not a syllable more; not a word.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 79.

Mr. CLEMENS. I hope that the gentleman will have liberty to finish his remarks.

Mr. POTTLE. I will yield to the gentleman for three minutes.

Mr. BISHOP. The result was—

Mr. EDIE. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has no right to object.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I would like to appeal to the courtesy of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTLE,] and ask him to give me a few minutes of his time.

Mr. POTTLE. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Mr. Chairman—

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDIE] objected to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] having a few moments of the time of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTLE.] As that objection prevailed, I now object to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRIS] getting the time of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I presume, sir—

Mr. HOUSTON. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York cannot yield, except by unanimous consent, unless it be for explanation or to allow a question to be asked.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. It has been the universal practice in this House—

Mr. HOUSTON. I object. The gentleman from Connecticut was not allowed to proceed, and for that reason I object—

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois, (amid loud cries of "Order!") and the rapping of the Chairman's gavel.) The gentleman from Connecticut has perpetrated a foul slander on the State of Illinois in saying that she did not pay the interest on her public debt, and that her citizens did not pay their obligations. I repel that slander; and if I am denied the privilege of replying now, I shall take the earliest opportunity of doing it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the committee rise and go into the House, that we may see if we cannot keep proper order in the House.

Mr. COMINS. The gentleman has not the floor to make that motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. POTTLE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. POTTLE. Mr. Chairman, before the vote shall be taken which will either leave the people of Kansas the control of that Territory, or, denying the right of self-government, compel them to submit to laws to which they never gave their assent, and to institutions which they loathe and protest against, I desire the indulgence of the committee for the brief time allotted, that I may place upon your records the fact—important to me, if to no one else—that in all the stages of this Kansas matter, I have, to the extent of my constitutional right, opposed this contemplated outrage upon a portion of our people.

Sir, I have not the foolish vanity to suppose that anything which I can say will change a vote upon this question, for I suppose that every member of this House has already in his own mind settled the question as to his vote upon this measure, according to the dictates of his conscience, or under the influence of surrounding circumstances.

If there were some voice among us potent enough to hush the jarring elements, and restore us to that harmony which once characterized the Representatives of the various sections, it would indeed be well. But, sir, I doubt that any one will be found able to hush the wild storm of passion which has taken possession of the public mind; surely not, unless we can better understand one another, and the points upon which we differ. Bound together by the ties of common brotherhood, and with a history which proves that our Union has thus far proved a success almost or quite unexampled, we yet meet here day by day, with feelings more embittered than we ever felt against the people of any other government, even in times of war. And it would seem as though we had indeed reached that point of our history when the strength of this Confederacy was to be severely tried; that period when the antagonism between our two systems of labor, free and slave, will no longer be put off. Compromises have been resorted to, in order to delay this struggle, until they have been exhausted and discarded by all parties. This is a struggle which is not confined to Kansas. It neither began there, nor is it likely to end there. It began with the Government, has kept pace with it, and will not be likely to end until there is nothing left to struggle for. Nor do I think that it is a mere struggle for political power. That may be a means of its progress, but is neither its cause nor its end. I believe, sir, if the Union were to-day dissolved, that this struggle would still go on, and wax fiercer from that very cause. It is one of the evidences that the world moves, and that progress is slowly, surely, and certainly, undermining and sweeping away those old abuses which deny to labor its proper reward, and to man that dignity to which he is by nature entitled.

In my judgment, sir, it only remains for us to say whether that struggle shall be peaceful, and according to the ordinary course of events or otherwise. The immediate point of this contest, now presented, is, whether Kansas shall be now admitted into the Union, or rather, to speak more properly, forced into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution. Now, sir, the question of slavery is certainly not the only one which the people of a new State have the right to pass upon, in framing for themselves a constitution; nor are they bound to accept a constitution until it shall, upon that and all other questions, be in accordance with their wishes. Yet I think none will dissent when I say, that if it had not been for this question of slavery, the people of Kansas would have been left unmolested, to settle and arrange their affairs in their own way, and would have come into the Union in proper time almost without question.

Now, sir, I desire to say, and I wish to be distinctly understood, here and elsewhere, that while I am opposed to slavery as a great political and moral evil, determined to oppose and resist it whenever I have the right so to do, there is not one constitutional right, one guarantee, which State sovereignty has thrown around this institution, which I have ever sought, or which I now seek, to interfere with.

As I said, I look upon slavery as a great wrong to the black man, and equally so to the white man, whose labor and political rights are affected by it; but I have looked upon it, and still look upon it, as a question which belonged to the States where it is, and not to me. Deeply deploring its existence anywhere, and hoping for the time when those having the right to put an end to it would see how much it was for their interest to do it, I have been willing to leave it there, and to them. I speak, sir, for no one but myself and that constituency whose opinions I mean faithfully to represent; but I believe, that in the position just stated, I share a common feeling with the party of which I claim to be a member.

Sir, I desire just here to say one word in regard to the charge so often made, here and elsewhere, that this party is sectional; that it has for its object interference with slavery in violation of its rights under the Constitution, and in defiance of the sovereignty of the States. These are charges easily made, but not so easy to sustain. If gentlemen who make them would but take the trouble to look into the platform of the Republican party, they would meet with greater success than I have if they could there find anything to sustain these charges. The first resolution of that platform is, in substance, that the maintenance of the principles of the Declaration of Independence and of the Federal Constitution is essential to the preservation of republican institutions; and that the Federal Constitution, the rights of the States, and the union of the States shall be preserved. The second resolution contains a denial of the right that slavery can, under the Constitution, be established in the Territories. The third, that Congress has, under the Constitution, authority to govern the Territories, and is bound to prohibit slavery therefrom. The fourth recites, substantially, the "bill of rights" and its infringement in Kansas. The fifth, the right of Kansas to be admitted into the Union under the constitution which the people of that Territory had adopted. The sixth takes ground against the doctrines of the Ostend manifesto. The seventh, in favor of a Pacific railroad. The eighth, in favor of the improvement of rivers and harbors for certain purposes; and the ninth, an invitation to free men of all parties to unite and uphold the principles above set forth. And this is all.

Now, sir, I call upon the gentlemen, one and all, who make these charges, to inform the House and the country upon which of these they base the charge that the Republican party is a sectional party. Let us, Mr. Chairman, have the specifications. Let us have the proof. Sir, I ask you, and I ask the members who make these charges, if there is anything upon the subject of the rights of slavery in this platform that was not to be found in the platform of that party upon which the honorable member from Georgia [Mr. STRENNES] stood and battled so long and so well?—upon which a score of honorable members from the slave States, whom I now see around me, fought so valiantly? Were these gentlemen, during all these years, standing upon a sectional platform, and one at war with the principles of the Constitution? No, sir, the charge is not true. The Republican party stands to-day upon a platform as broad as the Constitution, and no more. It is opposed to slavery under the Constitution, and only under it. Its principles embrace and guarantee the right of every section of the Union under the Constitution, and if you have denied it a hearing in one half of the Union, it is because its principles are national, and conflict with the sectional dogmas that have taken possession of that section—dogmas which admit of no right but slavery—no nationality but slavery—no Constitution but slavery—no Democracy but slavery. And because we will not subscribe to this new revelation, we are called sectional and fanatics. Because we stand by principles as old as the Government, and much older, you say we are inflicting wrongs upon the South. Mr. Chairman, I tell you, and I tell gentlemen, that I am not here with an intention to inflict a wrong upon any section of the country; and if gentlemen, instead of asserting it, will show me facts to prove that by my action I interfere with the constitutional rights of any section, I pledge myself not only to desist, but, by my future action, to make such reparation for the past as I can.

I have listened long and with attention to the many eloquent gentlemen from the slaveholding section of the country, who have spoken upon the question of admitting Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, but I have yet to learn the wrongs which it is said we of the North have inflicted and are seeking to inflict, upon them. And yet, these wrongs are said to be so flagrant, that if we persist in them the South cannot and will not longer remain in the Union. I am exceedingly anxious to preserve the Union. I have been taught to love it; and I believe I can truly say, in the language used by my colleague, [Mr. BURROUGHS,] the other day, that "if need be, I am ready to lay down my life in its defense." But, sir, I do not expect it to stand, and further, I do not desire it to stand, unless upon the broad principles of justice, and with a full and constant recognition of the rights of all the parties who compose it.

When, now or hereafter, instead of protecting the rights of all, it is found that it has become the means of oppression to a portion, then, sir, I say, let the oppression cease; let the rights of all be respected, or let the Government end—peaceably or forcibly; let it give place to one which will better accomplish the purposes for which governments are instituted.

If I have correctly understood gentlemen in their charges against the North, they are, that we are seeking to deprive the South of its just share in the Government; that we are endeavoring to compel them to take a position subordinate to us. If, at any time, there has been any disposition upon the part of the North to accomplish this, it should, in fairness to all parties, be admitted that we have, thus far, met with very indifferent success; and that, as far as holding offices under the Federal Government is concerned, the charge would much more properly come from the other side. Sixty years the Government has substantially been in the hands and under the control of the slaveholders. If you look at the amount of territory which each section has acquired, (that of the slaveholding section nearly or quite doubling that of the free States,) you will be forced to the same conclusion; that is, that we, not you, ought to complain of being deprived of our "just share of the Territories." And yet gentlemen gravely tell us, (and look and act as though they were in earnest,) that we are depriving the South of her just share of the territory; and that, unless we cease to do so, the Union must and will come to an end.

Sir, I propose briefly to examine this question. I know that it has been many times done, and yet in these debates these old facts seem to be utterly forgotten or ignored. At the beginning of the Government, slavery had no share in the territory not organized into States. It was confined to the States; looked upon as a local evil, which was soon to be got rid of; and was expressly prohibited from occupying the Territories, or any portion thereof. It was the settled policy of all sections to prevent it from spreading:

If proof were needed for facts so common-place and widely known, it would only be necessary to refer to the "ordinance of 1787," and to the expressed opinions of every distinguished gentleman, North or South, who took such part in the formation of the Government as required the expression of an opinion upon that subject.

When subsequently we acquired additional territory, you requested that this policy should be abandoned; and then, as now, you threatened a dissolution of the Union unless your request should be acceded to on our part. We of the North asked, as we had the right, that the then settled policy should be adhered to. But a proposition was brought forward by a distinguished statesman of your section to compromise by dividing the territory between us; and it was acceded to on our part—reluctantly, I confess; unwisely, I have never doubted; but still, it was agreed to. Our portion, as a part of the agreement, being forever devoted to freedom; and yours—by far the better portion—was left free to you as to us. In that agreement you gained all that we yielded; we gained nothing; we simply reserved to a part of the territory that principle which before applied to the whole. You entered into that agreement as a fair compact between us—one which, as I have said, was made at your request; and whether, in your estimation of it at this time, you gained or lost, you were in honor, and by all the rules of fair dealing, bound to carry out its provisions. We have faithfully abided by all the obligations which it imposed upon us. How have you kept faith with us? I have no time to trace the history of bad faith and of wrongs on your part, and shall leave the compromises of 1850 and 1854 to answer my question. By the first you obtained rights and defenses for slavery which we believe were not intended by the Constitution; and by the other you have broken all faith upon this question, and by legislative enactment canceled your agreement.

But gentlemen tell us that the Supreme Court has decided that the compromise of 1820 was unconstitutional. I deny it, and appeal to the record of the court to sustain my assertion. I say that the Supreme Court has made no such decision. It is true that a partisan court, packed for the purpose, has so far forgotten what belongs to the power and dignity of a court that individual members of it have passed out of the record before them, and given extra-judicial opinions to that effect. Opinions as binding upon that question as if given by the same gentlemen at a political meeting, and no more so. By the repeal of the compromise of 1820 you threw open all the Territories to the occupation of slavery. Starting with none, you acquired the right, in common with us, to all. Does this look like oppression on our part? Was this depriving you of your just share in the Territories? What was the plea under which this was accomplished? That the restriction was not democratic. That congressional intervention, as you call it, was not democratic. That the true rule was to open the Territories to all sections, and allow the people occupying them to settle their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. We at the North, or a portion of us at least, took issue with you upon this question, and went to the people, and were beaten. And now, when we call upon you to carry out this principle which you have introduced into the government of the Territories, and to which you have procured the sanction of the popular will; when we ask of you to abide by the will, again and again expressed, of the people of the Territory of Kansas, you refuse. You say that the popular majority in Kansas are factious. That to admit them into the Union under a constitution of their choice which excludes slavery deprives you of your rights, and that they must be admitted under the Lecompton constitution or you can no longer remain with us in the Union.

Sir, if any gentleman shall say that I beg the question, and that this Lecompton constitution is to be regarded as expressing the consent of the majority of the people of that Territory, I beg to remind this House of the preamble and resolutions upon this subject which the people of that Territory have placed upon our records, and which I desire to incorporate into and make a part of my remarks:

Preamble and joint resolutions in relation to the constitution framed at Lecompton, Kansas Territory, on the 7th day of November, 1857:

Whereas, a small minority of the people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties of this Territory, availing themselves of a law which enabled them to obstruct and defeat a fair expression of the popular will, did, by the odious and oppressive application of the provisions and partisan machinery of said law, procure the return of the whole number of the delegates to the constitutional convention recently assembled at Lecompton; and whereas, by reason of the defective provisions of said law, in connexion with the neglect and misconduct of the authorities charged with the execution of the same, the people living in the remaining nineteen counties of the Territory were not permitted to return delegates to said convention, were not recognized in its organization, or in any sense heard or felt in its deliberations; and whereas, it is an axiom in political ethics that the people cannot be deprived of their rights by the negligence or misconduct of public officers; and whereas, a minority, to wit, twenty-eight only of the sixty members of said convention, have attempted by an unworthy contrivance to impose upon the whole people of the Territory a constitution without consulting their wish, and against their will; and whereas, the members of said convention have refused to submit their action for the approval or disapproval of the voters of the Territory, and in thus acting have defied the known will of nine tenths of the voters thereof; and whereas, the action of a fragment of said convention, representing, as they did a small minority of the voters of the Territory, repudiates and crushes out the distinctive principle of the Nebraska-Kansas act, and violates and tramples under foot the rights and the sovereignty of the people; and whereas, from the foregoing statement of facts it clearly appears that the people have not been left "free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way," but on the contrary, at every stage in the anomalous proceedings recited, they have been prevented from so doing.

Be it therefore resolved by the Governor and Legislative Assembly of Kansas Territory, That the people of Kansas, being opposed to said constitution, Congress has no rightful power under it to admit said Territory into the Union as a State, and we, the representatives of said people, do hereby in their name, and on their behalf, solemnly protest against such admission.

Resolved, That such action on the part of Congress would, in the judgment of the members of this Legislative Assembly, be an entire abandonment of the doctrine of non-intervention in the affairs of the Territory, and a substitution in its stead of congressional intervention in behalf of a minority engaged in a disreputable attempt to defeat the will and violate the rights of the majority.

Resolved, That the people of Kansas Territory claim the right, through a legal and fair expression of the will of a majority of her citizens, to form and adopt a constitution for themselves.

Resolved, That the Governor of this Territory be requested to forward a copy of the foregoing preamble and resolutions, to the President of the United States, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and to the Delegate in Congress from this Territory.

G. W. DEITZLER,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

C. W. BABCOCK,

President of the Council.

— SECRETARY'S OFFICE,

LECOMPTON, (K. T.), January 12, 1858.

I certify the above to be a true copy of the enrolled resolutions deposited in this office.

HUGH S. WALSH, Clerk.

Originated in the House of Representatives.

C. F. CURRIER, Chief Clerk.

Sir, with this protest before us, how can it be said that the Lecompton constitution legally expresses the will of the people of the Territory? That there has, in all its stages, been a large actual majority against it, is a fact which has been so fully established as to require no comment; indeed, I think it is not seriously denied here or elsewhere. But the friends of this constitution, including the President, say that if a convention be duly elected, although by a minority of the people, and frame a constitution, it is as binding upon the people as though all had voted; in other words, those who had a fair opportunity to vote, and yet refused or neglected to do so, are bound by the action of those who did vote. Sir, I have no fault to find with that position; it is one incident to our form of government. But, while conceding this, I take occasion to say to the gentlemen, and to the President, that this position cannot avail them here against the fact which they know, against the fact established, not only by the whole history of this Kansas difficulty, but also by the evidence taken by a committee sent there by Congress to inquire into that history. There never was a legal convention to frame that constitution. The Legislature which authorized the election of delegates to it was a fraud, and held their seats, not by the votes of the citizens of Kansas, but through the violence and ruffianism of those who never had been citizens of the Territory. The Legislature thus elected had no legal right to their seats, no power to order a convention, and were only kept in their seats by the force of Federal troops. When they ordered the election of delegates, without the legal right so to do, there could be no obligation upon the people to recognize that order by voting; nor is it possible to fairly raise an intendment against them by reason of their refusal to sanction this outrage, not only upon their rights, but upon the principles which underlie our whole structure of government.

But, sir, suppose, for the sake of the argument, we adopt the view of the friends of this Lecompton convention. What then? Gentlemen tell us that there are many precedents where States have been admitted without referring the constitution framed by the convention to the sanction of the people. Granted; but, sir, I call upon them, one and all, to point to a precedent in this Government where a State was forced into the Union against its will; where a constitution was ever forced upon the people of a State against the protest of a majority of that people. And yet that is precisely what is sought to be done in this case. Those who claim that the convention was regular cannot, will not, say that the Legislature which put this protest upon our records is not also regular. If the convention must be deemed as embodying the will of the majority of the people, are you not much more bound to say that the Legislature, also, represented and expressed the will of a majority of the people? And, sir, in the name of that majority, they protest against being brought into the Union under this constitution. Now, sir, I ask by what precedent, by what reasoning, by what right, you can do this in a Government resting upon popular will—in a Union made up by the voluntary agreement of each new member that becomes a party to it?

I would like to have gentlemen explain. I desire to be informed in relation to this new creed of Democracy, which puts minorities in power and compels majorities to submit against their legally expressed will. Sir, there is but one answer; and if it were fairly given, it would be simply that slavery, in its determined spirit of propagandism, defers to majorities when to its purpose, and overrides and disregards them when they conflict with its interests; heeds the will of majorities as it keeps compromises and compacts, and that is just so long as it is for its interest, and no longer. These are harsh and unpleasant truths, sir; but truths nevertheless—truths which I take no pleasure in uttering, yet established so that neither I nor you can change or falsify the record if we would.

You say, with the President, that the country wants peace, and a stop to this excitement. So say we; but we want a peace founded upon justice, and none other could be obtained if we desired it. If you really desire such a peace, abide by your compacts, and we will abide by ours; abide by the principle of "popular sovereignty," which you have established, whether it works against you or for you, and not make complaints and threats at its results. We protested, as I have said, against the introduction of that principle into the Territories. But, sir, while it remains, we shall adapt ourselves to it, contest every inch of territory, and beat you in every one if we can.

You complain that we did all that we could to induce the emigration of those in favor of free principles into Kansas. We did so. We intend to do so in every one of the remaining Territories. We had and have the right so to do. You did the same thing in the same way in relation to emigration from your section of the country, and you are preparing to do it in relation to Arizona and the other Territories. It is your right; and we have not complained, and shall not, on our part, that you had not the right so to do. I repeat, sir, that this new way of settling the "domestic institutions" of the Territories is a spirit which you called up from the political depths to serve your purpose; and if it will not "down at your bidding," surely, complaint does not come from you with a good grace. It is true, we have more people to spare in the settlement of the Territories than you, and their position gives them greater facilities for emigration; but you knew that fact before you broke up the division line between us. You submitted the question as to what share slavery should have in the Territories to the popular will; and if that popular will decides that you shall have none, where is the wrong or injustice in asking you to abide the arbitrament of your choice?

Some gentlemen tell us that slavery is a God-ordained institution, justified by the Holy Scriptures—the type of the highest civilization known; and that if we do not desist from our opposition to its spreading, the South intends to invade us with the sword in one hand, and a Bible in the other. Now, sir, I beg gentlemen of that section not to take offense at my interference in their preparation for this mighty onslaught, if I suggest to them that it would be better to leave their Bibles at home. We have a good many of those North now; and besides, sir, in such a district as that represented by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARRELL,] where he says there are fifteen thousand freemen—and I add, that to make up a congressional representation there must necessarily be about one hundred thousand slaves—it would be wise to leave your Bibles for the slaves, that they may read them and be kept quiet by the knowledge that it is God's will that they should occupy their present position. After mustering the army necessary to compete with the one hundred thousand freemen of my district, (if the gentleman will allow me to offset one district against the other,) I do not see what else he could leave to keep them quiet. Mr. Chairman, it may be that gentlemen are serious in these threats of war and dissolution of the Union; but they have been so often repeated in Congress and have so often failed of fulfillment, that we must be excused if we do not at this time give to them that attention which their importance demands.

We were told the other day by the honorable member from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] that "any State of this Union had a right to secede at pleasure." Without stopping to comment upon that position, the gentleman will pardon me if I inquire of him if he expects there will be a peaceable dismemberment of a Government like this? Does he believe that if we were, by common consent, to make the effort, we could separate our entangled interests so as to satisfy both parties?

But what, I ask, do gentlemen propose to gain by dissolution—supposing it could be peacefully accomplished? You have, by the compromise of 1854, got the right to all the territory in common with us. A portion of this you would certainly lose. We now, in great part, support your mail service; that we should no longer do. We guard your frontier; that we should no longer do. We pay a very disproportionate part of the cost of the Government; you, alike with us, would be left to pay your own. We hold your millions of slaves in subjection to you; a service which we shall not regret to be absolved from. We return the fugitive, which escapes, to your service, except an occasional one who prefers death to your higher civilization; and we not only return them, but we pay the expense of our own dishonor in this respect. Now, sir, it is very clear that, in a division, this business will be handed over to you. We shall neither perform it ourselves, nor allow you to do it for your slaves upon our side of the line. And you surely do not expect to lessen our objections to human bondage by absolving us from all obligations to respect it as a system, and from even indirectly yielding it support.

I tell the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] and I tell honorable members who threaten disunion, that there will be no peaceable dismemberment of this Government, even if we endeavored so to have it; and the gentleman's colleague well said that, if disunion ever comes, it will not begin in Congress. It will begin as other revolutions have begun—among the people. It will begin only when the conviction is forced upon the minds of the people that the Government, in its corruption, has left them no hope of peaceable means of redress. It will not be hastily begun, nor even by the ordinary causes of popular outbreaks in other Governments. We are a law-loving, law-abiding people, North and South. I speak now, sir, of the people—the masses—and not of ambitious political leaders. Were it not so, we should now be deciding this question upon the battle-field.

But, sir, there is a point in this matter which it will be fatal to pass; a point upon which trembles the lives of millions of men. Should we ever unsheath the sword of civil strife, it will be no common feud. We are children of the same family, actuated by the same courage, as has been proved upon many a battle-field, feeling the same unyielding determination to stand by our rights, or fall in their defense. Sir, I believe that the page on which is recorded the history of that struggle (should it ever come) will be the reddest page which God has ever permitted to be written upon this earth. I hope, I pray, it may never come. But, sir, I may add, should it come, we of the North are not responsible for it; we have tried to keep peace; we have made sacrifices to this end which few people ever made. And we will not be responsible for its results. If you begin a revolution to spread slavery, you should not complain if, like all other revolutions, it breaks the fetters of the slave, and lets up the oppressed. If you begin the war, and find in its results that your millions of slaves, hardly now held to subjection, shall rise up and enact upon you, your wives and children, the awful atrocities of British India, charge us not with the fault. We want peace, not war; union, not discord; brotherly feeling, not hatred. And we can have these only upon the terms of justice and fair dealing. Sir, as dearly as we prize these blessings, and great as are the sacrifices which we have made, and are willing to make, to obtain them, for one, I say—and I have well considered the words—rather than see a continuance of the wrongs and outrages, the frauds and villainies which have been connived at and sustained by this Government in this matter of Kansas, I would prefer to see an end of the Government, and abide the result.

Mr. Chairman, the people of the North are not "negro worshippers," as they have been termed on this floor. Nor are they Abolitionists. As I have already said, they dislike your institution, and believe it to be wrong in the sight of God, and unworthy of the civilization of our age and country. They would gladly assist—not force—you to abolish it where it now exists. But the great objection with the masses of the North, and one which will ultimately unite them in the same manner to oppose its progress that the South is united to spread it, is the effect of this institution upon the growth and prosperity of the people—is its bearing as a question of political economy. These effects are no longer matter of doubt or speculation. Gentlemen may talk about the value of their annual product of cotton and sugar; what do such facts weigh against the comparison of States side by side—in wealth, in population, in schools, in general intelligence, in all the comforts and blessings of life? Weigh Virginia against Pennsylvania, Kentucky against Ohio, and the slave States which have been admitted since the formation of the Government, against the free States admitted within the same time, and answer the question for yourselves. There is no chance for mistake here; for in soil, in climate, in everything, you had the advantage; and yet with all these, how far you have fallen behind! I do not deny but that your system gives, in individual instances, the very highest opportunity for improvement. The individual who reaps the unpaid toil of others, may have, and will have, leisure and means for cultivation beyond that of him who toils for his support. But, sir, we hold that governments were made for the good of all, and that one the best which consults the interest and happiness of all. In striving to keep the Territories free, we seek not only the interests of the people of Kansas, but of free labor every where.

I know that we are told by the honorable Senator from South Carolina, [Mr. HAMMOND,] that labor is servile, and laborers everywhere slaves. To make sure that I do him no injustice, I quote what the honorable Senator said on that point:

"In all social systems there must be a class to do the mean duties, to perform the drudgery of life. That is, a class requiring but a low order of intellect and but little skill—its requisites are vigor, docility, fidelity. Such a class you must have, or you would not have that other class which leads progress, refinement, and civilization. It constitutes the very mud-sills of society and of political government; and you might as well attempt to build a house in the air, as to build either the one or the other, except on the mud-sills. Fortunately for the South, she found a race adapted to that purpose to her hand. A race inferior to herself, but eminently qualified in temper, in vigor, in docility, in capacity to stand the climate, to answer all her purposes. We use them for the purpose, and call them slaves. We are old-fashioned at the South yet; it is a word discarded now by ears polite; but I will not characterize that class at the North with that term, but you have it; it is there; it is everywhere; it is eternal.

"The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; and all the powers of the earth cannot abolish it. God only can do it when he repeals the fiat, 'the poor always have with you'; for the man who lives by daily labor, who scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market, and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole class of manual laborers and operatives, as you call them, are slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most deplorable manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns. Why, sir, you meet more beggars in one day, in any single street of the city of New York, than you would meet in a lifetime in the whole South. Our slaves are black, of another, inferior race. The status in which we have placed them is an elevation. They are elevated from the condition in which God first created them, by being made our slaves. None of that race on the whole face of the globe can be compared with the slaves of the South, and they know it. They are happy, contented, unassuming, and utterly incapable, from intellectual degradation, ever to give us any trouble by their aspirations.

"Our slaves are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with bayonets, and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your government reconstructed, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearthstones. How would you like for us to send lecturers or agitators North, to teach these people this, to aid and assist in combining, and to lead them?"

Sir, I tell you, and I tell the honorable Senator, that the very thing which he holds up to frighten us—viz: that those who labor will yet rule us—is what we have already accomplished; and therein lies the difference of our system of labor and that of the gentleman's section. With him, power in the hands of the laborer is his greatest dread; with us, it is our highest boast. In his section, the "mud-sills of society" are slaves, who would use power if they had it, to repay long years of wrong and degradation; with us, the "mud-sills," the laboring men, are in power already, and using it, not to avenge injuries, but to perpetuate and increase blessings which are common to all. Labor, instead of being a stigma, is the proudest dignity which we know. With us, those only are dishonored who are the drones of society, and refuse to labor. Our laboring men, our "mud-sills," are representing themselves; the gentleman can meet them in the Senate, or here upon the floor of this Hall; and however much he may disallow their claims, they will here, and everywhere, insist that they are the peers of all those who represent his system of labor.

The honorable gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. CRAWFORD,] who, I think, has made up the strongest case upon the Lecompton side, indulged in a course of remarks calculated to convey the impression that all the wrongs and outrages which had been perpetrated in Kansas were by the free-State men. From the high character which the gentleman sustains, I was prepared to hear from him a different statement, and I was not a little surprised when the gentleman dwelt so long and so pointedly upon our northern "Emigrant Aid Society," and the combinations by northern men in Kansas, that he omitted, possibly forgot, to mention southern "emigrant aid societies" and "blue lodges," as connected with this Kansas history.

Sir, I do not intend to go over the history of these wrongs. The people of my section know them all, and those of your section would never see the evidence were I to collect it. It has already been many times done more perfectly than I could do it, and presented in a way no hour speech can present it. But I have just received a letter from a distinguished citizen until within a few months a resident of my district, and now a resident of Kansas, which, from his high standing and from long years of untiring, unfaltering support to whatever has been called "democratic," will entitle it to credit in my district, if nowhere else. He, for years, shared the toil and the triumphs of that party; he was the supporter of Mr. Pierce and Mr. Buchanan, and he left his old home for the West with feelings toward the "Black Republicans" similar to those taken to Kansas by Reeder, Geary, Walker, and Stanton, and you will see by his letter that his conversion has been not less perfect than theirs:

LEAVENWORTH CITY, February 23, 1858.

DEAR SIR: You may not know that I have been a resident of this place since May last. Supposing that the political storm which raged here with such fury had passed away, I came here with my family, together with Mr. Brown, (who married my youngest daughter,) with the intention of making this my future home. The end, however, it seems, is not yet. No man out of the Territory can form any just idea of the enormity of the wrongs to which the free-State people have been subjected. Very little reliance can be placed on the public press. To know the facts, a person must live here. The free-State people outnumber the rest of our population in the proportion of five to one; and yet, through the atrocious frauds committed on the ballot-box, we are never sure of securing our rights. By this time you will have seen something of this in the testimony taken by a committee, &c. We care nothing for what may be done by our opponents, if the ballot box can be secretly secured to us. Until that right is secured, we are at the mercy of the most unscrupulous gang of marauders that Heaven ever suffered to live.

You know I have always voted the Democratic ticket—one of the Hard-Shells of New York; but if the treatment we receive at the hands of Government be Democracy, I am no longer one of them; and, from my inmost soul, bid you and your Republican brethren God speed in any and all honorable means to hedge up their way in all attempts to violate the great principle on which the Kansas-Nebraska bill is based.

This is a fine country; and, when peace is restored, and the right shall prevail, will rapidly fill up, and ultimately become a first-class State.

I shall be happy to hear from you, from time to time, at your leisure.

With much respect, I am, dear sir, yours,
JAMES TAYLOR.

Hon. E. B. POTTER.

Mr. Chairman, I have but few words to add in conclusion. I will only repeat, I desire peace; I desire that the present excitement shall pass away and give place to that brotherly feeling which ought to exist between those of the same nation, of the same blood, and speaking the same language. War and strife is ever hateful, and doubly so when waged by members of a common family against each other. But, as I said, there will be no peace except it be founded in justice—fraud and violence never yet produced peace, and never will. They are ever the harbingers of strife and of war; and so will they prove if a continuance of them is persisted in. The people of Kansas have patiently waited and borne wrongs which would have shaken any monarch in Europe from his throne. They have waited in hopes that finally they would be allowed the peaceful constitutional remedy of the ballot-box, and thus put a stop to their oppressions. Compel them into the Union under this constitution and take from them that hope, and they will wait no longer. They will resist, I doubt not; and I think they will not be left to resist alone and unaided. The cause of constitutional right is the cause of millions who never saw Kansas.

The honorable member from Georgia already referred to, told us the other day that "the North in this Kansas matter had fought with a steadiness and zeal worthy of a better cause." Sir, I tell the gentleman, and all who seek to fasten this great wrong upon the people of Kansas, that, should they succeed, they will see a zeal and steadiness upon the part of the North hitherto unknown. They will yet come to realize that our "fanaticism" has already reached that point where we recognize no better, no holier cause than that of human liberty—no higher duty than opposition to fraud and oppression. They will come to know that, however we differ as to whether any more slave States shall, under any circumstances, be admitted into the Union, there is one point upon which we agree, and that is, that slavery will not be allowed to add new States by fraud or by violence without meeting our determined, unfaltering, resistance; and from this position we cannot be driven by any threat of danger to the Union.

Mr. ABBOTT obtained the floor.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. Will the gentleman yield to me a few minutes of his time?

Mr. ABBOTT. I dislike to appear discourteous, but I have been trying to get the floor for some time, and I prefer to go on.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will yield to me, and that the time I shall occupy will not be taken out of his time.

Mr. ABBOTT. I have no objection to yielding to the gentleman if the Chair decides that it shall not come out of my time.

Mr. FLORENCE. If there is a general understanding that no business shall be done, I can see no objection to the committee sitting on as long as gentlemen wish to speak. There was such an understanding on Saturday night, and I trust that understanding will be considered as applying to this evening, so that gentlemen need not remain here if they do not desire it.

Mr. ABBOTT. I yield, then, to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. The gentleman from Connecticut, [Mr. BISHOP,] in his address to the House to-day, thought it necessary to travel out of the record to assail the character of Illinois. He left, or he undertook to leave, the impression upon the minds of members of the House, and of the country, that that State was unfaithful to her obligations. I sought the floor earnestly, the moment he resumed his seat, but was unable to secure it. I said, however, while I was up, and I repeat now, that the assertion of the gentleman is a base slander upon Illinois, and I hurl it back with indignation as such. Sir, she is not unfaithful to her engagements, nor does she refuse to pay the interest upon her public debt. Her character stands as fair as that of any other State in this Union, and it is unjust that she should be assailed, nor will I allow it to be done with impunity. She has not only been faithful to her pecuniary obligations; not only has she maintained her character at home and abroad in this respect, but she has been faithful to her political obligations. Never has she voted for any other than the Democratic candidates for President and Vice President; and it comes with an ill grace and in an ill time, for the gentleman from Connecticut thus to attack her. Can he say as much for the State from which he comes? Sir, the instances of her support of Democratic men and Democratic measures have been "like angels' visits, few and far between." Illinois has never faltered in her course. She gave her electoral vote for James Buchanan; can the gentleman say as much for Connecticut? Does the gentleman from Connecticut come here to assail the character of Illinois, when he represents a State which has resting upon it the disgrace of a Hartford convention, and the blue lights set out upon the shore of New London to indicate aid and assistance to the enemy? A State which enacted the code of blue laws? I seek not to assail the character of Connecticut; but, if the gentleman wants a parallel drawn between the character and standing of his State and mine, I am ready to meet the issue.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman will yield to me, for a few minutes, I simply want to say to him and to the committee, that the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. BISHOP] is not here. He has been called home by an affliction in his family. I do not wish to interrupt the gentleman or call him to order, but I merely make the suggestion for his information. I thought, perhaps, the gentleman did not know of his absence.

Mr. MORGAN. The gentleman from Connecticut fired a shot, and then ran away.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I presume the gentleman from Pennsylvania has accomplished his purpose in announcing that the gentleman from Connecticut is not here, by asking whether I knew it. I tell the gentleman that I did know it, or, at least, that I supposed such to be the case; but the gentleman and the committee will bear me witness when I say, that I endeavored to get the floor as soon as he was done speaking, and I appealed to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. POTTER,] who obtained it, to allow me a few moments of his time to reply to the gentleman from Connecticut when he was still in the House to hear me; and, while he was still standing here, I did all I was allowed time to do—brand his assault upon Illinois as a foul slander. I have no great fears of the gentleman from Connecticut. This is not the place where we should stand in intimidation of each other. It is a place where the language of truth should be spoken and the character of history vindicated.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the gentleman will allow me a word of explanation, I shall be obliged to him. I desire to say to him, and to this committee, that I had no other desire and no other purpose in interrupting the gentleman than to inform him, supposing, perhaps, that he was not aware of it, that the gentleman from Connecticut was absent. I desire to make no defense of the gentleman from Connecticut, or any other gentleman, and I do not think it is quite fair that the gentleman should take my conscience into his keeping.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. That is two or three times the gentleman has communicated that information to the committee, and I think by this time we understand it. I think, at least, it will not be necessary for him to announce it again.

But, sir, I desire not to detain the committee, but for a moment to vindicate the character of my State; a State, sir, for which I ask no favors. She speaks for herself, Mr. Chairman, and occupies a proud position, pecuniarily, socially, and politically. She has spoken for herself upon our battlefields, and will soon speak here in a manner to be felt; for after the next census she will be equal, on this floor, in power, with the State from which the gentleman comes.

Mr. FLORENCE. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I am glad the gentleman from Pennsylvania has no jealousy, and I only wish the gentleman from Connecticut had been equally as considerate, and refrained from his aspersions. They were unnecessary, and in using them he went out of the legitimate line of remark and argument. But the gentleman did use them, and thought proper to assail Illinois without the slightest provocation. Whether for that, or for his defense of the Lecompton constitution, or his attack on the Dred Scott decision, or for some other cause, gentlemen from the South clustered round, congratulated, and shook him heartily by the hand, I do not know. Perhaps it was for the lecture he gave them for making what he was pleased to denominate imprudent speeches upon this floor, and the imploring manner in which he besought them to cease placing the poor white man of the North and the negro of the South on an equality. I did not think it was from the argument, for it was difficult to tell upon which side he was speaking, or who was hit. Gentlemen from the South had not much certainly to congratulate themselves upon. If they can stand the speech, we certainly can. I was considerably amused when the distinguished gentleman from Virginia, who spoke before him, took the position that the constitution of Kansas could not be altered by the Legislature, or by the people until 1864, to find the gentleman from Connecticut, sleeping in the same Lecompton bed with him, say not only that the constitution may be changed by the people, but the Legislature itself may abolish slavery by a mere legislative act at any time it pleases. Will southern gentlemen go with the gentleman from Connecticut in favor of that doctrine? I apprehend that no southern gentleman on this floor will subscribe to it; so that I repeat that I do not see much in the speech of the gentleman that they can find to congratulate themselves upon. The gentleman seems to have fired at the whole world, and missed it, too, at that.

But, sir, I will not attempt, nor was it my purpose in rising, to follow the course of the gentleman's remarks. He took the position here, as others have done, that Kansas should be admitted under the Lecompton constitution. Without noticing his assumption or following his argument, I will only express my surprise that Connecticut, which has voted so rarely with the Democratic party, and so seldom given her allegiance to Democratic principles, of all the New England States, should be found upon this floor advocating, through her Representatives, the doctrine, not of freedom, but of the extension of slavery, by a system of the most damning frauds that ever disgraced the country. I do not undertake to account for it. It is a matter of astonishment to me, and doubtless will be to others, that she should be found thus acting. The country may account for it. I do not undertake to say for her whether she is right or wrong—I am only surprised to find her where she is. I will not undertake to interfere between the gentleman and his constituents: that I will never do with any gentleman. But, I repeat, it is a matter of astonishment to me that Connecticut is the only State in New England in favor of receiving Kansas under the Lecompton fraud. The assumed legality of that instrument, upon which the gentleman planted himself, I would not care the snap of my finger for, if I thought I was acting in violation of the public will, and I am astonished he should. Like all others who preceded him, he ignored that, and rested himself upon the merest technicality. There is the ground-work of his argument; it is the only basis upon which he stands.

I regret, sir, the necessity for these remarks. I would have preferred that the gentleman from Connecticut should have been present when I made them. I tried to make them in his hearing, but I failed to get the floor, and I did not want this day to pass without submitting them. Hence I availed myself of this, the first favorable opportunity to do so.

I hope that hereafter the character of the States will not be dragged into this controversy. I hope, if the gentleman deems it proper to assail the Representatives of Illinois, that he will, at least, spare that gallant State. She deserves no anathemas at his hands. I wish he were here, so that I might interrogate him, as I should like to ask him when and where Illinois has acted dishonorably? I am sure Connecticut cannot boast of anything over Illinois. It is true that she has a magnificent school fund, but she obtained that, amounting to about a million and a quarter of dollars, from the public domain which she held on to with a deathless grasp; while Virginia, God bless her memory, for I love her! magnanimously surrendered her lands to the General Government. Why, sir, Illinois could buy Connecticut, without feeling her treasury had been depleted, for a cow pasture. But I see the gentleman, who so kindly gave me a few moments of his time, thinks I have occupied enough of it, and is desirous of proceeding. I will not, therefore, trespass further upon his patience, or that of the committee. The present proud position of Illinois is the best vindicator of her character, and I leave her reputation where it will be safe—in the hands of impartial history.

Mr. ABBOTT. Mr. Chairman, the Constitution of the United States makes it the duty of the President to communicate to Congress, from time to time, information of the state of the Union, and I need not add that the information contemplated by the Constitution is truthful, reliable information—such information as Congress would be justified in acting upon. Information of an opposite character, known to be such, is not only an insult to Congress and the American people, but it is the highest evidence of executive corruption or of executive servility to a corrupt power behind the Executive himself. I propose, in what remarks I make, to call the attention of the committee to the character of the information communicated to Congress in the President's late Lecompton message. I regard that message as the most singular document that ever emanated from an American President, or even from an American political partisan—singular for its weakness and its folly, singular for the multiplicity of its false statements, singular for its wanton perversion of history, and singular for the absurdity of its conclusions.

In that message the President has seen fit to fully sanction and approbate all the frauds, all the illegal acts, all the violences and usurpations which have been practiced by the pro-slavery party in Kansas since its organization to the present time. On the contrary he has unqualifiedly denounced the free-State men as rebels and traitors. When the President wrote that message, and thus characterized the free-State men of Kansas as rebels and traitors, he must have known that charge was made without any foundation in truth. He knew that all the troubles in Kansas, or nearly all of them, sprung legitimately from his own acts, the acts of Franklin Pierce, and the acts of the Democratic party, who faithlessly repealed the Missouri compromise, and thereby made Kansas a battle-field between freedom and slavery? Who invited and supported the border-ruffian invasion of that fertile Territory? Who sustained and enforced the laws enacted by legislators, elected by that band of foreign usurpers? Who decapitated Reeder, Geary, Stanton, and Walker, because they faltered in the execution of the infamous work assigned them? Who have violated their faith and honor relative to protecting the people of Kansas in the right to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way? Who are now about to force the Lecompton constitution, that fraudulent child of a factious minority, on Kansas against the solemn protest of four fifths of its people? Who have shielded the men who have committed the numerous crimes which have been recorded in the Territory of Kansas? Who, I ask, are the guilty authors of all these unheard of atrocities? who but the President, and the party whose true exponent he is? Let us, the present guardians of popular rights in this country, examine the President's indictment against the free-State men of Kansas, and see who are the disturbers of the public peace, who the traitors to our country and its free institutions? Whether they are the accused or the accusers?

In 1820, jealousies sprang up between the North and the South, relative to the slavery question. The statesmen of that day, in good faith, for the purpose of restoring peace to the country, adopted the Missouri compromise. The people approved of the act, lived under it for a third of a century, and never, from any section of the country, sent up a petition to Congress for its repeal.

In 1850, another slavery excitement arose, and the leading statesmen of that day, of all shades of politics, united in allaying it by another set of compromises, some of which were extremely obnoxious to the free sentiments of the country; but, for the sake of peace, all sections of the country and all parties finally acquiesced in them, and agreed that they should be a finality upon the slavery agitation. The great Whig party, now dead, and the great Democratic party, now dying, each inserted in their political platforms, "no more slavery agitation, either in Congress or out of it."

Franklin Pierce, in his inaugural address, reasserted and reaffirmed the same wise and patriotic doctrine—"no more slavery agitation." Yet in less than two years afterwards, when the country was in a state of profound quiet, he employed the whole power and patronage of the Federal Government in aid of the Democratic party to repeal the Missouri compromise—an act preëminently calculated to throw the whole country into a perfect rage of slavery excitement; and that, too, for no other earthly purpose than to extend and nationalize slavery. The hypocritical pretense that it was done for the purpose of abolishing an odious exception against slavery, and to give universality to the great principle of popular sovereignty, has long since ceased to deceive any one. The acts of the pro-slavery party since its repeal, if there was any doubt before, have fully demonstrated the purpose for which it was done. Popular sovereignty! The Missouri restriction repealed for the purpose of extending its principles! What is popular sovereignty? Democratic pro-slavery, Buchanan popular sovereignty? It is the free, untrammelled right, under certain villainous test-oaths, to choose between two slavery constitutions, so nearly balanced in enormity that we cannot tell which is the worst. This is popular sovereignty under the present Administration.

Now, if the Democratic party had kept its faith, stood upon its platform, and let those compromises alone, which were made by patriots for patriotic purposes, should we have had any troubles in Kansas? would armed invaders have been sent there from Missouri to rob the people of their rights? would Beauford and his three hundred villainous followers have gone from Alabama to harass and drive out the free-State men by robbery, murder, rape, and every other conceivable crime? and if they had, would they have been sustained by the Federal Army, and favored by the National Administration with office as a reward for their infamy? No. If the Democratic party had kept its faith, let the Missouri compromise alone, we should now have been in harmony with ourselves; Kansas would have been quiet, free, and happy; the public business would have progressed without interruption, and the great interests of the country would be cared for, and the national credit, the national honor, and the national morality, too, would be sustained.

I do not say that the Missouri compromise was unrepeatable. No; for I hold that no law, no constitution is unrepeatable, because of an ever-present, existing sovereignty in the people. But I do say, that with the knowledge that it was a peace compromise between the antagonism of freedom and slavery, no hand but a ruthless hand would have touched it; no demagogue but a demagogue seeking power or place, without regard to means or consequences, would have sought to abrogate it. I desire here to ask southern gentlemen one question: if the Missouri compromise had provided that freedom should not go south of 36° 30', and the North having the power, with the aid of a few dough-faces from the South, had repealed that old peace compact, and had made use of the same fraudulent means to force freedom south of that line that you have to force slavery north of it, would you have submitted to it? No, gentlemen, you would have boiled over with righteous indignation; you would have accused us of a breach of faith; of treachery towards the South; of hostility to the Union; you would have called us sectionalists, traitors, knaves; and the rebuke would have been just and merited; and every honest man in the country would have said that we received no more than our due.

The President, in his last annual message, admits the fact that the Lecompton constitution, with what is called the slavery clause stricken out, sustains slavery to the extent of all the slaves which may be in the Territory at the time of its admission into the Union, and their increase forever, which may be multiplied indefinitely by a little attention to slave breeding. I quote from his message:

"Should the constitution without slavery be adopted by the votes of the majority, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved; and such is the constitution itself."

He admits also, in that message, that the faith and the honor of the Democratic party were publicly pledged in the last presidential canvass that the question of slavery should be submitted to the decision of the people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever; and that, without such pledge, he would not have been elected. The following is his own language:

"The friends and supporters of the Nebraska and Kansas act, when struggling, on a recent occasion, to sustain its wise provisions before the great tribunal of the American people, never disavowed about its true meaning on this subject. Everywhere throughout the Union they publicly pledged their faith and their honor that they would cheerfully submit the question of slavery to the decision of the bona fide people of Kansas, without any restriction or qualification whatever. All were cordially united upon the great doctrine of popular sovereignty, which is the vital principle of our free institutions. Had it then been insinuated from any quarter that it would be a sufficient compliance with the requisitions of the organic law for the members of a convention, thereafter to be elected, to withhold the question of slavery from the people, and to substitute their own will for that of a legally ascertained majority of all their constituents, this would have been instantly rejected."

What does the President now propose to do with that plighted faith on which he received his election to the high office he now holds? Simply to violate it. What does he propose to do with that plighted honor? Simply to violate it. What does he now ask Democratic members of Congress to do with their plighted faith and honor? Simply to follow his perfidious example. Now, gentlemen, what do you mean to do? You of the North, what do you mean to do? Having publicly pledged your faith and your honor to your constituents, that if the Democratic party prevailed the people of Kansas should be left perfectly free to determine the question of slavery for themselves without any restriction or qualification whatever; having elected your President, and many of you obtained the seats you now hold by virtue of these pledges, do you mean now to basely disregard them? In the name of truth, justice, honor, everything that is sacred in human nature, do you mean by your acts to proclaim to the world that your solemn pledges were nothing but shameless false pretenses? No, gentlemen, be men; cease to be dough-faces; cease, I pray you, to cringe and bow your necks to men who despise you for your servility, who hug the treason but loathe the traitor. And let me say to southern gentlemen, cease your unhallowed crusade against freedom, against the rights of man. If you do not, and the Lecompton constitution is forced upon the people of Kansas contrary to the will and against the solemn protest of four fifths of the people of that Territory, it may lead to consequences not particularly advantageous to your peculiar institution.

Again, the President says:

"A great delusion seems to prevail in the popular mind in regard to the condition of parties in Kansas."

A great "delusion!"

Sir, there is no delusion, unless it be in the President's own brain. Never were parties better understood anywhere than they are in Kansas and in this country, at the present moment. The repeal of the Missouri compromise, the unhalloved acts of this Administration and of the pro-slavery party, in reference to the people of Kansas, have opened the eyes of men everywhere to the true condition of parties in Kansas. The two opposite and conflicting ideas of slavery and freedom are now each struggling in Kansas, and in this country, for permanent dominion; and it is perfectly apparent that we can have no peace, either in Kansas or in the country, until one of these ideas is subdued and brought into subjection to the other. They are so perfectly antagonistic that they cannot exist together in harmony. The one seeks the elevation and the freedom of man; the other seeks to bind him in fetters and chains, and to degrade him to a level with the brute creation. Heretofore compromises have been resorted to as means of reconciliation between these ideas. But experience has taught us that compromises are worse than useless. Experience has taught us that, instead of allaying the ferocity of the contest, they tend to prolong and aggravate it. For one, I never want to see another compromise between freedom and slavery; between right and wrong; between humanity and inhumanity—never! Freedom has always been the loser by them. Freedom has abided by her compacts, while slavery, whenever she has supposed it to be her interest to do so, has violated them.

Hence, I never want to see another compromise. If slavery is to be the leading and controlling idea in this country, if it is to subordinate freedom to it, let us know it. If freedom is to rule, it is quite time for us to assert her rights. On the side of slavery, in this great struggle, stand three or four hundred thousand slaveholders, supported by the Federal Army, and by every branch of the Federal Government, fully determined on victory, if any amount of fraud and violence and subterfuge and chicanery and special pleading can possibly secure it. On the part of freedom stand the great masses of the American people, North, South, East and West—more than twenty millions of free men, fully aroused to the importance of the controversy by recent events, and determined to vindicate the honor, the integrity, and the freedom of the country at all hazards. And, allow me to say, they will do it. The slavery power, having the control of the Government patronage, having every branch of the national Government under its control, may force the Lecompton constitution on the people of Kansas, contrary to their will; but neither that power nor any other earthly power will be able to put a government in operation under the Lecompton constitution in Kansas. If it should be attempted the people will resist; and, in my judgment, they ought to resist. They will never submit to have a government put in operation under a constitution which they detest and abhor, and which robs them of their most sacred rights. Already there are ten thousand men in Kansas—brave, patriotic men—who are ready to lay down their lives, if it must be so, in defense of their rights and their liberties. And there are hundreds of thousands of men, equally brave and patriotic, in the free States, if it must be so, who are ready to fly to their assistance whenever assistance may be wanted.

Sir, I am a peace man. I hate war in all its forms. I regard all collisions between man and man, State and State, nation and nation, as derogatory to the civilization of the nineteenth century. Yet I would rather see this country drenched in blood, and subjected to all the horrors of a civil war, than to see liberty dethroned for ever, and its dominion usurped by slavery. These are my sentiments.

I would say further that, notwithstanding I am fully persuaded that a government cannot be put in operation in Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, yet I venture to predict that if Kansas should be admitted under it, John Calhoun will immediately declare a pro-slavery Legislature elected, and will assemble together a few of the members in some camp or hollow square of the Federal Army, and procure himself and the man who stands next to him in infamy to be returned to the Senate of the United States. And I further predict that they will be sustained by a majority of the Senate as having been duly elected under the forms of law; and, if need be, the Supreme Court will sanction and approve it.

Again, the President says:

"It is impossible that any people could have proceeded with more regularity in the formation of a constitution, than the people of Kansas have done."

Sir, when President Buchanan penned that paragraph, he knew that the territorial government of Kansas commenced in fraud and usurpation, and was continued by fraud and usurpation down to the time of the Lecompton convention. He knew that the territorial laws of Kansas required that a census should be taken, and that a registry should be had of all the voters throughout the Territory. He knew that that duty devolved upon the territorial officers. He knew that that duty was only performed in part. He knew that the people of more than one half the counties of that Territory were wholly disfranchised. Yet the President, knowing these facts, and knowing all these irregularities in the formation of the Lecompton constitution, tells us that the proceedings were all perfectly regular. But, sir, notwithstanding the exertion of the entire executive power of the Government to consummate the fraud, I am happy to know that there is a minority—a growing minority, too—of honorable gentlemen in the South who reprobate the President's Kansas policy and the pro-slavery outrages committed under it. The treasonable wrongs of the party in power are opening the eyes of southern gentlemen to the demoralizing tendency of their peculiar institution, and leading them to contemplate with favor a higher civilization—a civilization which will elevate both the master and the slave—the slave, by restoring to him his natural and civil rights; the master, by taking from him the exercise of arbitrary and irresponsible power, which tends to warp and debase the whole moral, social, and intellectual nature of its possessor—a civilization based on the eternal principles of truth and right; just and comprehensive; regarding free labor, free schools, and free churches, as the true sources of national prosperity; recognizing the great family of man as members of a common brotherhood, entitled to equal rights and equal privileges; and not that narrow, degrading, and cowardly civilization which trembles at the idea of a common intelligence, and dooms a whole race of men to utter ignorance by penal laws.

Again, the President says:

"From this review it is manifest that the Lecompton convention, according to every principle of constitutional law, was legally constituted, and was invested with power to frame a constitution."

No territorial government has yet been organized in Kansas, according to the organic act—according to law—by the people of the Territory.

The first Legislature was chosen by an armed invasion from Missouri. The invading army marched into Kansas, armed and equipped, forcibly set aside the regular judges of election, and appointed judges of its own. The most of the free-State men were driven from the polls without voting; yet they cast 172 more votes than the pro-slavery residents of Kansas.

The whole pro-slavery vote was 5,427; 4,808 of which were fraudulent. The free-State vote was 791. Deduct the fraudulent votes cast by Missourians, and the free-State men had a majority of 172; yet the 4,808 were all counted by the usurpers, and a pro-slavery Legislature declared elected, and put in operation. The Lecompton constitution is a lineal descendant of that fraudulent Legislature. Still Buchanan tells us that, according to every principle of constitutional law, it was legally constituted. Thus a stupendous fraud is made the basis of constitutional law, a rule of action; for every act of the territorial government of Kansas, from its organization to the Lecompton convention, has been either the child or the grandchild of the original fraud, and equally fraudulent with its paternity.

The most villainous usurpations of the pro-slavery men are legal and constitutional in the eyes of the President. Robbery is genuine honesty; treason is patriotism; rapes and murders are proofs of devotion to law and order. What a mockery! I sometimes think that we belittle and disgrace ourselves in attempting to argue with men so lost to truth and justice.

Again, the President says:

"The Kansas convention, thus lawfully constituted, proceeded to frame a constitution; and having completed their work, finally adjourned to the 7th day of November last. They did not think proper to submit the whole of this constitution to a popular vote; but they did submit the question whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State to the people."

Sir, they did not submit the question whether Kansas shall be a free or a slave State to the people. They only allowed the people to choose between two slavery constitutions—to determine whether they should raise, or import and raise, their slaves. The President, in another part of his message, says:

"Kansas is, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina."

In his annual message, he says:

"Slavery exists in Kansas, under the Lecompton constitution, with the slavery clause stricken out, to the extent of all the slaves then in the Territory."

Hence, according to the two messages, Kansas, with the constitution with no slavery, would have been as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Terrible are the exactions of slavery when it requires the President of the United States to communicate to Congress such a tissue of misinformation.

But the President not only gives to Congress misinformation relative to facts, but he misquotes the law—misquotes from the Kansas-Nebraska act for the purpose of consummating the Kansas usurpation, adding to the text the words "in framing their constitution," which changes the entire sense of the quotation, and without which his whole argument becomes supremely ridiculous. A pettifogger, in a justice court, who should thus fraudulently misquote the law, would be stricken from the rolls of the court as unworthy to practice before it; yet, as an act of the President of the United States, in the great Lecompton swindle, it is not regarded as out of the regular and ordinary course of procedure. Wherefore these gross Executive wrongs? Is the President beside himself, or is he a slave himself to relentless masters who care not whether he acquires an immortality of infamy, provided their ends are answered?

But we are told that freedom in Kansas must yield to the necessity of keeping up an equilibrium of power between the free and slave States. An equilibrium of power! Suppose one or more States of the Union should legalize polygamy, Mohammedanism, larceny, or highway robbery, either of which is less offensive and less criminal than slavery—must the Territories, in the formation of new States, be parceled out so as to give the States thus legalizing such a wrong an equal share of the public domain, on which to extend and perpetuate their peculiar iniquity? Are such the terms of our copartnership? Such the bonds which hold together these United States in one glorious Union? We are told, also, that the will of the people must bow to the forms of law. Forms of law! Are they above the substance of things—higher than truth and justice? Is Congress to rob the people of a new State of their inalienable rights, under the wicked pretense that it is complying with the forms of law? Forms are no protection to fraud, even in our technical courts of law. It is a legal maxim, recognized everywhere but in the present Government of the United States, that fraud vitiates all proceedings, and that forms and records interpose no bar to the discovery of it. The world, in past ages, has been the great theater of wrongs committed under legal sanctions. Open the book of history, and there read the soiled and blackened records of unnumbered crimes perpetrated under the forms of law. Socrates was compelled to drink the poisonous hemlock under the forms of law. Jeffreys committed his numerous judicial murders under the forms of law. The Spanish Inquisition executed its hellish purposes under the forms of law. George the Third sent his hireling army to this country, to force obedience to his oppressive and tyrannical will, under the forms of law. The blood of our Savior was shed through the forms of law. And now, in the nineteenth century, an American President and an American Congress are about to rob a portion of the American people of their liberties, through the miserable pretense that they are doing it under the forms of law.

Again, the President says:

"It has been solemnly adjudged by the highest tribunal known to our law, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States."

Sir, it has not been solemnly adjudged that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. The Supreme Court, in the Dred Scott case, assumed to decide that fact; it assumed to decide that the Missouri compromise was unconstitutional; it assumed to decide that slaves are recognized as property by the Constitution of the United States; it assumed to decide, also, that negroes have no rights that white men are bound to respect—an assumption which is false and absurd if it had been applied to our horses and our oxen, for they even have rights which men are bound to respect by the laws of every civilized and humane community.

But, sir, these opinions, or these assumptions, of the Supreme Court were given extra-judicially. They were given after the court had determined that it had no jurisdiction in the case, after it had determined that it had no case before it upon which to found any further judicial decision. The doctrine that slaves are property by the Constitution of the United States, I hold to be utterly false, utterly subversive of the fundamental principles of our Government, and utterly destructive of the best interests of our country. If established, it will nationalize slavery, and denationalize freedom. Freedom and slavery cannot both be national, for the reason that they are direct antagonisms, and cannot coexist at the same time under the same Government. Monstrous as this doctrine is in a Republic called free, the means employed in the attempt to fasten it upon this country are equally iniquitous. So long as the official acts of public men are susceptible of a favorable construction, so long should their names be mentioned with respect; but when they prostitute themselves, and the influence of their high positions, to base purposes, to the betrayal of sacred popular rights, they then become objects of scorn and contempt; and the higher the office, the more severe and pointed should be the rebuke.

President Buchanan by his Kansas policy has acquired a reputation which will forever associate his name with oppression and villainy. And the Supreme Court of the United States, in giving its opinion in the Dred Scott case, descended from the high and honorable position it has heretofore occupied, and lent its influence to extend and nationalize slavery. It has put forth a document, I will not call it a decision, which for weakness in moral, mental, and legal qualities, has no parallel in the history of judicial proceedings in this or any other country. The opinions promulgated in that document all history pronounce false; all law, simply ridiculous. Some persons affect to regard that document as a judicial decision; lawyers regard it as extra-judicial nonsense, for they know the absurdity of its doctrines, and they know that when the court had decided that Dred Scott, being a negro, could not be a citizen of Missouri, it had exhausted all its judicial power in that case. Having decided that, it ceased to have any case before it upon which to base any further judicial decision. Hence the opinions of the court therein expressed are not only false, but they are extra-judicial usurpations, entitled to no more respect than the opinions of any other equal number of political demagogues of similar abilities and similar morals with themselves.

Slave property! human beings made property by our glorious Constitution! Shame on the men who sustain such a doctrine! God forbid that such an idea should ever be received in this free Republic of ours! Where is it to be found? In what clause, in what provision of the Constitution? It is not in the Constitution. It is to be found nowhere but in the Dred Scott decision and in the President's messages. If a man is to be deprived of himself, his wife, and his children, souls and bodies, by a paper constitution, I am inclined to think the intent to do it should be expressed, and not left to vague and strained implication.

But there is no provision of the Constitution from which such an implication can possibly be derived. The Supreme Court assumes to derive it from that clause which provides for the return of fugitives from service or labor; but it is not there. That provision of the Constitution simply recognizes the great doctrine of State rights—State impunity, if you please, to do wrong—in regard to local matters; to hold property in man by State laws, and to reclaim it if it escapes into a sister State. If the infamous doctrine that slavery is national be true, then, I repeat, there is no such thing as a free State in this Union; and there never can be; for, if slaves are property by the Constitution of the United States, then the slaveholder may take his slaves into any State of the Union, and there enjoy their services; hold them as property, and their increase, for a day, a year, or forever, in spite of any State law to the contrary; because all State laws which conflict with the Constitution of the United States are nugatory.

Hence the irresistible and logical deduction to be drawn from the Dred Scott decision, and from the President's message, is, that slavery is national, and freedom has no existence in this country.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I wish to ask the gentleman if, before the Constitution was adopted, and when all the States had slavery in them, was there no liberty?

Mr. ABBOTT. There might have been the liberty of individuals, but with the doctrine now contended for, there would have been no national freedom. I say that the two institutions of slavery and freedom are antagonisms; and there is no such thing as the national existence of both, for the reason that they are as much opposite to each other as light and darkness, heat and cold, and the existence of one necessarily excludes the other. Hence, if slaves are property by the Constitution, freedom has not even a sectional existence in this country. But the whole spirit of the Constitution is against the nationality of slavery, against the idea of property in man. The preamble of the Constitution declares its adoption by the people of the United States to have been to "establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty." Is there any justice in slavery, in human robbery? Does it promote domestic tranquillity or the general welfare—does it secure the blessings of liberty? If any man thinks it does, let him go and sell himself to the slave-driver, and there, driven by the side of other domestic animals, with the lash over his back, and the degradation of his wife and his daughters before his eyes, enjoy the blessings of liberty to his heart's content. I will not prevent him.

But if there were any doubt about this matter an argument might be drawn against the Dred Scott decision and the President's message from the historic character and aspirations of the founders of our Government. They evidently designed to form a free Republic, and not a slave oligarchy. Did the pioneers of America leave their homes, flee from tyranny and oppression in the Old World and seek an asylum in the New for the purpose of establishing and perpetuating a system of human bondage tenfold worse than that from which they fled? No, they all loved liberty and hated oppression. Did Jefferson indite the Declaration of Independence, which declares that "all men are created free and equal, endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, among which are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," for any such unholy purpose? No, he wrote and labored for the final extinction of this accursed system in this country. Did Hancock and Adams sign that immortal instrument, and pledge their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honors to sustain it for the purpose of chattelizing man? No, they looked forward with hopeful anticipation to the time when this fair land should become free—free in fact and free in deed as well as free in name. Did Washington and his band of iron heroes fight the battles of the Revolution to establish and perpetuate a system of aristocracy which makes a part of the people absolute and irresponsible masters, and the other part abject slaves, having no rights which the aristocratic class is bound to respect?

The original draft of the Constitution, in the clause which provides for the return of fugitives from service, contains the word slave. Madison moved to strike out that word, so that when slavery should be abolished in all the States future generations should not learn from the Constitution that the odious system of slavery ever existed in the country; and it was stricken out by the unanimous consent of the convention. With no word, no letter in the Constitution recognizing slavery in any form, and with such a historic fact staring them in the face, and the instincts of human nature pleading for human freedom, Buchanan and the Supreme Court have affirmed that slaves are property by the Constitution. Now, I submit, if Buchanan and the Supreme Court, when they so affirmed, did not know that the affirmation was untrue. But we are met here by the great pro-slavery argument, that God himself sanctions and approbates the system of negro slavery in this country. That argument I shall not attempt to answer. It is best answered by silence. When a member of this body so far forgets himself as to stand up in this Hall, and in the face of his constituents, in the face of the American people, and in the face of high Heaven, and proclaims that God Himself sanctions and approbates the accursed system of human slavery in this country, it is better to pass by the statement in silence. It is not for me, not for weak man, to vindicate the character of God against such a charge. God, in his own good time, if need be, will vindicate his character from such foul and infamous aspersions.

The President and members of Congress have expressed regrets that Kansas is occupying too much of the public attention. I regret it, too, as deeply and as sincerely as they do. I had always supposed slavery to be a local, a State institution, subject to State control, existing only by State laws—a mere sectional institution, having no nationality whatever. I desire to have done with it. Let it be driven back to the slave States, where it belongs, there to die out, or live, if live it must, as a just retribution to the men who foster and uphold it. Let us plant ourselves squarely on the Constitution, and construe it according to the design of its authors. Let us avoid everything calculated to alienate or estrange one section of the country from another, and secure that harmony which ought to prevail among ourselves, and which the good of the country requires. But how can it be done while such infamous doctrines and measures are being forced on the country by the dominant party? How can it be done, while such bitter sectional feelings exist as have been manifested by members on the other side of this House? The gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] in a speech in the early part of the session, remarked that he despised the members of the Republican party; and the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. SHORTER,] has spoken with still greater asperity of the character and religion of the Pilgrim fathers, and the Boston clergy. I quote from his speech:

"The Pilgrim fathers, indeed! Sir, I have a sovereign contempt for the memory of the Pilgrim fathers. The religion of Plymouth Rock is the religion of fanaticism, of intolerance, of infidelity, of bigotry, and hypocrisy. It is the religion of the Boston clergymen, who violate the seventh commandment in going to and returning from their evening lectures; and who, when exposed to the indignation of a virtuous community, are lionized and flattered by the fawning portion of their flocks! In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, the greatest calamity that ever befell our country was that event which clothed Plymouth Rock with its historic associations."

Sir, I am a Republican; a Black Republican, if you please, and I am proud of the name—proud of my party. It is the only truly national political party in the country; the only party which sustains the true principles of our Government, as enunciated and acted upon by its founders—Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and their compatriots—the only party that can possibly save this free Republic from being transformed into the most odious aristocracy that ever existed on the face of the earth. I shall not say that I despise the Democratic party, or any member of that party. My republican manners will not allow it. But I shall say that if I were a member of that party, and had made up my mind to vote to force Kansas into the Union, under the fraudulent Leecompton constitution, against the expressed will of four fifths of its people, I should loathe and abhor myself as a traitor to free institutions. I shall not say that I despise the religion of the South. No, my New England charity will not permit it. But I shall say that I do not understand how a man, who makes merchandise of his fellow-man, can be possessed of any of that Christ-like religion which requires us to do unto others as we would that they should do unto us. I cannot stop here to defend the character or the religion of the Pilgrim Fathers, or the character or the religion of the Boston clergy, against the aspersions of men who regard a community of masters and slaves, tools and despots, as the highest type of civilization. If their lives have been characterized by justice and humanity, no wonder they are slandered by men of opposite principles and feelings. If they are men of God themselves, they cannot hope to be appreciated by men who enslave God's image. If their religion is the religion of Christ, they cannot expect it will receive the approbation of men who claim property in the souls and bodies of Christ's living temples. Vice and virtue; religion and infidelity, are antagonisms, and will never harmonize or become the friends and supporters of each other.

But resolutions have been read to this body from the State of Texas, and several gentlemen on the South side of the House have assured us that unless they can be permitted to force the Le-compton swindle on the people of Kansas, the Union will be, or may be, dissolved; and some of them have intimated that if the Union should be dissolved, southern fire and southern swords will lay waste the entire North, East, and West; that our beautiful villages, towns, and cities, will become smoking ruins, and our streets rivers of blood. How frightful the picture! But have gentlemen duly considered the power and strength of the North, East, and West, combined, and the comparative weakness of the South? Have they duly considered that if the Union should be dissolved, and a civil war should ensue, the slaveholders will have quite business enough on hand to defend themselves, their wives, and their children against the smothered vengeance of a down-trodden race, without troubling the free States with their hostile forces? But the everlasting cry of disunion has no terrors in it. It is simply ridiculous. It is not in the power of Congress, of all the office-holders in the Government, and all the slaveholders combined, to dissolve this Union. If the question should seriously arise, the people will have something to say about it. They are the all-powerful links that bind this glorious Union together indissolubly. Their voice is for union, as well as for liberty now and forever; and their voice is the supreme law of the land, and must and will be obeyed. They have witnessed the happiness, growth, and prosperity of the country under the Union. They have seen its power at home and abroad. They know that its flag floats over every ocean and every sea; and they know that that flag is respected and feared by all nations; and they are justly proud of the Union; and they will never consent that it shall be broken up. But if there are any restless traitors in the country, who are tired of the Union, and desire to get out of it, in Heaven's name let them go. Let them go.

Mr. SINGLETON obtained the floor.

Mr. BENNETT. If the gentleman will yield, I will move that the committee rise. [Cries of "No!" "No!"]

Mr. SINGLETON. I have not occupied any portion of the time of the House since I have been here; and I would prefer, if it meets with the approval of members, to speak in the morning. I am perfectly willing to yield the floor to-night, if I can have it in the morning.

Mr. KELLOGG. I wish to say that, while it is unpleasant to speak to benches, still, as there is great anxiety on the part of many members to speak, I will, if I get the floor now, occupy half my time this evening, and finish my remarks in the morning. I presume the Chair would recognize the agreement of members.

Mr. SINGLETON. If the committee consent to it, I have no objection.

Mr. DEWART. I object to it.

Mr. KELLOGG. It will make but half an hour's difference.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. SINGLETON. If it be the agreement that I get the floor to-morrow, I have no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the Chair will recognize the gentleman from Illinois.

No objection was made.

Mr. KELLOGG. The meeting of this committee this evening reminds me somewhat of a meeting which I had an account of not long since, in a communication from my district. It is assumed there, whether true or not, that the distinguished Senator called the Little Giant has very much the advantage of the President in our State; and it is the habit of the people there to get up what they call demonstrations. It became necessary for the Administration party to get up a demonstration also; and after due consideration and consultation of the heads of that party, consisting of a few postmasters and deputy marshals, they concluded to hold a Buchanan demonstration. They posted large printed handbills, and made a display of banners, of music, and beating of drums; and after parading the streets, they marched into a spacious hall, nearly as large as this, though it had not so much tinsel as decorates this room; and after all had gathered together, they counted up, and had precisely three—two postmasters and one deputy marshal; and one being a little more facetious than the rest, proposed they should adjourn by singing, "When shall we three meet again?" And they did adjourn by singing, altering the original a little:

"When shall we three meet again,
In thunder, lightning, or in rain?
When the hurly-burly's done—
When freedom's lost and slavery's won,
Then shall we three meet again."

And, sir, I trust in God they will never meet again on that condition.

Mr. Chairman, what is the element that has aroused the people of this great nation to an intensity of thought and political action seldom, if ever, before known? Is it only because crimes have been committed and frauds perpetrated in Kansas? No, sir. Is it because political partisan strife has frenzied the minds of the people? No, sir, it is not that. But it is because the Government has been, and now is, prostituted to the vile purpose of restricting freedom and extending slavery. It is because the policy of the fathers of the Republic has been debauched from the doctrines of its early days as announced by Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe, who, as statesmen and philosophers, comprehended the evils of the institution of slavery, and provided against its extension by prohibiting its expansion into any of the territories of the then Confederacy; who denounced it as an evil, a despotism, an oppression, and hopefully and confidently looked forward to its ultimate extinction by the action of the States in which it was tolerated. And now, sir, in the nineteenth century, in this day of progress, improvement, and intelligence, while the moral sense of the civilized world is shocked by its contemplation, the great, the only absorbing subject of consideration before the American Congress is, shall human slavery be extended over, and established in, a new sovereign State, an empire of freemen, established on our own domain, molded and fashioned by our own countrymen, and springing into life by the breath and at the bidding of the free Government of the United States; and that even against the expressed and determined will of her people?

This, sir, has aroused the great mass of thinking mind of America that is destined to control her action, direct her energies, and perpetuate her national existence. This revolution of governmental policy so aroused the public mind that a necessity was produced that called into existence the Republican party, whose mission is to lead back the Government to its original doctrines of freedom and purity of purpose, and when that is accomplished, to keep watch and ward that it be not again despoiled; the propriety and necessity of which I propose to consider.

Mr. Chairman, four years ago the country was in repose. The two prominent political parties were emulous of each other in their protestations that there was a final adjustment of the exciting subject of slavery extension. The Missouri compromise had not been disturbed; and whether binding as a statute law or not, it was obligatory, because of the expressed consent of the people, North and South, as the settled policy of the country. Having received its strongest support from southern members at its passage, the North had acquiesced and pledged its faith for its permanency. It had challenged and received the sanction and commendation of the whole country for more than thirty years.

Men of high position and commanding intellect pointed to it as possessing not only the form and sanction of law, but the power and sanction of the will of the people, the source of all law, and therefore obligatory on their hearts and consciences as a mutual and friendly adjustment of a controversy that then endangered the union of the States. But, sir, in an evil hour, evil to the country, evil to him who conceived the bold design of its abrogation, that policy, "akin to the Constitution," was abrogated and annulled. The barrier for freedom, which had remained intact for thirty years; was as chaff in the hands of the spoiler, when its destruction was demanded to secure and advance the interest of the party then in power.

The motive that induced that act of evil consequences, the country must determine. Its results are "around us and upon us." The twenty million freemen of the North did not ask it. Did the four hundred thousand slaveholders of the South demand it? Let him answer who now most keenly feels the legitimate results of his own rash act.

Kansas was free in fact. It is now a slave Territory; and the President tells us in his message, with that complacency and apparent pleasure that always accompany the success of a darling purpose, that "Kansas is now as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina;" and never did result follow its immediate cause more truly than has this result followed the repeal of the Missouri compromise.

The effect was seen from the beginning, and the country warned of the results that have followed; and step after step in this sure and determined march of wrong and violence has left its record of outrage upon the natural and constitutional rights of the freemen of Kansas, until the object of that measure has been accomplished in the only way, in sympathy and keeping with the institution it has established there.

But, sir, in presenting to the committee the views I entertain on the great question of the day—I mean the question of the rights of the people of the Territory of Kansas—I propose to speak of the present: the past is beyond our reach, only as we may profit by its record. We have to do with time as it passes. What of wrong and violence there has been perpetrated in Kansas, is now of history. And while we regret and deplore the sad history of our young and hopeful Territory, all blotched as it is with outrage and crime, we must look to the present and to the future to do her justice. True, you cannot bring back to life the dead, murdered by her invading foe. You cannot obliterate the remembrance of her hearth-stones desecrated, and the sanctity of her social life involved; but, sir, you can give her security for the future; her sacked and pillaged towns can be rebuilt; her printing press restored, and her ballot-box made secure from the contaminations of fraud and the hands of violence.

You can give her back that of which she had been robbed, the right, the boast of every American citizen, the right to be free—free to form her own organic State sovereignty; free to present to Congress her own constitution in her own way and time. This, sir, is what we ask; this is what the people of Kansas ask. It is her right, and she has sworn upon her altars to maintain it; and it being her right, and because it is in strict accordance with the theory and elements of our government and its institutions, no earthly power can prevent her ultimate success. You may cripple her energies for a time; you may send an armed invading force and imprison her people; you may lay waste her country and destroy her towns, again and yet again; still, while the great American heart sends its pulsating blood through the veins of freemen, Kansas, though broken, cannot be conquered.

It behooves us then to consider well the real issue now before Congress for its immediate action. Many issues have been made; many and varied views have been taken by gentlemen upon this floor; but to my mind there is but one question to be decided. All others are but incidental, or rather as the result and fruit of the one; and that sir, is, shall Kansas be admitted as a slave State? To that at last must this question come. Gentlemen from the South appreciate this, and are prepared to meet this question upon its own merits, disrobed of all false covering, political apparel, or the means by which it is to be accomplished. And, sir, in my judgment, he who supposes that the great questions of the day can be determined without involving the principle of the extension or non-extension of the institution of slavery, beyond the limits of the slaveholding States, mistakes the spirit of the age, and the principles involved in the issue now under discussion.

I would not be understood by this as treating lightly, or as unimportant, the course pursued by the friends and authors of the Leocompton constitution in Kansas. No, sir; I should feel that I had but illy discharged my duty, should I permit such an inference to be drawn. Too gross and too flagrant have been the outrages committed on American citizens resident in Kansas, to merit other than the condemnation of all just men. But I do mean to say that these wrongs have been the fruit, not the root; the result, and not the cause; that the determination to extend the institution of slavery into Kansas has been the first great cause of all the desolating crimes that make up the sad story of her early settlement, and but for that, a brighter page would have borne the history of her early life.

In proof of this proposition, I desire to refer to the history of the times yet within our recollection. Early in the history of those outrages, when the ballot-box was first subjugated to the vile purposes of the invaders from a neighboring State, it was declared by a gentleman, (General Stringfellow,) with whose name and fame, as connected with the introduction of slavery into Kansas, the people are but too well acquainted, and who was a leading spirit of evil in those days of terror, in a public speech, just before the election of November 29, 1854, at St. Joseph, Missouri, said:

"To those who have qualms of conscience as to violating laws. State or national, the time has come when such impositions must be disregarded, as your rights and property are in danger; and I advise you, one and all, to enter every election district in Kansas, in defiance of Reeder and his vile myrmidons, and vote at the point of the bowie knife and revolver. Neither give nor take quarter, as our case demands it. It is enough that the slaveholding interest wills it, from which there is no appeal. What right has Governor Reeder to rule Missourians in Kansas? His proclamation and prescribed oath must be repudiated. It is to your interest to do so. Mind that slavery is established where it is not prohibited."

No appeal! Freemen of my country, is there no appeal from the mandate of the slave power? Freemen of the mighty North, is there no appeal? If not, then stretch out your willing hands to receive the manacles of slavery, and march obedient in her coffee; fit only to receive the lash, and do the bidding of the taskmaster. Here, sir, is a bold declaration of the object and intention of those who have been, or assumed to be, in the confidence, and to have in keeping the slaveholding interest, of the southern States. And while this line of policy was publicly avowed by speeches and by publications, within the hearing and knowledge of Government officials, until they became a part of the history of the times, yet no disapprobation was manifested by the Executive, nor was any effort made to prevent this openly-threatened violation of the laws, both territorial and national; yea, threatened treason and rebellion.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Illinois. The gentleman, in the course of his remarks, spoke of that tremendous sensation in the public mind which had produced the great revulsion now in progress. I would be glad if the gentleman would tell us to-morrow how it occurred in 1856?

A MEMBER. Wait until to-morrow.

Mr. KELLOGG. I prefer to answer the gentleman just now that it is in my mind. I thank the gentleman for the inquiry. When the Kansas-Nebraska bill passed, the people took the alarm. We warned them that it was a pro-slavery measure. You knew it was. What was the result? The North revolutionized, and sent here a Republican House of Representatives. You sent the dough-faces of the North back to us—the northern Democrats who did your bidding—and they told our people that it was a fair measure, and that the object was to make Kansas a free State. Party allegiance was strong, and free-State pledges abundant. And that deceptive doctrine of non-intervention was introduced, without which James Buchanan could never have been elected President of the United States. And, sir, the people of the North were induced to send to this House a sufficient number of northern Democrats out of which sufficient could be found, added to the number of southern Democrats, to make a seeming majority for this pro-slavery Administration. And now, sir, that the real object of the measure is developed, and the light of day is breaking through the fogs of political trickery, a revolution has commenced which will sweep the land like a thunder-storm, and result in a Republican House of Representatives, and the election of a Republican President good and true. I now yield.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suppose I cannot have the right of submitting a few remarks without wasting more time.

Mr. KELLOGG. At another time I will take turn about with the gentleman while my time lasts.

Mr. LAMAR. I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the services of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1856, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

CENSUS OF 1860.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio, asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That a special committee of five be appointed by the Chair, and to continue during this Congress, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the best mode of taking the census of 1860, with leave to report by bill or otherwise at any time during the session of Congress commencing on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at a quarter before seven o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. E. KINGSFORD, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented three petitions of citizens of the State of New York, praying that pensions may be granted to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and to the widows of those deceased; which were referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HAMLIN presented the petition of Ebenezer Ballard and Rishworth Jordan, seamen on board of the United States ship Adams in the war of 1812, for themselves and other seamen in that ship, praying for indemnity for clothing, bedding, and other property destroyed by the blowing up of the ship; and also to be allowed their share of prize money for captures made by that ship; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. HALE presented the petition of Lydia Weeks, praying to be allowed the pension to which her husband, Jedediah Weeks, was entitled at the time of his death; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. HARLAN presented a petition of residents of Johnson county, Iowa, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Iowa City to Des Moines City, in that State; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

PAPERS REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. CAMERON, it was Ordered, That the memorial and papers of the heirs of General Henry Miller, delivered by the Clerk of the House of Representatives to the Secretary of the Senate, by order of that House of the 16th instant, be referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. GWIN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 210) to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

CLAIBORNE'S COTTON REPORT.

Mr. SLIDELL. A communication was received yesterday from the Department of the Interior, transmitting the report of Mr. Claiborne, who was appointed special agent for the purpose of obtaining information in regard to the consumption of cotton in Europe. I move that it be printed; and I presume this motion, as a matter of course, will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If my colleague will allow me, I shall propose a resolution which I have been drawing up directing the printing of ten thousand extra copies of that report for the use of the Senate, and I presume it will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have no objection to an amendment of that sort being moved, though I shall certainly not be disposed to vote for printing ten thousand copies.

The motion was withdrawn.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to take up the resolution which I reported some time since from the Committee on Printing in reference to the printing of the Coast Survey report. It can be disposed of this morning without delay and without debate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution:

Resolved, That in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey for the year 1857, there be printed five thousand copies for distribution from the Treasury Department; that the same be printed and bound with the plates in quarto form; and that the printing of said plates shall be done to the satisfaction of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey.

Mr. PEARCE. I have had some conversation with the Senator from Arkansas, and I believe he is quite satisfied with an amendment I propose to offer to the resolution. It is to strike out all after the word "Resolved" down to the word "Department," inclusive, and insert in lieu of the words so stricken out:

That, in addition to the usual number of copies of the report of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey office for the year 1857, there be printed six thousand two hundred copies, twelve hundred of which for the use of the Senate, and five thousand thereof for distribution by the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am authorized to say to the Senate, that the Committee on Printing assent to this amendment. It adds twelve hundred copies to the number originally reported by the committee, and those twelve hundred are for distribution by the Senate. It is, however, a great curtailment on the former practice, and I hope it will be adopted at once, and the subject disposed of.

Mr. PEARCE. I wish to say a single word; I do not mean to enter into any debate at all. When this subject was up before, some observations fell from a member of the Senate, which I think conveyed a meaning not intended by him. There seemed to be an imputation that there was something wrong in the management of the Coast Survey office. I merely wish to say now that whenever the Senate or any portion of the Senate shall think there is any abuse in that office which requires the correction of Congress, they will find that office and all its friends very ready to meet any inquiry which may be made; and I am satisfied that such an investigation will show that this branch of the public service is conducted with a purity and an economy of administration not exceeded, if equaled, by any branch of the public service; that it exhibits the most thorough and complete scientific knowledge, the utmost accuracy and perfection of workmanship, and that in fact it places American science in the advance, or, at all events, equally far with that of any other country under the sun. I know this is the reputation of this branch of the public service abroad. It is only a year or two ago since the President of the Royal Geographical Society said of it that although the Americans were late in the field, they had at one bound taken the first rank. I only desire to say now, that whenever it shall really be thought that there are abuses, and an investigation shall be desired, it will be very promptly met, and everything fully and fairly disclosed.

Mr. HALE. I hope that investigation will be made. I do not stand here to accuse the Coast Survey office; I do not know anything about it; but my impression is, that if it is what the Senator from Maryland says it is, we owe it to the discretion and judgment of the man at its head, and not to that supervision which, in my opinion, the legislature ought to extend over it. My impression is that there is a looseness about the appropriations for that establishment which does not exist in any other department of the Government. I do not say that it is not all the Senator from Maryland thinks; but if it is so, no thanks to Congress, for, in my opinion, in the appropriations for and supervision of that establishment, there have been a looseness and neglect on the part of Congress unparalleled in the history of this Government. I hope an investigation will be had.

Mr. CAMERON. I hope some investigation into this department of the Government, as it is called, will take place. It has heretofore not aspired to be a department, but has been considered a mere branch of some department. There is so much sensitiveness when the Coast Survey is mentioned here, that I am really of the opinion it would be well enough to look into it. No doubt it is all right; but it can be no harm, and may do the country some good, to have the whole affair thoroughly investigated.

Mr. SEWARD. Since this subject has come to the notice of the Senate, I should not do justice to my own convictions if I did not state the opinion I entertain in regard to the conduct of the Coast Survey. Circumstances have brought me into a more particular acquaintance with that than with almost any other business of the Government, and I have had occasion to know the manner in which the business at that office is conducted, and some considerable opportunities of knowing how the out-door work is performed, by whom, and with what application and diligence; and I think I also have had some means of knowing how the moneys which are appropriated for it are used and applied. I think I am able to bear witness that there is no department of the Government where the public money is more faithfully expended, and where the services rendered by the corps, from the chief to every subaltern, are rendered more diligently, more conscientiously, or more effectively. I have also had some opportunities of knowing the advantages of charts of the coast of the country to navigators, to merchants, and to underwriters, and, of course, to the world at large; and I can bear witness that this work is equal to that which is performed in any other country, according to the confessions of navigators, and that it is highly appreciated; and I believe it to be as necessary a department of the Government as any other.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we shall have the vote on this resolution. I assured the Senate, on calling it up, that we should have no debate upon it. I trust the Senator from Maryland will not press this debate any further. An investigation into the Coast Survey office cannot be had on a mere motion to print.

Mr. PEARCE. I do not desire to say anything further.

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution as amended was adopted.

KANSAS LECOMPTON CONSTITUTION.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (S. No. 161) for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Mr. GREEN having reported the bill which he has had in charge throughout the discussion, proceeded to close the debate by making his general reply to the arguments which have been urged against it. He spoke about two hours and a half.

Mr. CRITTENDEN briefly commented on some portion of Mr. GREEN's reply.

[These speeches will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. GREEN. I withdraw the amendment which I heretofore laid on the table with a view of offering it. It was to attach Minnesota and Kansas together in one bill. I now withdraw that amendment, and adhere to the original bill. While I am a friend to the admission of Minnesota, I believe it will expedite the public business to provide for each of these States by a single proceeding, rather than in duplicate form. I move, however, three amendments to the original bill, which I send to the Chair, and ask to have read

The Secretary read the first amendment, which is to strike out the preamble of the bill, and insert the following:

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates called and assembled at Leocompton on the 4th day of September, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which said constitution is republican, and said convention having asked the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator desire all the amendments to be read now, or that each be acted upon separately.

Mr. GREEN. If there be no objection, we may as well vote on this now.

Mr. DOUGLAS, and others. Read them all.

The Secretary read the second amendment, which is in the ninth line of the second section, after the word State, to insert:

That nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas, at all times, to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

The Secretary read the third amendment, which is in the eleventh line of the second section, to strike out the word "of" and insert "annexed to," so as to make it read:

Nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to any or all of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance annexed to the said constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is the Senate ready for the question on the first amendment?

Mr. SEWARD. The first amendment proposes to strike out the preamble of the original bill. I desire to hear that read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas, by their representatives in convention assembled at Leocompton, in said Territory, on Monday, the 4th day of September, 1857, having the right of admission into the Union as one of the United States of America, consistent with the Federal Constitution, in virtue of the treaty of cession by France of the province of Louisiana, made and concluded on the 30th day of April, 1803, and in accordance with the act of Congress, approved on the 30th of May, anno Domini 1854, entitled "An act to organize the Territory of Kansas and Nebraska," did form for themselves a constitution and State government, republican in form; and the said convention has in their name and behalf asked the Congress of the United States to admit the said Territory into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the other States.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the second amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CAMERON. I desire very much to vote on this question against the admission of Kansas with the Leocompton constitution, but I am prevented by the severe indisposition of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] who intended to come up here this morning, and would have come if no one had agreed to pair off with him. I was appealed to by a mutual friend to do so. There having been long years of kind intercourse between Mr. DAVIS and myself, I could not, under the circumstances, refuse. I could not put him to the risk of coming here to the danger of his life, as he would have done if I had not agreed to pair off with him.

The question being taken on the amendment by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 31, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Sill, Slocum, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT stated the question to be on Mr. GREEN's third amendment.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. Calhoun certifies in regard to the ordinance:

"That the within is a true and perfect copy of the ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention, and submitted as part of the constitution by the convention which assembled at Leocompton on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1857."

It is certified to by the President of the convention that this ordinance was submitted to the people, and voted upon as a part of the constitution. I do not know that there is any objection to this amendment; but it seems to me there can be no doubt that the ordinance was voted upon by the people, and understood to be a part of their constitution. We may have the power, and probably we have, to disregard it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Oh, no; let the amendment go.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Let me see if I understand what the amendment is. Perhaps I do not desire the yeas and nays upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not apprehend it. I supposed it was upon the rejection of this ordinance. If it was that, I should have wanted the yeas and nays, for the reason that it is submitted as part of the constitution; and I do not see how the Senate can divide it—accept one part and reject the other.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to make an answer to that. There has scarcely ever been a new State admitted into this Union that did not, in its ordinance, claim more public lands than Congress ever gave it. I never knew Congress to grant it in any case. It is not a part, it cannot be made a part, of the constitution, no matter what Mr. Calhoun certifies. That does not affect its legal force. It is a question of the gift of the public lands. There is no case, from the admission of Ohio to this day, in which a new State has not asked more lands than Congress has given. The attempt to make a mountain out of this molehill will certainly fail. I mean no disrespect to the Senator from Illinois; but I have said this much as the matter was pressed from behind me.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I did not suppose the Senator meant any disrespect, and did not so understand him at all. I suppose that, unless we can take the record that has been sent here by the President of the United States as true, we have no evidence of any constitution at all. The certificate of the president of the convention, which is the only authentication there is of the fact that any part of this constitution has been adopted, states that this ordinance was adopted and submitted as a part of the constitution by the convention which assembled at Leocompton. Here is the evidence that it is a part of the constitution, submitted as such, made one of the terms and conditions on which, and on which alone, this convention would agree to come into the Union with this constitution. The simple question is whether you will accept one part of the constitution and reject the other part? It is not like the ordinary case, where a new State has made a constitution, and then made a proposition separate and distinct from the constitution in regard to the public lands. If they put it into the constitution itself, submit it as part of the instrument, and send it here as a component part of the constitution, by what right or authority can we separate one part from the other—receive a part and reject the residue? That is the point I wish to make.

Mr. BENJAMIN. This, sir, is of a piece with a great many other objections that have been made to the admission of this State; and it is surprising that men of the position and intelligence of the Senator from Illinois, will stand up in the presence of this assemblage, and state as a matter of principle what he has just stated. Here is the constitution formed by this convention, signed by all the members, certified at the foot, and that is closed. What is this ordinance? The ordinance is a proposition by this new State that they will not tax the lands of the Government of the United States, which they say they have a right to tax, provided we will give them all the land they ask for in the ordinance. It is no portion of their government, it is nothing that they pretend, even upon the face of their own paper, that they have the right to exercise any control over; but asserting a pretension to tax the property of the United States, they say, we hereby agree to abandon that right if the Government will give us so much land; and in the bill now before us, we say in admitting this State into the Union, we refuse the proposition made in the ordinance annexed to the constitution whereby the proposition is made to give them land for a surrender of this pretended right. This pretended right of taxation has never been yielded by Congress, and never will be yielded. The idea of one of the States of this Union taxing the property of the Government of the United States within its limits is one which has been frequently advanced by the new States with a view to extort from Congress an additional grant of land. It never yet has been conceded, and never will. Here is the ordinance. The ordinance is put here after the constitution. It is not signed by the members.

Mr. WILSON. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will.

Mr. WILSON. When the constitution was published by the convention in Kansas this ordinance was placed at the head of the constitution and the signatures were placed at the end of the constitution. It appeared as a whole. I do not mean to dispute any of the positions of the Senator, but I state that this was the order in which it was published and understood by the convention, so submitted to the people, and Mr. Calhoun tells us that it was accepted as a part of the constitution. All I wish is to get the fact right.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I am utterly sick and tired of discussing this question on the asseverations of gentlemen as to what may have appeared in the newspapers, or what people may have told them. I look at the record in my hand, and in that I must be constrained to differ from the example of the venerable Senator from Kentucky. I look at what is before me, and not at what is told me outside, nor at newspaper partisan statements. Now in the paper as presented to us by the President—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Will the gentleman allow me in all courtesy to ask when have I alluded to anything said merely by newspapers, or reported merely in conversations?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will withdraw what I said. The Senator from Kentucky cannot get me into a discussion with him. I am unequal to it, and I withdraw what I said.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. The gentleman will but do me justice—

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will do him any justice. I will withdraw all that I said, and confess myself mistaken.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Certainly you are, and I say it in all courtesy.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I am referring to the ordinance alone. Now, sir, the paper that is before us is presented by the President of the United States and the president of the Kansas constitutional convention as the constitution of Kansas. It begins thus:

"We, the people of the Territory of Kansas, by our representatives, in convention assembled, at Lecompton, in said Territory," "having the right of admission," &c., "do ordain and establish the following constitution."

That is signed, and that alone, by the members of the convention. At the foot is this:

"The within is a true and perfect copy, as compared by me, of the constitution of the State of Kansas, prepared and submitted by the constitutional convention at Lecompton, on the 7th of November, 1857. J. CALHOUN,
"President Constitutional Convention."

Then follows what is called by some gentlemen "an ordinance of the constitution;" and what is it? "Whereas"—this is an entirely distinct paper.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator permit me to make a remark?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. GREEN. This bill was drawn by my friend from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN.] He drew it "the ordinance of the convention." The copyist, under a mistake, wrote "ordinance of the constitution." That is the way the mistake occurred in the bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Here is the ordinance:

"Whereas, the Government of the United States is the proprietor or will become so"— they do not admit us to be yet—

"—of all or most of the lands lying within the limits of Kansas, as determined under this constitution; and whereas the State of Kansas will possess the undoubted right to tax such lands for the support of her State government, or for other proper and legitimate purposes connected with her existence as a State: Now, therefore, be it ordained by this convention, on behalf of, and by the authority of the people of Kansas, that the right aforesaid to tax such lands shall be, and is hereby, forever relinquished, if the conditions following shall be accepted and agreed to by the Congress of the United States."

Then come the conditions: that we shall give them some enormous quantities of land; and at the close of that is the following certificate of the president of the convention:

"The within is a true and perfect copy of the ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention, and submitted as part of the constitution by the convention which assembled at Lecompton, on the 5th day of September, A. D. 1857."

That is to say, the people having formed a constitution for their own government, by ordinance asserted the right to tax the public lands, and submitted to the people a proposition to be made to the Congress of the United States, whether or not the Congress of the United States would give them an enormous quantity of land, as a consideration for yielding the right to tax the land; and this is called an "ordinance of the constitution." They might have put inside of the constitution any proposition they pleased, for submission to Congress; for a bargain to be submitted to Congress; for the terms of settlement to be proposed; and, if Congress assented to them, the bargain would have been complete; but to call it a part of the constitution because it is written in it is, to my judgment, as inconsistent and as illogical as it would be to call the Lord's prayer a part of a promissory note, if it should be written on the same piece of paper. One is just as logical as the other.

This is a proposition by the new State of Kansas to us for a bargain. The amendment of the Senator from Missouri simply says on the part of Congress, we do not accept your bargain; we do not agree that you possess the consideration which you offer for the abandonment of the right to tax our lands, and we do not accept the bargain. Whether it is called an ordinance attached to the constitution, or annexed to the constitution, or an ordinance passed by the convention, is a question of pure verbal criticism; and all the ingenuity of the Senator from Illinois cannot torture that into intervention by Congress with a State constitution. Nothing of that sort is intended; no such purpose can be made out of it; and it is in order to preclude any such conclusion from the language of the act, that this verbal amendment has been made.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I shall not occupy the time of the Senate. I have neither the strength nor the voice to do so. I do not intend to display any ingenuity on this subject, nor express any surprise that gentlemen of the intelligence of the Senator from Louisiana should differ with me; but here we find the record shows that this ordinance was submitted as a part of the constitution. The record proves that; and the ingenuity of the Senator from Louisiana, nor anything he can say, can disprove the fact. This ordinance is certified to be a part of the constitution that is submitted here. The importance of that is this: the convention say we are willing to come into the Union on the terms contained in that record; and if you strike out any portion of those terms, what evidence have you that they will be willing to come into the Union? what evidence have you that they would have agreed to send here, unless these terms were embraced in it? It is proposed now to accept a part of the conditions on which they propose to come in and to reject the other part. If they say we will come in on two conditions—the one, that you take this instrument as our organic law; and the other, that you agree to these propositions contained in the ordinance; what right have we to say we take the one, and reject the other? How do you know they would have consented to come in at all, unless you acceded to both? I say, therefore, you must take it as they present it, or you must reject it in toto, in my opinion. I shall not argue the point. I have merely stated the proposition; I am not able to enter into an argument now.

Mr. WILSON. I wish simply to say a word, Mr. President, in reply to what seems to me to be rather an extraordinary remark of the Senator from Louisiana, that some Senators were accustomed to bring into the Senate what has appeared in the public press. Now, I have sent for the Daily Globe, and I find the statement I made verified. This ordinance appears at the head of the constitution, as published there, and so appeared at the time in the Territory of Kansas. Mr. Calhoun himself testifies that it was voted for as a part of the constitution, by the people. Although the Senator from Missouri has told us that the people did not vote upon the constitution at all, Mr. Calhoun testifies that they did, and voted for this ordinance as a part of the constitution.

I wish to say to the Senator from Louisiana that I have no contempt for the public press of this country. I have fully as much respect for what appears in the public press, as I have for what appears in manufactured official papers. I will examine the statements of the public press, to see whether they be correct, as I will examine what appears in official papers, and see if they be correct. The one can state falsehoods, and we all know the other does. I desire to say to the Senator from Louisiana, that, when I make a statement on this floor, I intend to make it upon what I believe to be good authority; and that Senator knows that, with all his ingenuity and all his knowledge, he has never yet been able to show the mistakes or the misstatements of any assertions of fact which I have made here.

I did not bring this matter up for the purpose of finding fault. All I wished was to have it set right. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] referred to it, I thought, rather captiously. He said other States have claimed large portions of public lands. I ask the Senator—I ask it for information—whether other States, when they have made constitutions, sent any such ordinances here certified to as a part of their constitutions? It may be so, or it may not. I certainly suppose that when a constitution is before us, it is proper and legitimate for all of us to examine its precise and exact provisions, and that we have the privilege of doing so without being liable to any general reflections as to our course in reference to the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The yeas and nays have been ordered. It requires unanimous consent to withdraw the call. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. I should like to hear the amendment again read.

The Secretary again read the amendment; which is, in line eleven, section two, to strike out the word "of," and insert "annexed to."

Mr. COLLAMER. It is merely a verbal amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment printed is that of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.]

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw that, as the substance of it has been adopted, and I shall offer an additional section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment offered by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.]

Mr. CLARK. I did not offer it, but merely laid it on the table for the purpose of offering it. It has been printed. I do not propose to offer it now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

The Secretary read Mr. PUGH's amendment; which is, to insert the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the State of Kansas, as hereinbefore provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same power and effect within that State as in other States of the Union; and the said State is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court, with like powers and jurisdiction as the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa shall be established. The judge, attorney, and marshal of the United States for the said district of Kansas, shall reside within the same, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as the judge, attorney, and marshal of the district of Iowa.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I should like to inquire for information, of some member of the Judiciary Committee, whether this has been a usual amendment to bills for the admission of new States, or is it something extraordinary in this case?

Mr. PUGH. It is not extraordinary. Whenever there has been an enabling act it has been passed at the same session with the joint resolution admitting the State; but of late years, in a number of cases, wherever the admission has been by act instead of joint resolution, it has generally been put into the act itself.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Crittenden, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I desire to offer a substitute for the whole bill. I propose to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause, and insert the following in lieu thereof:

That the State of Kansas be, and is hereby, admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever; but inasmuch as it is greatly disputed whether the constitution with which Kansas is now admitted was fairly made, or expresses the will of the people of Kansas, this admission of her into the Union as a State is hereby declared to be upon this fundamental condition precedent, namely: that the said constitutional instrument shall be first submitted to a vote of the people of Kansas, and assented to by them, or a majority of the voters, at an election to be held for the purpose; and as soon as such assent shall be given, and duly made known to the President of the United States, he shall announce the same by proclamation, and thereafter, and without any further proceedings on the part of Congress, the admission of the said State of Kansas into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, shall be complete and absolute. At the said election the voting shall be by ballot, and by indorsing on his ballot, as each voter may please, "for the constitution," or "against the constitution." Should the said constitution be rejected at the said election by a majority of votes being cast against it, then, and in that event, the inhabitants of said Territory are hereby authorized and empowered to form for themselves a constitution and State government by the name of the State of Kansas, preparatory to its admission into the Union, according to the Federal Constitution, and to that end may elect delegates to a convention as hereinafter provided.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas shall have concurrent jurisdiction on the Missouri and all other rivers and waters bordering on the said State of Kansas, so far as the same shall form a common boundary to said State, and any other State or States now or hereafter to be formed, or bounded by the same; and said rivers and waters, and all the navigable waters of said State, shall be common highways and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to all other citizens of the United States, without any tax, duty, impost, or toll, therefor.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That, for the purpose of insuring, as far as possible, that the elections authorized by this act may be fair and free, the Governor and Secretary of the Territory of Kansas, and the presiding officers of the two branches of its Legislature, namely, the President of the Council and Speaker of the House of Representatives, are hereby constituted a board of commissioners to carry into effect the provisions of this act, and to use all the means necessary and proper to that end. Any three of them shall constitute a board; and the board shall have power and authority, in respect to each and all of the elections hereby authorized or provided for, to designate and establish precincts for voting, or to adopt those already established; to cause polls to be opened at such places as it may deem proper in the respective counties and election precincts of said Territory; to appoint, as judges of election at each of the several places of voting, three discreet and respectable persons, any two of whom shall be competent to act, to require the sheriffs of the several counties, by themselves or deputies, to attend the judges at each of the places of voting, for the purpose of preserving peace and good order, or the said board may, instead of said sheriffs and their deputies, appoint, at their discretion and in such instances as they may choose, other fit persons for the same purpose; and when the purpose of the election is to elect delegates to a convention to form a constitution, as hereinafter provided for, the number of delegates shall be sixty, and they shall be apportioned by said board among the several counties of said Territory, according to the number of voters; and in making this apportionment, the board may join two or more counties together to make an election or representative district, where neither of the said counties has the requisite number of voters to entitle it to a delegate, or to join a smaller to a larger county having a surplus population, where it may serve to equalize the representation. The elections hereby authorized shall continue one day only, and shall not be continued later than sundown on that day. The said board shall appoint the day of election for each of the elections hereby authorized, as the same may become necessary. The said Governor shall announce, by proclamation, the day appointed for any one of said elections, and the day shall be as early a one as is consistent with due notice thereof to the people of said Territory, subject to the provisions of this act. The said board shall have full power to prescribe the time, manner, and places of each of said elections, and to direct the time and manner of the returns thereof, which returns shall be made to the said board, whose duty it shall be to announce the result by proclamation, and to appoint therein as early a day as practicable for the delegates elected (where the election has been for delegates) to assemble in convention at the seat of government of said Territory. When so assembled, the convention shall first determine, by a vote, whether it is the wish of the people of the proposed State to be admitted into the Union at that time; and if so, shall proceed to form a constitution, and take all necessary steps for the establishment of a State government in conformity with the Federal Constitution, subject to the approval and ratification of the people of the proposed State. And the said convention shall accordingly provide for its submission to the vote of the people for approval or rejection.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That in the elections hereby authorized, all white male inhabitants of said Territory over the age of twenty-one years, who have been residents for three months before the election, and are citizens of the United States, and none others, shall be allowed to vote; and this shall be the only qualification required to entitle the citizen to the right of suffrage in said elections.

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the members of the aforesaid board of commissioners and all persons appointed by them to carry into effect the provisions of this act, shall, before entering upon their duties, take an oath to perform faithfully the duties of their respective offices, and on failure thereof, they shall be liable and subject to the same charges and penalties as are provided in like cases under the territorial laws.

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the officers mentioned in the preceding section, shall receive for their services the same compensation as is given for like services under the territorial laws.

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the said State of Kansas, when her admission as a State becomes complete and absolute, shall be entitled to one member in the House of Representatives, in the Congress of the United States, till the next census be taken by the Federal Government.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That the following propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said people of Kansas for their free acceptance or rejection, which, if accepted, shall be obligatory on the United States and upon the said State of Kansas, to wit: First. That sections numbered sixteen and thirty-six in every township of public lands in said State, and where either of said sections, or any part thereof, has been sold or otherwise been disposed of, other lands, equivalent thereto, and as contiguous as may be, shall be granted to said State for the use of schools. Second. That seventy-two sections of land shall be set apart and reserved for the use and support of a State university, to be selected by the Governor of said State, subject to the approval of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and to be appropriated and applied in such manner as the Legislature of said State may prescribe for the purpose aforesaid, but for no other purpose. Third. That ten entire sections of land, to be selected by the Governor of said State, in legal subdivisions, shall be granted to said State for the purpose of completing the public buildings, or for the erection of others at the seat of government, under the direction of the Legislature thereof. Fourth. That all salt springs within said State, not exceeding twelve in number, with six sections of land adjoining, or as contiguous as may be to each, shall be granted to said State for its use; the same to be selected by the Governor thereof within one year after the admission of said State, and when so selected, to be used or disposed of on such terms, conditions, and regulations as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, That no salt spring or land, the right whereof is now vested in any individual or individuals, or which may be hereafter confirmed or adjudged to any individual or individuals, shall by this article be granted to said State. Fifth. That five per centum of the net proceeds of sales of all public lands lying within said State, which shall be sold by Congress after the admission of said State into the Union, after deducting all the expenses incident to the same, shall be paid to said State, for the purpose of making public roads and internal improvements, as the Legislature shall direct: Provided, The foregoing propositions herein offered are on the condition that the people of Kansas shall provide, by an ordinance, irrevocable without the consent of the United States, that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the soil within the same, by the United States, or with any regulations Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said soil to bona fide purchasers thereof, and that no tax shall be imposed on lands belonging to the United States, and that in no case shall non-resident proprietors be taxed higher than residents.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to call his attention to one point? Would it not be well to put into his amendment the further clause that the proposed State of Kansas shall never tax the lands or other property of the United States within its limits?

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have no objection to that. I thought it was already in the amendment. That portion of it which relates to these matters is copied exactly from the Minnesota bill. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate unnecessarily, but I know how difficult it is to understand a proposition of this sort from the mere reading of it, and it will require a few minutes to explain it. The first section of my substitute proposes that the State of Kansas shall be admitted into the Union. Inasmuch, however, as great dispute exists in respect to whether the constitution was fairly made, or has been properly submitted, it is proposed that it shall be submitted to a vote of the people, and if a majority of the people of Kansas approve of the constitution, that fact is to be made known to the President after the election has taken place, and he is to declare the fact by proclamation, and thereupon the admission of the State of Kansas, without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, is to be considered absolute and complete. If, however, the constitution be rejected upon that election, then the people are to choose delegates to a new convention.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from Kentucky be good enough to pause for a moment? It is wholly impossible, I am sure, for any Senator on the right of the Chair to hear what the Senator from Kentucky says. Conversation is so general and audible on that side of the Chamber, that the Chair cannot hear the Senator from Kentucky. If it be necessary, the Chair will arrest all discussion and all business as often as it may be required, in order to preserve the decorum of the body.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. My substitute provides that if the constitution be rejected by the people upon that vote, then a convention is to be immediately called, which is to have authority to form a constitution for Kansas, if it be the will of the people to come into the Union as a State. These elections, according to the third section, are to be taken out of the control and management of the ordinary officials of the territorial government, because of the party influence which is exercised, or may be supposed to be exercised by those officials. Great exception is made here, as we all know, to Mr. Calhoun's control of this matter; and it is said he has placed it under the direction of partisans of his own. I want to take it out of their hands. I do not know who is to be in power; but I suppose that the Legislature is to be Republican, from the last revelations made by Mr. Calhoun. I do not want to put it in their power. I want to have a fair election, which shall be conducted and managed by impartial arbiters. I propose, therefore, by the third section, that a board shall be constituted for the purpose of directing and conducting those elections, giving directions to them in all respects, and appointing proper officers to take charge of the polls. That board is to consist of the Governor, Secretary of the Territory, and the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President of the Council. They are to direct when the election is to be held; they are to appoint the judges of election; and they are to do everything else necessary and conducive to a fair expression of opinion by the people.

These are the main provisions of the substitute. The rest are merely formal, making propositions to the new State for lands to be granted, and other provisions of that kind which are usually made in these bills. They are the same terms that are offered to the people of Minnesota.

I do not feel disposed to enlarge on the question at all. I know that the House is weary of debate on this subject. I am certain that I am. I desire to bring this matter to a close. Those gentlemen who are not altogether determined as to their course will understand, from what I have said, what is the purpose and the object of this amendment. It is to make the admission conditional, but to make it now, so as to put it possibly beyond our reach forever. It is to make the admission now, but on the condition that a vote shall be had on the constitution; and if it be approved by the people, Kansas shall then be absolutely and permanently a State of the Union; but if the constitution be rejected, then a convention shall be called forthwith, or as soon as possible, for the purpose of making a new constitution; and these elections are to be held under the superintendence and direction of a board of commissioners, to consist of the Governor, the Secretary of the Territory, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the President of the Council, any three of whom shall constitute a quorum. The provisions are very simple.

Mr. KENNEDY. I desire to say simply a word in explanation of the vote I shall give on this amendment, and which may, perhaps, by some be regarded as inconsistent with the course that I announced here some days since I intended to take. I stated then that I should vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution without any obligations resting upon me towards either party upon this floor. I announced that I should vote for it simply as a measure of peace, as the only means, in my humble judgment, by which peace could be restored to the country; the only means by which we can get rid of this vexed question of slavery. I have been sincere in that belief, and holding it as the only ready means by which we could get clear of this whole subject, I had announced that I should vote for the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The Senator from Kentucky has proposed an amendment to this bill, which he seems to think may produce that result. If it should be so I should be greatly rejoiced. In order to carry out the position I have taken as a conservative, middle-ground man, between the two contending parties, I am willing to vote with the Senator from Kentucky, and to try whether his proposition can be carried. I should much prefer, myself, to get clear of the whole question at once; but as I understand that this amendment admits the State of Kansas now, subject to a conditional vote hereafter on the constitution, I am willing to vote for it, although I do not like it so much as the proposition to admit Kansas at once under the Lecompton constitution. Occupying the position I do, under no obligations whatever to sustain either the administration or the opposite party, I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky, reserving to myself, however, if it should not be carried, the right to vote for the admission of Kansas with the Lecompton constitution as the best and readiest means of restoring peace to the country.

Mr. HALE. I shall vote for the amendment, reserving to myself the right to vote as I please on the bill, if the amendment should be adopted. I am not entirely certain that I should not make the same use of this proposition that we did of the volunteers on the Army bill. We used the volunteers to kill the regulars, and then we killed the volunteers themselves. [Laughter.] But, sir, as this amendment covers the whole ground that has been occupied in debate, and as I have not spoken upon the bill since it has been before the Senate, and did not intend to do so, I desire now to notice one or two statements made last night which I feel that I am not willing to let go to the country unchallenged; and to them I wish to call the attention of the Senate. The honorable Senator from Illinois [Mr. Douglas] read an extract from a newspaper, in which the writer took the ground that, under the decision in the Dred Scott case, the owner of slaves could go from any slave State in the Union into any free State of the Union, and that any provision of the constitution or laws of the free State which denied his right to hold his slaves there was void. I think that statement is explicitly made in the paper. My attention had been called to it before. I had taken occasion, in addressing assemblages of my fellow-citizens in my own State and elsewhere, in commenting on that statement of that paper, to say, as I now here repeat, that I solemnly believe, and I am ready to stake what little reputation, as a man or a lawyer, belongs to me, that the newspaper has the right of the argument; and if, under the Dred Scott decision, the Constitution of the United States authorizes a man to take his slaves into the Territories, and protects him in their enjoyment there by virtue of the Constitution, it does the same thing in a State; because the Constitution of the United States is the supreme law, not only of a Territory but of a State, anything in the laws or constitution of that State notwithstanding.

After the honorable Senator from Illinois had made this statement—I am speaking from memory now entirely; I have not the paper before me; I do not know anything about it, and of course I cannot state the words with precise accuracy, but I think I shall convey the idea—the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] rose in his place, somewhat excited I thought, or if he did not rise excited, I thought he got a little excited before he sat down, and he denied the fairness of that argument, and put his denial upon the assertion that no southern Senator, and no Representative of a southern State had ever put forth any such doctrine. He denied entirely that it was the doctrine of the South, that it had ever been claimed, and I thought was disposed to administer a little rebuke to the Senator from Illinois for introducing this newspaper statement into the debates of the Senate. I agree that it was in bad taste, and it must have been a direful necessity which would justify the Senator; but I felt that same necessity once before this session, and did actually quote from that same newspaper. Sir, I am not going to controvert a single word that the Senator from Georgia said, but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to two facts which I think are very significant in reference to this question: whether a slaveholder can take his slaves into a free State, and hold them there? The Senator from Georgia says no such right has ever been asserted by any southern Senator or Representative. I do not know that it has been, and I presume that they never did it, as he says they never did.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator will allow me to interrupt him a moment. In the summer of 1856, in the debate on this very Kansas question, a Representative from the State of North Carolina made a speech asserting that doctrine. I heard that speech, and it is so in the Globe.

Mr. HALE. Then I will qualify what I said, so far as that is concerned; but the facts to which I was going to call attention were not declarations in speeches made in the Senate or House of Representatives, but to the fact that that assertion has been made in a more solemn and a more authentic form, and that is, before the judicial tribunals of the country. I beg the indulgence of the Senate while I state the facts, to remember that I am stating them from memory entirely, and that if I misstate, it will be from failure of memory; but if my memory serves me aright, there was a slaveholder from the State of North Carolina, I think his name was Wheeler, who found himself in the city of Philadelphia, not many years ago, with a number of slaves. A citizen of Pennsylvania went on-board the steamboat where they were, and notified those persons there that they could not legally be held as slaves in the State of Pennsylvania, and thereupon they went off. For the utterance of that sentiment a habeas corpus was issued, directed to the individual who made this statement, commanding him to come before the judge of the United States district court, and bring with him the slaves, which it seemed to be implied that he had taken possession of by the declaration to them of this principle. He made return to the writ that he had not got the slaves; and for that he was imprisoned, and held imprisoned a long time. I think the late Judge Kane, in one of the proceedings in that case, stated this same principle in substantially this form: that he knew of no law of Pennsylvania by which any citizen of the United States could be divested of his property in slaves in Pennsylvania. The matter ended there substantially. Williamson was liberated, and Judge Kane has since deceased.

But, sir, there is another case of more significance even than that, bearing on this very point. A Mr. Lemmon, I think his name was, traveling from Virginia to Texas, found himself in the State of New York with some half a dozen slaves, and the same statement was made to those slaves, that there was no authority to hold them in servitude in the State of New York; and a writ of habeas corpus was taken out in that case, returnable, I think, before Judge Paine; and the question was brought before Judge Paine, whether slaves could legally be holden in New York, under those circumstances. Judge Paine, if I remember correctly, substantially decided that it was legal to bring slaves from Virginia to New York; but that it was not legal to bring Virginia laws to keep them as slaves after they got there. The substance of the decision was, that when they got into the State of New York they became subject to the laws of New York, and were therefore free; and Judge Paine liberated them. There was so much patriotism, or something else, in the city of New York, that a subscription was got up to pay Mr. Lemmon the full value of those slaves. It was paid to him; Judge Paine, I think, very much to his discredit, subscribing liberally to the fund. He is dead, and I will tread lightly on his ashes. Every dollar of the value of the slaves, as I understand, was paid to Mr. Lemmon, but it did not sweeten him. Notwithstanding he got the full value of his slaves, a suit was brought; and, if my memory does not serve me very badly, this matter was alluded to in a communication of the Governor of the Commonwealth of Virginia, to the Legislature of that State; and a suit was instituted, with a view of carrying it up to the Supreme Court of the United States, to determine whether slaves could be holden in the State of New York. It has been decided by every tribunal that has had it under consideration in that State, even to the final court of appeals, I think, that Judge Paine was right; that slavery was actually abolished in New York; and that no other Legislature on God's earth had authority to introduce its regulations as to the rights of people within that State.

Now, sir, these are two facts, which, although they do not in the least contradict the statement of the honorable Senator from Georgia, I think go a very great way to obviate the force of his argument, because they show that, notwithstanding this assertion has not been made on the floor of the Senate or on the floor of the House of Representatives, the claim has been made, and is being prosecuted; and, if I mistake not it is now pending before the judicial tribunals of the country to determine whether a slaveholder may come from a slave State, and hold his slaves in a free State. But it may be said, and it probably will be said, that this is a different question; that this relates to the right of passage through the State, to transit, to the condition of such persons while in transitu through the State. I agree to that. In the form in which it is now presented, it does relate to that. I think the phraseology that has been used in one of those decisions, in some stage of the discussions, was, that the right in transitu lasted for a convenient time. I am not sure of the phraseology, but I think I am correct. I think, in one of those decisions, or in some of those proceedings, the right to hold slaves in a free State was limited to the right of passage in transitu, and limited to a convenient time. But, sir, I submit to every Representative of a free State, and I present it to every Senator on this floor, if by judicial construction—

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator from New Hampshire permit me to make one remark?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. With due deference to the Senator, I do not consider his line of argument very important on the amendment now pending. I am willing that he shall have a full opportunity to make that argument, but I submit this suggestion to him: there are some three or four Senators present who are very unwell. They are anxious and determined to vote, and it would be a very serious inconvenience to keep them waiting. I request, therefore, if he can postpone this subject until some convenient season, that he will do it. I will take it as great favor, and so will others.

Mr. HALE. The Senator has hit me in a very tender place, and I shall have to yield. It was with no disposition to prolong this debate, but simply because I thought the truth of history required that the passage between the Senator from Georgia and the Senator from Illinois should not pass entirely unnoticed, that I have made the remarks I have; and yielding to the suggestion of the honorable Senator from Missouri, I forbear at this time, trusting that there will be an opportunity by-and-by.

Mr. SEWARD. Have the yeas and nays been called for on the amendment offered by the honorable Senator from Kentucky?

The VICE PRESIDENT. They have not.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for them, sir.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. I suppose that, according to the rules of the Senate, if that substitute shall be adopted, the bill cannot be further amended in Committee of the Whole; but I understand it will be amendable in the Senate. I propose to vote for the amendment, although it contains several things against which I am committed by my opinions, and in regard to which, if the amendment shall be adopted, I should desire that it should be amended in the Senate. I will not detain the Senate to specify them, but simply say that I reserve several objections when I vote in favor of the amendment as a substitute, preferring it, in even this shape, to the original bill; and intending, if it be adopted, to move its amendment hereafter.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 34; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Kennedy, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Durkee, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yates—34.

So the substitute was rejected.

Mr. STUART. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the second section of this bill as printed. It provides:

"That the State of Kansas is admitted in the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchaser and grantees thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever, upon them or other property of the United States within the limits of the said State; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance of the said constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants which were contained in the act of Congress entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 25, 1857."

I wish to ask the Senator if he intends, in the latter clause of that section to carry to the State of Kansas the same grants of public lands that were given by Congress to the State of Minnesota.

Mr. GREEN. I will answer. The design of that is to grant nothing, but not to preclude us from hereafter doing whatever is right, just, and equitable in the premises. It is to grant nothing, but to reserve the right to make a liberal grant to Kansas according to her condition, on the same principles that one was made to Minnesota, that is all. It is to reserve that right and prevent a conclusion against the State.

Mr. STUART. I respectfully suggest, then, Mr. President, to the Senator from Missouri, that it would be better to strike out this language and leave the bill silent on the subject. There is nobody, I apprehend, who denies the power of Congress to make a grant of public lands in such proportions as it chooses to the State of Kansas on certain terms and conditions, but it is not necessary to say that nothing in this act shall deprive the State of such grants. That language is certainly susceptible of the construction that it does make a grant. I do not mean to say that it is sufficient to carry the grant to the State, but it is susceptible of such a construction. The Committee on Territories repudiate this ordinance, upon the ground of its enormity, upon the ground that it is so excessive in its demands that Congress will not agree to it. Let me call the attention of the Senator from Missouri to the peculiar terms of this clause of the second section:

"Nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants."

It does not say, "nor to deprive the State of Kansas of grants hereafter to be made;" but it does leave them to set up the idea that here is a grant to that State of this quantity of lands, without attaching to that grant the conditions on which we have made it to all other States. When we have made this grant of lands to the other States, we have attached to it conditions which are to remain fundamental, irrevocable; and we require the assent of the State, in some proper form, to the conditions which we attach to the grant.

I confess that I have more solicitude on this subject, from the fact that the Lecompton constitution, as it was first printed and presented to the country, claimed to be by the authority of the convention, made this ordinance a part of the instrument itself, and made it the first part of it. I think that when the president of the convention certifies that the ordinance was submitted as a part of the constitution to the people of Kansas, he but certifies the truth that it was done; and the separation of it has been made by him without any authority whatever from the convention, because we learn lately that the President of the United States had an authentic copy of that constitution, and the Union of this city, it will be remembered by every gentleman who saw the paper, published what it said was an authentic copy of this constitution which had been received by the President, and the authentic copy thus published was such as I have described. The first portion of the constitution thus published and described as the constitution, was this ordinance claiming these land grants. It was a part of it; it was not separated; and it was said at the time, I repeat, to have been received by the President of the United States, and to be an authentic copy of the instrument.

In a discussion which arose in the early part of the session, the Senator from Missouri took the ground, it will be remembered, that this ordinance was no part of the constitution, and that it was entirely within the power of Congress to reject the ordinance and accept the constitution. The same view was taken in newspapers throughout the country; and there was ample time for any shaping of this instrument to be made that was thought proper to be made, in order that the instrument should come here with as few objections against it as possible. The ordinance has been separated from the rest of the constitution by the president of the convention, or by somebody else—my object is not to make any charges against him; but it stands now, as sent here by the president, separated and separately certified; and yet he says, in that certificate, that it was submitted to the people of Kansas as a part of the constitution. There is no mistaking that language. Then the people of Kansas regard it as a part of the constitution.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator say that Mr. Calhoun certifies it was submitted to the people? If he will read the certificate, he will find that he is mistaken.

Mr. STUART. I am as anxious to be correct as the Senator is to have me so. I will read the certificate, and the Senator from Ohio will see that it says exactly what I state:

"The within is a true and perfect copy of the ordinance adopted by the constitutional convention, and submitted as part of the constitution, by the convention which assembled at Lecompton on the 5th day of September, anno Domini 1857."

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senator now, if he means to pretend, after reading that, that it is an allegation that the ordinance was submitted to the people; that those words say it?

Mr. STUART. I will test the accuracy of the Senator, because I do mean to say that; and I tell the Senator, distinctly, that I do mean to say it. Here is the certificate attached to the constitution itself:

"The within is a true and perfect copy, as compared by me, of the constitution of the State of Kansas, prepared and submitted by the constitutional convention at Lecompton, on the 7th day of November, anno Domini 1857."

It uses precisely the same language—"submitted." Submitted to whom?

Mr. BROWN. To Congress.

Mr. STUART. Submitted to Congress! Well, sir, it is a very great pity that the gentleman who presides over the affairs of this constitution did not say so. The instrument itself says, that before it shall be presented to Congress, it shall be submitted to the people. That is the way in which the term "submitted" is used in this constitution; and when this certificate says it has been submitted, to whom does it mean that it has been submitted? To the people. In the document before me there is another communication that submits this constitution to Congress. He writes a letter to the President asking him to communicate this constitution to Congress, and hopes that he will send along with it such suggestions as he thinks are proper. As I have said, I do not raise this question here for the purpose of cavil. If the committee who have reported this bill intend that there shall be no controversy or mistake about it, then the safe way is to strike out the language to which I have alluded, and leave the matter entirely to the future action of Congress.

Mr. GREEN. I will explain this matter to the satisfaction of the Senator from Michigan, for I am satisfied he does not wish to raise a mere captious objection.

Mr. STUART. Certainly not.

Mr. GREEN. This is an exact copy from the bill admitting the State of Arkansas, and that reads as follows:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or any of the propositions contained in the ordinance of the said convention of the people of Arkansas, nor to deprive the said State of Arkansas of the same grants subject to the same restrictions which were made to the State of Missouri, by virtue of an act entitled 'An act to authorize the people of Missouri Territory,' &c."

Mr. STUART. What was done under it?

Mr. GREEN. At a subsequent period, Congress passed a law making a grant to Arkansas, and this was never construed to make a grant, but it did not preclude it, and that is the only purpose.

Mr. DOUGLAS. It carries an implication.

Mr. GREEN. It does, and to that extent it is just and proper. Some have held that the mere sovereignty of a State entitles that sovereignty to the right of taxation on all property within its limits. It has been a controverted point whether the States could tax the lands of the United States without a contract agreeing not to tax them. This part of the bill admitting the State of Kansas, says they shall not tax them. Now, there ought to be some consideration for it. We cannot stop at this time to make that consideration, but we can do as we did in the case of Arkansas. In that case, while we required the State to relinquish the right to tax, we said we will not preclude the State from insisting on a fair equivalent in the shape of grants of public land—that is all.

Mr. STUART. I do not desire to deprive the State of that grant, and I will therefore suggest this amendment:

Nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants hereafter to be made.

If the Senator will insert those words, "hereafter to be made," all the objection I have will be obviated. ["No objection."]

Mr. GREEN. I prefer to let the bill stand as it is. I am following the example which has been heretofore set by the Congress of the United States, and that has worked well. I see no necessity for any change.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator from Missouri will accept this amendment. It cannot impair the effect of the bill. It will make it certainly mean just exactly what it says it now means.

Mr. GREEN. If you are all willing, I have no objection.

Mr. STUART. After the word "grants," I move to insert "hereafter to be made."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Shall the question be taken on concurring in all the amendments together or separately?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to say a word upon the second amendment before it is passed upon by the Senate. I will ask the Secretary to read it.

The Secretary read the second amendment which is in line nine of section two after the word "State" to insert:

And that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to intervene or declare the construction of the constitution of any State except to see that it be republican in form and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there is to be debate, the Chair supposes it would be proper to dispose of the amendments in their order. If there be no objection, therefore, he will put the question on the first amendment in reference to the preamble.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I shall not, perhaps, object to taking the vote on all the amendments together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the first amendment, in regard to the preamble.

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Illinois now has the floor on the second amendment.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is a sufficient objection I apprehend, to this amendment, that it is wholly unmeaning. It can have no possible effect upon the bill which we are passing. It provides that nothing in this act shall prevent the people of Kansas from changing their form of government, and then goes on to say that it is not the intention of this provision to explain or to declare the meaning of the State constitution. Such a provision, I apprehend, is entirely nugatory, of no possible effect, and can do no good by being inserted in the bill, but it contains the assertion of a fact. It asserts that it is not the intention of this bill to change or modify in any respect the constitution of Kansas. I do not remember the precise language, but that is the purport. It has already been shown that the ordinance is a part of the constitution, and that this bill changes the ordinance. That however is answered by those who vote for the bill and for this amendment, by saying that the ordinance is no part of the constitution. Well, sir, admit that to be so. I take it that the boundaries of the State are a part of the constitution.

The first article of the constitution prescribes the boundaries of the State of Kansas. Now, sir, can Congress prescribe different boundaries from those adopted by the people of Kansas? You have disclaimed in this amendment any authority to alter or change the constitution as presented. You say you do not do it by rejecting the ordinance, but if you change the boundaries do you not change the constitution? Are they not a part of the constitution? It has been said that they are. Then how is Kansas admitted? If Congress passes a law that a region of country different from that which seeks admission into the Union as a State, shall be admitted, does that admit the country which has applied to be admitted with different boundaries? The bill proposing to admit Kansas, after describing the boundaries, contains this proviso:

"Provided, That nothing herein contained respecting the boundary of said State shall be construed to impair the rights of persons or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory, so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with such Indian tribe, is not, without the consent of said tribe, to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the State of Kansas, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said State, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to make if this act had never passed."

Now, sir, by this proviso there is excepted out of the State of Kansas all that tract of country which the Indians hold in the Territory of Kansas. There is an empire within an empire; a State within a State. Kansas might, and very likely would, object to coming into the Union with a district of country within her borders over which her jurisdiction did not extend, and a rendezvous for—

Mr. PUGH. The Kansas-Nebraska act expressly provides that we shall have the right to make that very provision at the time of her admission. It is reserved in the act of Congress creating the Territory.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is a very convenient way of arguing. Because your abominable Kansas-Nebraska act contained an abomination, and was full of iniquity, is that a reason for reenacting another? Suppose it was in the Nebraska act—

Mr. PUGH. Suppose it were ever so much an abomination, if we reserve a right in it, we could hold on to the right.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Because you do it in the Kansas-Nebraska act, therefore you can admit Kansas as a State with different boundaries from those the people of the State have prescribed! Is that the proposition? One of the important questions to be considered, according to the report of the Senator from Missouri, who is engineering this bill through the Senate, is whether the proposed State has proper boundaries. He says when you come to admit a State, you are to inquire, first, has she sufficient population; second, are her boundaries appropriate; and third, is her constitution republican? Now, you say her boundaries are not appropriate, and yet you are going to admit her. She has made no exception in her constitution, and if you have a right to except out the Indian country, you can change the constitution in any other respect. It is impossible to escape from this. It is here upon the record, and it is legislation by Congress to make a constitution for the people of Kansas, and on the part of those who disclaim all the time any right to interfere with the affairs of a State or Territory.

Mr. PUGH. It seems to me that there is absolutely nothing in the proposition of the Senator from Illinois. Who ever heard before that the people of a Territory could get together and make their boundaries at their own will, without the assent of Congress? Congress has always claimed, and has always exercised in the case of nearly every new State, the right to define its boundaries. It does not affect the constitution of the State; and I have never heard a respectable lawyer pretend before that it did. Why, sir, the Congress of the United States altered the boundaries of the State of Ohio after she had been more than thirty years in the Union; and the boundaries of the State of Michigan and others. But it is not worth while to waste time on this matter. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. STUART] seemed determined, in my absence yesterday, to misrepresent my argument. Now, I have got him on his own proposition. He says there was no provision for this constitution to be submitted to Congress. Here it is:

"This constitution shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States."

That is what Mr. Calhoun means in these two certificates, when he speaks of the constitution and ordinance being submitted, for they are dated on the 14th of January, long after all the votes.

Mr. STUART. I am sorry that the Senator should wish to have a controversy with me. I am very desirous to avoid it; but still if it is really insisted upon, I do not know but that if driven into controversy, I am as well fitted for it as anybody; but I declare to him I desire no such thing. I stated that the constitution provided for a submission to the people. I did not say that it did not provide for a submission to Congress. I said that it provided for a submission to the people. Having used that term of submission to the people, and that being really the submission which it meant, I inferred that the certificate alluded to the same thing. But the Senator is very much mistaken if he supposes I insist on misrepresenting either his argument or his position. I do not desire to do that with any Senator, and certainly not with the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In reply to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio I wish to say that there is not an instance of which I have any knowledge, and if one exists I should like it to be shown, where the Congress of the United States ever admitted a State into this Union with different boundaries from those she had prescribed for herself, without sending her constitution back. The State of Michigan was kept out of the Union for years, until she would agree to the boundaries which Congress thought proper to prescribe. I am not aware of a single instance where a State was ever admitted with different boundaries than those she had prescribed for herself. The usual way has been for Congress, in the first instance, by the passage of what is called an enabling act, to fix the boundaries, as was done in the case of Minnesota last year. I do not think the instance can be found where Congress has undertaken to admit into the Union a different tract of country from that which has formed a constitution.

Mr. PUGH. I repeat that the tract of country is of no consequence at all, and is no part of the constitution. The first constitution of the State of Ohio did not describe any boundaries at all—I did not say a word about boundaries.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made, as in Committee of the Whole, being in section two, line eleven, to strike out the word "of" and insert "annexed to," was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next amendment made in Committee of the Whole is to insert the words "hereafter to be made," after the word "grants," in the thirteenth line of the second section.

Mr. STUART. I have been asked to change the language of that amendment by saying "if hereafter made," instead of "hereafter to be made."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to, and the amendment, as modified, was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, being that offered by Mr. PUGH, to extend the laws of the United States to the new State of Kansas, and to provide for the organization of a district court therein; was concurred in.

The bill, as thus amended, was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, as follows:

An act for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union.

Whereas, the people of the Territory of Kansas did, by a convention of delegates, called and assembled at Leecompton, on the 4th day of September, 1857, for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which said constitution is republican, and said convention having asked the admission of said Territory into the Union as a State on an equal footing with the original States—

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Kansas shall be, and is hereby declared to be, one of the United States of America, and admitted to be, on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever. And the said State shall consist of all the territory included within the following boundary, to wit: beginning at a point on the thirty-seventh parallel of latitude crosses the same; thence west on said parallel to the eastern boundary of New Mexico; thence north on said boundary to latitude thirty-eight; thence following said boundary westward to the eastern boundary of the Territory of Utah, on the summit of the Rocky Mountains; thence northward on said summit to the fortieth parallel of latitude; thence east on said parallel to the western boundary of the State of Missouri; thence south with the western boundary of said State to the place of beginning: Provided, That nothing herein contained respecting the boundary of said State shall be construed to impair the rights of person or property now pertaining to the Indians in said Territory so long as such rights shall remain unextinguished by treaty between the United States and such Indians, or to include any territory which, by treaty with such Indian tribe, is not without the consent of said tribe to be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory; but all such territory shall be excepted out of the boundaries, and constitute no part of the State of Kansas, until said tribe shall signify their assent to the President of the United States to be included within said State, or to affect the authority of the Government of the United States to make any regulation respecting such Indians, their lands, property, or other rights, by treaty, law, or otherwise, which it would have been competent to make if this act had never been passed.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State of Kansas is admitted to the Union upon the express condition that said State shall never interfere with the primary disposal of the public lands, or with any regulations which Congress may find necessary for securing the title in said lands to the bona fide purchasers and grantees thereof, or impose or levy any tax, assessment, or imposition of any description whatever upon them, or other property of the United States, within the limits of said State; and that nothing in this act shall be construed to abridge or infringe any right of the people asserted in the constitution of Kansas at all times to alter, reform, or abolish their form of government in such manner as they may think proper, Congress hereby disclaiming any authority to interfere or declare the construction of the constitution of any State, except to see that it be republican in form, and not in conflict with the Constitution of the United States; and nothing in this act shall be construed as an assent by Congress to all or to any of the propositions or claims contained in the ordinance annexed to the said constitution of the people of Kansas, nor to deprive the said State of Kansas of the same grants, if hereafter made, which were contained in the act of Congress, entitled an "Act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government, preparatory to admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," approved February 26, 1857.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That until the next general census shall be taken, and an apportionment of representation made, the State of Kansas shall be entitled to one Representative in the House of Representatives of the United States.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the State of Kansas as hereinbefore provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within that State as in other States of the Union; and the said State is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court, with the like power and jurisdiction as the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa, shall be established. The judge, attorney, and marshal, of the United States for the said district of Kansas, shall reside within the same, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as the judge, attorney, and marshal, of the district of Iowa.

The bill was read the third time; and on the question of its passage, Messrs. WADE and WILSON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. IVERSON. Mr. President I have not troubled the Senate during the discussion of this measure, and I do not propose to do so now. I merely wish to submit a word or two in relation to one of the amendments which has been adopted. I allude to the amendment introduced by the Senator from Missouri, that makes a declaration recognizing the right of the people of Kansas to alter or change their constitution prior to the time prescribed in the instrument itself. I did not, when my name was called, vote on that proposition. I am opposed to it, and cannot give it my sanction. I barely wish to state now, in a few words as possible, the grounds of my opposition.

In the first place, I think it altogether nugatory and useless to incorporate such a proposition into the bill. If the people of Kansas have a right to change their constitution, according to their own mode, and in their own time, nothing contained in that declaration of the bill can confer it upon them, or take it away from them. If they have not the power, it does not confer the power. If they have the power, it is unnecessary to express it in this bill.

But, sir, I do not myself admit the power of the people of Kansas, under this constitution, to change their form of government prior to the time prescribed in the constitution, and in the mode which is there pointed out. I do not, and shall not on the present occasion, stop to elaborate this proposition. I merely state it as an objection which I have to this amendment, and I will not, by any vote of mine, recognize the right of the people of Kansas to change their constitution in any other form than that prescribed by the instrument itself, or at any time prior to that prescribed by the people of Kansas in convention assembled.

When my name was called, I did not respond, although I was in the Senate Chamber, for the reason that I found that I should be in a minority of one perhaps on this side of the Chamber, and might be found solitary and alone in the ranks of the Black Republicans on the other side of the Senate, and I considered it rather a dangerous thing to be found in such company; and, therefore, I chose not to place my name amongst them. I remembered that when I was a little boy, in conversation with an old and valued friend, he said to me, "my son, never find yourself in bad company; for if a flock of blackbirds should light upon a tree, and a pigeon should place himself among them, and a sportsman were to shoot at the flock, he would be just as apt to hit the pigeon as the blackbirds. [Laughter.] And now I advise you always to keep out of bad company." Practicing upon that principle on the present occasion, I chose not to vote in company with my friends on the other side of the Chamber, though I was opposed to that amendment.

The amendment, as I understood, was adopted by the friends of the Lecompton constitution in caucus. It might be supposed that I might subject myself to the imputation of having violated caucus obligations in not yielding my assent to the amendment. I beg to state in explanation, that I was not present at the caucus, and am not bound by its action. As I am opposed to the amendment in principle, I cannot give my consent to it.

But, however I may object to that amendment, Mr. President, I shall vote for the bill, notwithstanding its incorporation, because I think the principle of the bill is of much more importance than the amendment. I must confess, however, that my interest in this bill has very much diminished from transactions which I understand have occurred within the last few days. I allude to the proclamation of Mr. Calhoun, president of the convention, that gives certificates of election for members of the Legislature, in the county of Leavenworth, in Kansas, to the Black Republican or Abolition candidates, which throws the government of Kansas into the hands of the Abolitionists. I believe that this was an act of usurpation on the part of Mr. Calhoun; that he had no right and no power to look behind the official returns of the election. His business was to be governed by the official returns which were placed in his hands. So far as frauds were concerned which might have affected the qualification of members, that was a question exclusively appertaining to the Legislature itself when it assembled; and Mr. Calhoun had no power to act on mere information, as I understand he did act on the mere information of Governor Denver, or any other information of an ex parte or one-sided character. We know that these alleged frauds have been investigated by a one-sided and partisan portion of the people of Kansas. They have examined testimony to suit themselves. They have constituted their own judges, their own officers, and their own witnesses; and, judging from what I have seen there, and what we have heard, I take it for granted that they could prove anything they chose to prove. These certificates of election have been issued upon ex parte evidence in this way, without a proper examination, or giving the members who have been ejected by the certificates an opportunity of being heard.

I think it was an act of usurpation on the part of Mr. Calhoun to adopt this step, and I have regretted exceedingly to understand—I do not vouch for the truth of it—that this step has been taken on the advice of southern members of Congress. We know what is to be the effect of it. It is to put the power of the government of Kansas into the hands of the Abolitionists; and in less than six months from the time they take charge of the government, the atmosphere of Kansas will be so hot that not a decent southern man can stay in it, but there will be a general stampede of all the friends of the pro-slavery party from the State of Kansas. This is to be the effect of the step which Mr. Calhoun has taken in this case, and the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, although it is founded upon principle, and therefore I shall support it, will be nothing more than a bare assertion of principles, a victory entirely without fruits, and as such I care little or nothing about it. I shall vote for the bill as a matter of principle, but under the impression that the South gains nothing by the process.

Mr. HOUSTON. Mr. President, I have not occupied the time of the Senate on this subject, nor is it my present intention to do so. I have been very much interested in the discussion of the bill throughout the great number of days which it has occupied. I have been much instructed, and much edified, but I cannot say on all occasions, gratified by that discussion. But I have a few remarks to make before casting my vote. The Legislature of my State having superseded me in the Senate of the United States by the election of a successor for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March next, in harmony with my wishes, and which I refer to with sincere pleasure, I nevertheless feel that I have duties to perform to my constituents. It has always been a cardinal principle of my Democracy, that when the will of a constituency on any measure is known to the representative, he is bound to execute, in all good faith, that known will, or he is bound to resign his situation, in order that another may be selected who will carry out their views. I therefore vote for the bill, knowing it to be in accordance with the views of three fourths, at least, of the Legislature of Texas.

Mr. PUGH. The remark of the Senator from Georgia induces me to make a single observation before my name is called. I understand him to assert that the amendment on which he commented provides for an alteration of the constitution of the State of Kansas in a different method from that prescribed in the constitution itself.

Mr. IVERSON. No, sir; the Senator misunderstands me. I did not say it provided for that. I said it recognized the right of the people of Kansas to alter their constitution otherwise than in the mode prescribed in the constitution itself.

Mr. PUGH. I do not understand it so; but the principal complaint I have against the Senator from Michigan is, that if he is correctly reported, he charged me yesterday, and charged me untruly, with asserting that proposition, or in other words he set up a man of straw for the satisfaction of knocking him over, and that too when I was not able to attend in the Chamber. I have endeavored to find the Senator's speech. I can find no account of it but in the National Intelligencer, in which he is said to have "closed his able argument by contesting certain of the positions assumed by Mr. Pugh, in his recent defense of the general proposition that a majority of the people can change a constitution at their will, without respect to the mode prescribed in its body."

I not only never made any such proposition, but I denied it in express terms; and here it is in my speech. I said that I did not claim it, and I never claimed it, and this amendment does not claim it. In order that the Globe may put these two things together, I shall read one paragraph from my speech delivered one week ago to-day, on this point. I then said:

"Let me guard against misconception here. I do not say a constitution may not provide the manner of its amendment. I do not say that it may not interpose provisions calculated to require more thorough deliberation. I do not say that it may not require a majority of each House of the Legislature, or two thirds, or three fifths; because, after all, the Legislature is elected by the people, and what the people want they will compel the Legislature to grant. I do not say that the people may not require, to prevent hasty or improper action, that the question shall be submitted to them twice, or thrice, if you please; or that it shall remain so many months for consideration; or that notice of the intended amendment shall be published in this or that manner. I do not even complain of such provisions; but I say that when a constitution declares, as the Topeka constitution did, that in no manner, neither by a convention nor by the people, nor by the unanimous vote of all those who live under it, and all those who exercise authority under it, whether as legislators or executive officers, can it be changed—whenever a constitution declares that, the declaration is merely void; it needs no abrogation; it never had any life."

That was my proposition; and now Senators have got off a great quantity of cheap eloquence by misrepresenting the proposition. So it seems according to the report of what was said by the Senator from Michigan yesterday when I was prevented from attending in the Chamber. That is all I want to say on that subject; and now I am going to say a word to the bill.

A few moments ago, in obedience to the instructions of the Ohio Legislature, I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Kentucky; and in obedience to their instructions furthermore, I shall be compelled, reluctantly, against my own opinion of what the justice of the case is, to vote against this bill on its final passage. I wish it to be understood that I do it in accordance with instructions. My instructions are to vote against the admission of Kansas with this constitution. I shall so vote against her admission simply in my representative character in behalf of the General Assembly of Ohio.

Mr. WADE. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia whether I understood him to say that Mr. Calhoun proposed to give his certificates of election on the advice of certain southern members, or according to the truth of the vote? That struck me as a very extraordinary statement, and I should like to know whether I understood it correctly?

Mr. IVERSON. I do not recognize the right of the Senator from Ohio to catechise me on the subject; and, therefore, I decline answering.

Mr. WADE. I should be very much gratified to know what the fact is; but I shall not press the inquiry.

Mr. STUART. I know the anxiety of the Senate to take the vote on this bill, and I am certainly disinclined to delay them; but I have tried two or three times to put my honorable friend from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] right. I have assured him, in the strongest language I was capable of using, that I had no intention of misrepresenting him; and so far as I knew, I had not misrepresented him.

Mr. PUGH. Is what I have read a correct report of your speech?

Mr. STUART. The substance of what I said is probably correctly stated in the synopsis of the National Intelligencer. I took the ground that where a constitution prohibited any amendment, no amendment could constitutionally be made. I did not take the ground that the Senator now supposes; nor did I argue the modus operandi. I stated that there was in my opinion room for dispute as to whether this constitution did in terms prohibit any amendment prior to 1864. I said that was a debatable question; but if it prohibited any amendment before that time, I denied the power of the people of Kansas, in any legal mode, as the Senator made his proposition, to change it before that time. I said nothing in regard to the mode of doing it, further than this: that the Legislature could not pass a law upon an application of the people for a change of the constitution, against an express prohibition of the constitution under which they held their authority; that the only authority they had to pass a law at all, grew out of the constitution which created them; and when that constitution said there should be no amendment of it before 1864, if it said so, any law that the Legislature might pass, to provide for an amendment before that time, would be a nullity, falling before the supreme authority of the constitution itself. So, sir, I think the Senator will see that while I controverted his positions, I did not misrepresent them.

Now a single word in explanation. The Senator will remember that I notified him on Saturday evening, after I obtained the floor, that I should allude to his argument in the course of my remarks, and I requested him, if he could conveniently, to be here. I went on yesterday morning with my argument precisely as I had intended, and, I assure the Senator, saying nothing that I would not have said if he had been present, and stating nothing that I did not understand to be correct; and I think if he ever sees my speech in print, he will agree that I met his propositions fairly, simply denying their authority. I assure him now, in order that there may be no ground of complaint whatever, that I entertain for him the utmost respect, not only as a Senator but as a man, and that I would not misrepresent him here or elsewhere knowingly. Now, I hope the Senator will not hereafter suppose that I have courted any controversy with him on this subject.

Mr. MASON. I did not understand the Senator from Georgia to say that Mr. Calhoun had issued his late manifesto at the suggestion of anybody from the South.

Several SENATORS. Yes, he did.

Mr. MASON. If he did say so, I wish to declare, for myself, that I never heard of it, and never had any part or lot in it, being one of the members from the South.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, on the passage of the bill, resulted—yeas 33, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Digler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Evans, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Henderson, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Sebastian, Shildell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doollittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pugh,

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 24, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 80.

Seward, Summons, Stuart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—25.

So the bill was passed.

The vote was unusually full, being the votes of the whole Senate, with four exceptions. Of these, Mr. CAMERON did not vote, because he had paired off with Mr. DAVIS, who was too sick to be present. Mr. BATES has not taken his seat since his election to the body; and the same cause, severe sickness, has for some time detained Mr. REID at Richmond, Virginia.

The announcement of the passage of the bill was followed by demonstrations of applause in the galleries, which were checked by the Vice President.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GWIN. In order to have it simply as the unfinished business, I ask that the Pacific railroad bill (S. No. 65) be taken up, in order that we may afterwards adjourn, and give me the floor for to-morrow.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to know whether the manifestations of displeasure at such demonstrations as we have just had, are confined to cases when they are made on different occasions? I noticed that the Senator from Virginia interfered last night when manifestations of this sort were made. This time he did not.

Mr. MASON. I think the Senator will do me the justice to say that he saw the Senator from Virginia rise immediately in his place, and was about to call the attention of the Presiding Officer to it, when it was suppressed by his hammer. ["That is so."]

Mr. GWIN, Mr. DOUGLAS, and Mr. HAMLIN, claimed the floor.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California made a motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. I rise to make another motion; and that is, that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. GWIN. But the Senator cannot do it while I am on the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. But you submitted your motion.

Mr. GWIN. I have not yet done so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair then recognizes the Senator from California.

Mr. GWIN. I move that the Senate take up Senate bill No. 65, which is the special order, being the Pacific railroad bill, so that it may be left as unfinished business for to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from California will pause for a moment. The Senate must come to order. Gentlemen are requested to resume their seats, and not stand in the aisles.

Mr. GWIN. I merely wish the bill taken up now, so that, at one o'clock, it may come up for consideration as the unfinished business, it being the first and the oldest special order, and now the proper question to be taken up.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I regret that I am under the necessity of antagonizing again with the Senator from California. I shall feel constrained to give the preference to the bill to admit Minnesota into the Union as a State. I presume the principal objection to the prompt action on the Minnesota case is now removed, and I do not think it is just towards that new State to keep her out longer. I have not thought it just to keep her out this long. I feel it my duty to give notice that I will insist upon the Minnesota bill being first acted upon, and I am happy to hear my friend from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] say there is no objection to it. I see that the objection has been removed.

Mr. HAMLIN. There are various questions as we now see—

Mr. GWIN. What is the question under consideration before the Senate?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Maine has the floor on the motion of the Senator from California.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a controversy between the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from California as to which measure should receive precedence. It is, in my judgment, better not to determine that question to-night, when we are all exhausted; and I move, therefore, that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, March 23, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m. Prayer by Rev. B. N. BROWN.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXCUSED FROM SERVING ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. DICK. I ask that the motion of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUSTON] to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MASON] was excused from serving on the Committee of Accounts be taken up by the House.

Mr. HUSTON. I have been trying for some time to get the floor for the purpose of calling up that motion. I made an effort, more than a week ago, to withdraw, with the consent of the House, my motion, for the reason that it seemed as if I could not have an opportunity of getting the action of the House upon it, and it was delaying the action of the Committee of Accounts on the various accounts that had gone before them. For that reason I was disposed to withdraw it. If the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. CAMPBELL,] who made the objection to my withdrawal of the motion, were now in his seat, I should again propose to withdraw it. I am aware that I cannot withdraw it except the House should consent.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Alabama, that, by general consent, we may act now on his motion to reconsider.

Mr. HUSTON. I am perfectly willing to withdraw it.

Mr. MAYNARD. The gentleman from Ohio is not in his seat.

Mr. HUSTON. The gentleman is now in his seat.

Mr. CAMPBELL. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HUSTON. I then withdraw my motion to reconsider, and I ask leave to offer a resolution to which I presume there will be no objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk, the Doorkeeper, and the Postmaster, of the House of Representatives, each furnish to the House a list containing the names of each and every person appointed by each one of them, respectively, together with the services performed by said appointee, the salary or compensation each appointee receives for said services—specifying the law under which said appointment was made.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to the resolution.

Mr. HUSTON. The information is important to be had before the bill now before the Committee of Accounts shall be acted upon. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his objection. The resolution calls for information which we all need.

Mr. ENGLISH. Is debate in order?

Mr. HUSTON. I am not going to debate it. The gentleman is very sensitive. Objection was not withdrawn.

UTAH WAR CONTRACTS.

Mr. LOVEJOY asked leave to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be requested to furnish this House, with the least possible delay, a full and minute statement of all contracts made in connection with the Utah expedition, the names of the persons with whom such contracts were made, and also the prices paid, or to be paid, for horses, mules, corn, and all other articles furnished for said expedition; the places where the horses, mules, &c., are to be delivered, and the prices to be paid for transportation of all such supplies.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object. That might be exceedingly detrimental to the public service.

DEFICIENCY BILL—LIMIT OF DEBATE.

Mr. LETCHER. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. But first I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the general debate in Committee of the Whole, on the bill No. 306, shall close with the adjournment of the House on to-morrow, and from that time until four o'clock, p. m., on Friday next, the debate shall be strictly confined to the provisions of the bill; when all debate in Committee of the Whole shall terminate, and the committee shall proceed to vote on the pending amendments and such other amendments as may be offered to the bill.

Mr. GROW. I object to the resolution. It requires, I believe, unanimous consent for part of it as it proposes to change the rules of the House.

Mr. LETCHER. I would like to hear what the gentleman has to say about it.

Mr. GROW. The part of the resolution confining the debate to the bill under consideration is in violation of the rules of the House; and I, therefore, object to the resolution.

Mr. LETCHER. The bill is one of very great importance, involving nearly ten million dollars. It has been under debate here for nearly a week, and as yet not one solitary word has been said in respect to any of its provisions, except what I have spoken myself. I hope, therefore, that, in view of its importance, this short space of time of two days, out of so long a time, will be devoted to it, that objections to any of its provisions may be stated, so that an opportunity to answer them may be given before the House is called upon to vote.

Mr. GROW. I am certainly as anxious as any other member to have that bill discussed. But I am opposed to those attempts which have been made during the present session to change the rules of the House so as to cut off all general debate, and all debate upon any subject if the majority choose to put the previous question upon it.

Mr. LETCHER. I then propose to modify my resolution so as to terminate the debate upon the adjournment of the House on Thursday next.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to that.

Mr. HUSTON. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as objecting to the reception of a resolution for terminating debate upon this bill?

The SPEAKER. To the form of the resolution. The gentleman has no right to object to the introduction of a resolution in the usual form, closing debate.

Mr. HUSTON. If the gentleman from Virginia has a right to introduce a resolution closing debate, I suppose he has the right to terminate the general debate to-morrow and all debate the next day.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman proposed to regulate the manner in which the debate shall be conducted in committee. It is not a change of the rules, but it is a change of the practice of the House.

Mr. GROW. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that he should modify the resolution so as to close debate at the adjournment of the House on Friday next.

Mr. HUSTON. I would ask my friend from Virginia if this bill cannot be laid aside in committee, and some other bill taken up for discussion? It is evident that we shall have no discussion upon the merits of the bill now. It is the most important appropriation bill that has been before us; and it ought not to be disposed of without debate.

Mr. LETCHER. My proposition was to secure some debate upon the bill itself. I will accept the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, and modify the resolution so as to close debate at four o'clock on Friday next.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman will make it on the adjournment of the House of Friday.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I hope some time will be allowed for the discussion of the bill itself.

Mr. LETCHER. That is just what I have been trying to do.

Mr. GROW. I insist on my motion to lay the resolution on the table, and ask the yeas and nays upon the motion.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion to lay the resolution on the table was disagreed to—ayes 62, noes 74.

The question then recurred upon the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BOCK. It may be proper for me to say that if debate is closed on this bill on Friday, I shall, if I am in the Chair, give the floor on that day to gentlemen desiring to discuss the bill.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. I move to amend the resolution so as to close the debate at the close of the session of the House on Friday.

Mr. CHAFFEE. Friday is private bill day. I object to the debate on this bill being closed on that day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The gentleman has no right to object.

Mr. LETCHER. If the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WALBRIDGE] will make the resolution satisfactory, I will modify it so as to close debate at the adjournment of the House on Friday next.

Mr. STANTON. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will take some course by which we shall have some debate upon this bill. This is an important bill, and it is evident we shall have no discussion upon it if we are to dispose of it in this manner.

Mr. LETCHER. Is there any probability that we ever can have any debate upon the bill?

Mr. GROW. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Virginia, to lay aside this bill until some time when we can have discussion on it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I ask for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLINGMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RICE M. BROWN.

Mr. HUGHES. I desire to present the memorial of Rice M. Brown for reference to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. That can be done under the rules.

Mr. MORGAN. I object, unless we know what the memorial is.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk proceeded to read the memorial.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object to that. Let it be presented under the rules, as all others are.

COTTON STATISTICS.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report of John Claiborne, special agent to collect statistics of the consumption of cotton in Europe; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

LANDS IN ILLINOIS AND INDIANA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Department of the Interior, in reply to the resolution of the House calling for a statement of the quantity of unsold public lands in Illinois and Indiana; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

SALARY OF SURVEYOR GENERAL OF UTAH.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Treasury Department respecting an item omitted in the deficiency bill of $1,500, on account of the salary of the surveyor general of Utah; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to introduce a resolution calling for information necessary to be had before a committee.

Mr. HUGHES. I object.

RAILROAD FROM DUBUQUE TO SIOUX CITY.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave to present a communication from the Department of the Interior, in reply to a resolution of the House of the 16th instant, calling for information relative to the construction of a railroad from Dubuque to SiouX City, and a branch from the mouth of Tete des Morts.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask that that communication be read; it is short.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I object to it.

The question recurred on Mr. LETCHER's motion; and it was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BOCK in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the

DEFICIENCY BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLOGG] was entitled to the floor, to conclude his speech commenced last evening.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose yesterday I was referring, in connection with the Kansas question, to the history of the last few years. I propose this morning to linger for a few moments on this point.

To resume my remarks where I left off yesterday, Mr. Chairman. As if determined that the full scope of their object should be clearly defined, and the policy of the late Administration, an Administration so like the present that the one seems but an elongation of the other, should be fully committed to the enterprise, at least by implication, we find in one of the newspaper organs of the pro-slavery interest in Kansas, not long prior to the spring election of 1855, the following language:

"The South must be up and doing; Kansas must and shall be a slave State. Mark what we say, southern freemen! Come along with your negroes, and plow up every inch of ground that is at this time disgraced and defaced by an abolition plow. Send the scoundrels back to whence they came, or send them to hell—it matters not which destination; suit your own convenience. Sound the bugle of war over the length and breadth of the land, and leave not an Abolitionist in the Territory to relate their treacherous and contaminating deeds. Strike your piercing rifle-balls and your glittering steel to their black and poisonous hearts; let the war-cry never cease in Kansas again, until our Territory is divested of the last vestige of abolitionism."

Again, Acheson, the acknowledged champion of General Pierce and his administration, in Missouri and Kansas, boldly, distinctly, and defiantly declared the objects of these hostile movements on Kansas, and called on those for whom he acted to come to the rescue—yea, to the conflict of freedom and slavery; and to never cease that conflict until freedom should, with drooping pinions, leave that rich garden spot of God's creation, a fit abode for freemen, to the polluting foot-prints of oppression, and the lowering clouds of slavery. In his appeal to the people of Georgia, he uses the following significant language, significant from its boldly-implied assumption, that no interference was to be expected from the General Government—"Kansas must be a slave State, or Missouri must have free institutions."

Here, sir, is the threatened evil; here is the dire calamity Missouri fears.

Free institutions! the very name of which madens her hot blood, and lights up the fires of civil war. But, sir, what institutions, does she want? Does she want institutions of tyranny and oppression, the antagonisms of free institutions? Does she love so well the institution that has borne as mountains' weight on her vital energies; that has crippled her powers, and prevented her rapid, onward march, in this day of progress? Does she fear the institutions that gave her sister State, Illinois, three thousand miles of railroad, before she had as many hundred; that has enabled Illinois to convert her prairies into one vast cultivated field, to build and scatter towns and cities broadcast, through her whole extent, and to nurture, feed, and support Missouri's only city, St. Louis? While Missouri can hardly boast, beside St. Louis and St. Joseph, a town of five thousand inhabitants. To this let her people answer.

He continues:

"Let your young men come forth with Missouri and Kansas. Let them come well armed, and with money enough to support them for twelve months, and determined to see this thing out. I do not see how we are to avoid civil war. Come it will. Twelve months will not elapse before war, civil war, of the fiercest kind, will be upon us. We are arming and preparing for it; indeed, we of the border counties are prepared. We must have the support of the South. We are fighting the battles of the South. Our institutions are at stake. We want men—armed men. We want money. Let your young men come on in squads, as fast as they can be raised, well armed."

With these declarations, loudly proclaimed and vauntingly published, the entire legislative branch of the territorial government was usurped into the hands and control of the pro-slavery influence by an invading, voting force of over four thousand inhabitants of Missouri; who, on their return to Missouri, amid rejoicings and the music of bands, reported that "not an anti-slavery man will be in the Legislature of Kansas. We have made a clean sweep." And thus, amidst all the light and knowledge of the nineteenth century, in republican, free America, human slavery was extended and established, at the sacrifice of the dearest right of freemen—the elective franchise. And all this fell on the dull ear of the Executive without arousing him from the trance-like dream of that golden bauble—a second term—so securely held in the hands of that interest before which he crouched in abject submission. But when Governor Reeder, a just man, seeing the sources and channels of legislative power corrupted by fraud and obstructed by violence, interposed his official influence to purify and purge the legislative returns, then the quick ear of the President heard the wailing cry of his friends, and his eagle eye saw executive intolerance in the affairs of Kansas, and Governor Reeder went into retirement. Governor Geary found, in like manner, that any recognition of the rights of the free-State citizens of Kansas subjected him to the disapprobation of the pro-slavery power, and consequent removal. And, sir, to further show that the basis of this movement was slavery extension, and so understood in a large portion of this Union during the late presidential campaign, I desire to read from the Richmond Enquirer, of 1856, in which I find the following avowal of the issues involved in that campaign:

"The Democrats of the South, in the present canvass, cannot rely on the old grounds of defense and excuse for slavery; for they seek not merely to retain it where it is, but to extend it into regions where it is unknown. Much less can they rely on the mere constitutional guarantees of slavery; for such reliance is pregnant with the admission that slavery is wrong, and but for the Constitution should be abolished.

"Northern Democrats need not go thus far. They do not seek to extend slavery, but only to agree to its extension, as a matter of right on our part. They may prefer their own social system to ours. It is best that they should. Our friends are conservatives at home and conservatives of the Union, conservative of religion, of marriage, of property, of State institutions, and of Federal institutions; but whilst they may prefer their own social system, will have to admit in this canvass that ours is also rightful and legitimate, and sanctioned alike by the opinions and usages of mankind, and by the sanction and express injunctions of Scripture. They cannot consistently maintain that slavery is immoral, inexpedient, and profane, and yet continue to submit to its extension.

"We know that we utter bold truths; but the time has now arrived when their utterance can be no longer postponed. The true issue should stand out so boldly and clearly that none may mistake it."

Slavery enjoined by the Scriptures! That Book of liberty and life, the mission of which on earth is to expand, elevate, and ennoble the mind and soul, enjoin the observance of that slavery which, under the penalty of bars and chains, prohibits a knowledge of its truths, or the ability to read its pages—that degrades and enslaves the mind and soul of human beings! No, sir; it is not so. It is a slander on that sacred record; it is a slander on God and His attributes.

And now, sir, will gentlemen of the Democratic party who, during the last campaign, did declare that slavery was immoral, inexpedient, and profane, from the stump, in the papers, in public and in private, now consider these so-called "bold truths" then and now uttered, and no longer avoid the issue so boldly and clearly made and presented that "none may mistake it."

Mr. Chairman, I assume to say that the Republican party have not heretofore, nor do they now, mistake the real, the true issue. And, sir, I much mistake the signs of the times, if the people, now aroused by the developments made in the more advanced stage of this crusade against freedom, do not, in the future, so clearly comprehend and appreciate the real issue, that no party allegiance can seduce them from a firm maintenance of their rights at whatever cost or sacrifice; and that they will proclaim, through the potent agency of the ballot-box, and by their Representatives upon this floor, that such wrongs must cease, come from what quarter they may. And, sir, unless they do, they are but fit subjects for the iron heel of oppression.

Again, sir, the President, in his message but recently received in this House, has taken occasion to brand a large majority of the people of Kansas as adhering with treasonable pertinacity to a government in direct opposition to the government recognized by Congress. And for what offense is this wholesale charge of treason and traitor made? Why simply and only because the inhabitants of Kansas—oppressed and wronged by invasion from Missouri, deprived of representation in their own Legislature, their towns burned, their citizens murdered, their country laid waste, and every principle of the organic law of the Territory violated—after having petitioned the General Government for relief, without success, and having been refused protection when demanded, called a convention, framed a constitution, and asked of the Congress of the United States to be admitted, as an independent State, into the Union. They asked not themselves to supersede the territorial government—their movement was in subserviency to that government, and would so remain, until the territorial government should be superseded by the action of Congress itself, in the admission of such new State. This was the letter and spirit of the movement for which they have been denounced as traitors and rebels. That constitution has been twice submitted to a direct vote of the people, and each time received a majority of all the votes in the Territory; and each time with the avowed purpose of submitting it to Congress for approval; thus directly acknowledging the power of the Government over all her organic laws in the Territory.

But, sir, this was not the objection. The real objection was, the Topeka constitution prohibited slavery and ran counter to the darling object of that portion of the Union in whose hands are held the issues of life and death of presidential aspirants. This act was the act of the people, a large majority of the people of Kansas, as I presume will be admitted on all sides of this House; still they are called rebels, traitors, and dangerous disturbers of the peace of the nation.

Why does not the President denounce the people of Minnesota, they having formed a constitution with a view to admission into the Union, have elected members of a State Legislature who are now in session, assuming to exercise control over and to pass laws for the government of the people of Minnesota; and yet it is not a State—not a member of this Confederacy. Her territorial government has not been abrogated by Congress, and yet it is practically abrogated by the assumed State government. True, they had an enabling act, yet you and they acknowledge the further action of Congress necessary to their admission and the abrogation of their territorial government. This action of Congress was what the people of Kansas asked for their Topeka constitution; nothing more, nothing less; but the interest of slavery demanded the one, and not the other; hence the one is legal, the other treasonable.

Sir, is this the low estate to which the Chief Magistrate of this great nation has fallen when talking officially of a hundred thousand freemen, as loyal to our Government as any people on earth, and whose only crime is, they love freedom and hate oppression in any form?

I have followed these indications, thus far, for the purpose of showing that the same cause and object that prompted the first wrong in Kansas has produced like results until the present hour; and for the further purpose of showing that the continued, pertinacious, and determined prosecution of the original design proves, conclusively, that no change of policy will be adopted by our opponents until the great question that lies at the bottom of all this is fully and frankly met and decided. And, sir, this question is reaching its culminating point; this momentous question must and will be decided. Whatever its results, however startling its consequences, a decision must soon be made; the day of compromises has passed; and I wish gentlemen to understand that we do not propose or desire a compromise upon this subject. It admits of no compromise. I believe that the people of the North have calmly and deliberately taken their position on this question, with a determination not to recede, but with an equal determination not to ask more than is their just right.

The immediate proposition, Mr. Chairman, then is, shall Kansas become one of the States of this Union, under the Lecompton constitution? Not, sir, whether the Topeka constitution, so called, is right, or whether it has received the approbation of a majority of the people of that Territory; but simply, will Congress declare the Lecompton constitution the organic law of the State of Kansas, under all the facts and circumstances within our knowledge concerning the condition and wants of the people of that Territory? And this must depend, not only upon their wishes, but also on the authority of Congress in the premises.

The Constitution of the United States declares that "new States may be admitted into this Union." Here is found the only power, in my judgment, that Congress possesses on the subject of the formation or admission of new States. This part of the Constitution, construed with a view to and in accordance with the theory of our Government, contains ample and abundant power to accomplish the object designed, and yet in no wise infringes the great elementary principle of our Government, that the people, in their sovereign capacity, have the right, unrestricted, to form and alter their own government at will. This provision most clearly contemplates the action of two distinct powers—one, the new State seeking admission; the other, the United States Government, to which application is made. It assumes and declares that Congress is to deal with the applicant for admission as a community prepared in form of political organization, to immediately, on admission, assume the character and position of an independent State. And nowhere in the Constitution will gentlemen be able to find any power in Congress to make or form State governments, but do find, in the clause before referred to, the express recognition of the principle that the people of the State applying for admission have exercised their inherent power of sovereignty in the organization of a State government; and which only requires the consent of Congress to perfect its character as one of the States of this Union. It will be perceived that this view is correct, and in consonance with the theory of the Government of our Confederacy, when we reflect that each State government is the result of the action of the people of each State, and that the General Government is the result of the action of the States. Hence the States form the national Government, and give it all its power, which is utterly inconsistent with the position that the General Government does, or can, form or induce the forming or creation of a new State. Here, then, by an almost irresistible implication, is the right of the people of our Territories to form a State government preparatory to admission into the Union. On the other hand, the power of Congress in this clause is plain, simple, and direct; full and plenary in its grant of discretionary power to admit or reject, but full only to that extent, and no implication beyond that; because such construction would be a direct attack upon the sovereign power of the people, which is recognized and acknowledged as a natural and constitutional right.

Nor does this view of the subject in any degree impair the doctrine that the sovereign power for the government of the Territories rests in Congress, by virtue of the Constitution; for while the people of a Territory may, by reason of their inherent and constitutional right, of their own motion, prepare a State government for admission, still, until such admission is consummated by the action of Congress, such organization cannot perform the functions of a State government; and the people must remain under, and subject to, the territorial government until that government is abrogated by the action of Congress itself, by the admission of a new State. Hence the procedure of the people in such case is not in conflict with, but in subserviency to, the power of Congress in the Territories.

I am aware, Mr. Chairman, that the opinion prevails to some extent that enabling acts, commonly so called, are indispensable to the formation of a State government by the people of a Territory. But, in my judgment, they are, when they assume the right to direct the mode, time, and manner, when and by which a people are to proceed in fixing and establishing their own organic act, in direct conflict with the spirit of the Constitution and the rights of the people.

The very nature and character of a State organic law repels the assumption that its authority can be found in legislation anywhere. It is the first breathing of the sovereign power of the people; it is the formation of an independent sovereignty—a power higher and above all legislation. It is the power from which legislation may result. If it is, then, the right of the people, in their sovereign capacity, either as a natural or constitutional right, how, and with what reason, can it be contended that it can be controlled by legislation, territorial or national? And here, in connection with this view of the subject, I propose a reference to the opinions of American statesmen and jurists:

Extracts from the works of James Wilson, of Pennsylvania, formerly Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States.

"Permit me to mention one great principle, the vital principle I may well call it, which diffuses animation and vigor through all the others. The principle I mean is this: that the supreme or sovereign power of the society resides in the citizens at large; and that, therefore, they always retain the right of abolishing, altering, or amending this constitution, at whatever time, and in whatever manner, they shall deem it expedient."—Vol. 1, p. 17.

"As to the people, however, in whom the sovereign power resides: from their authority the constitution originates; for their safety and felicity it is established; in their hands it is as clay in the hands of the potter: they have the right to mold, to preserve, to improve, to refine, and to finish it as they please. If so, can it be doubted that they have the right likewise to change it?"—Vol. 1, p. 418.

Again, Judge Story, in commenting on the sovereign power of the people in forming the first general or national Government, says:

"Thus was organized, under the auspices and with the consent of the people, acting directly in their primary, sovereign capacity, and without the intervention of the functionaries to whom the ordinary powers of government were delegated in the Colonies, the first general or national Government."

"The Congress thus assembled exercised, de facto and de jure, a sovereign authority—not as the delegated agents of the Government de facto of the Colonies, but in virtue of original powers derived from the people."—Story's Commentaries on the Constitution, vol. 1, pp. 185, 186.

This power being, then, paramount to all law, it follows that any abridgment of it would be a restriction and abridgment of the rights of the people in their first great act of sovereignty; and this principle applies as well to the legislative acts of Congress as to the acts of a Territorial Legislature.

But again, sir: what right has Congress to prescribe conditions to the people in the formation of a State constitution? I know of none. The Constitution only provides that Congress may admit new States, not form them; and there being a discretion as to such admission, it can, of course, reject, so that the only power that Congress can exert is a negative power—the power to refuse such State admission and nothing more. If, however, Congress has power over the subject of the formation of new States, such legislation is binding; otherwise, its acts would be without force. It will hardly be denied that Congress has no power to compel the people of a Territory to assume a State form of government; and yet most clearly it would possess that power, if by the passage of an enabling act you can direct the mode, manner, and time of the formation of a State constitution. With such power conceded, it would only be necessary for Congress to direct the holding of a convention, under such restrictions as might be designated, to form a constitution, in order to compel the people of a Territory to assume a government in form and character opposed to their wishes, and in direct conflict with their acknowledged sovereignty in forming the government under which they live; and if Congress does not possess this power, I ask in what consists the validity of congressional enabling acts? And if Congress does not possess this power, most clearly Territorial Legislatures do not, they possessing only the power that Congress could, and may have delegated in their territorial organic acts.

I, therefore, can but consider all enabling acts inappropriate, only when the justness and propriety of their provisions commend them to the approbation of the people to be affected, as convenient advisory rules of action for the people, in declaring their will, but of no more force than any regulations adopted in primary meetings or conventions of the people for the same object. And in no other view can enabling acts be considered consistent with the principle of the sovereignty of the people in forming their own organic law, preparatory to asking admission into this Union. Mr. Madison, in considering the mode and manner of the formation of new governments, and the change and alterations of existing ones, with a direct view to the sovereignty of the people, in abolishing or altering governments, uses this language:

"They [the members of the convention] must have refleeted, that in all great changes of established governments, forms ought to give way to substance; that a rigid adherence in such cases to the former would render nominal and nugatory the transcendent and precious right of the people to 'abolish or alter their Government as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness,' since it is impossible for the people spontaneously and universally to move in concert towards their object; and it is therefore essential that such changes be instituted by some informal and unauthorized propositions, made by some patriotic and respectable citizen, or number of citizens. They must have recollected, that it was by this irregular and assumed privilege of proposing to the people plans for their safety and happiness, that the States were first united against the danger with which they were threatened by their ancient government; that committees and congresses were formed for concentrating their efforts, and defending their rights, and that conventions were elected in the several States for establishing the constitutions under which they are now governed. Nor could it have been forgotten that no little ill-timed scruples, no zeal for adhering to ordinary forms, were anywhere seen, except in those who wished to indulge, under these masks, their secret enmity to the substance contended for."—Federalist.

From this it will be seen that, in the opinion of Mr. Madison, no legislative sanction or guides are necessary to direct the people in the exercise of their sovereign power. He deemed it competent for those in whose hands was the power to direct its use.

Mr. Chairman, I deduce from all this that the manner in which the object is accomplished is not material, so that a conviction has been produced on the minds of this body that the measure has received the approbation and consent of the people to be affected by it. And it will not, with me, bear the weight of a rush whether the constitution, now presented, was formed under the auspices of congressional or territorial legislation, informal conventions, or the Lecompton-convention even, provided the people have ratified it, and given their consent to its provisions. Then, sir, and not until then, should it be considered the act and deed of the people of Kansas. This I submit as my answer to all that class of argument which has been relied on to prove that the Lecompton constitution should meet the approbation of this House, because it was, as is claimed, formed under the color and form of the law.

And this I understand to be the principle to be deduced from the action of our Government, from its formation to the present time, in the admission of new States. Enabling acts have been passed and acted upon, and yet States have been admitted without them; constitutions have been submitted to a direct vote of the people, and yet States have been admitted without such vote; but in no case, even for a moment, has the idea been seriously entertained of admitting a new State into this Union without a submission of its constitution to a fair and direct vote of the people for approval or rejection, where there was a question even in relation to the acquiescence of the entire people in its provisions. If the people are all satisfied with a proposed constitution, and that is made known by mass meetings, conventions, or otherwise, a vote under such circumstances might be dispensed with; but even then such course would be of doubtful expediency, and I know of no way by which the will of a people can be as well and fairly known, as by the submission of the question to be decided to a direct vote. And it is certainly extraordinary that the people of Kansas should be denied that mode of the expression of their will in the important act of the formation of their State constitution, when it is remembered that this mode of decision is adopted in all questions in our national or State Governments, either of a political or organic character, from the least to the greatest. And if no other object was to be attained but a clear expression of the opinions of the people of Kansas, I doubt not this vexed question would be soon settled.

This view of the subject seems to have been entertained by Mr. Buchanan so late as the date of his instructions to Mr. Walker, then Governor. He says:

"The sacred right of each individual must be preserved, and that being accomplished, nothing can be fairer than to leave the people of the Territory, free from all interference, to decide their own destiny for themselves."

Again:

And it would have been fortunate for the country if Mr. Buchanan had entertained these views but for a few brief months longer; but all earthly things are changeable. Change is written upon all around us, and nowhere more plainly than in the policy of the present Administration in regard to the affairs of Kansas. At one time laboring under the delusion that the pro-slavery party in Kansas had in their influence a majority of the votes, it was safe to talk of the "sacred rights of each individual;" but, sir, when he awoke to the unwelcome fact that at least three fourths of the inhabitants were opposed to slavery, "a change came o'er the spirit of his dream;" and then, sir, before his distorted imagination, was presented the bonds of union broken, and the nation in ruin, unless Kansas becomes a slave State. And as if lashed and goaded with a recollection of the past, he implores the people of Kansas to receive the Lecompton constitution, with the sickly assurance that the time will come when they will be permitted to be a free people in the changing of their own constitution.

Mr. Chairman, it is well known and so admitted, that the great and almost only question involved in the controversy of the Lecompton constitution, is the question of slavery; and whatever may be said to the contrary, it is nevertheless true that that is the question recognized by the country as paramount to all other questions now at issue. No other question could have so aroused the country, and worked such astounding results in dissolving the iron bands of party allegiance. And on this question the people of this nation are in advance of the politicians, and are leading their forces to a direct solution of this unfortunate yet important question on which the people of Kansas have been denied the right of a fair vote in the submission of the Lecompton constitution.

But it is said that this constitution has been fairly submitted to a vote of the people for their approval or rejection. The convention which framed this constitution, with all its acts of fraud, and in this they could boast great attainments, were not bold enough to assume the power to enforce their constitution without some appearance of a submission of it to a vote of the people, and in this is conceded the want of power in the convention to declare what shall be the provisions of the constitution without the ratification of the people. With what reason, then, can our opponents say that the members of the Lecompton convention were the proper persons to exercise the entire sovereign power of the people? They themselves did not assume that power; the constitution assumes to provide for a vote, and they pretended to submit it to a vote of the people. But, sir, they intended to cheat and defraud the people into a ratification of their acts, by requiring an affirmative, and not permitting a negative vote. Hence, they provided for its submission in the following manner: they declared that the constitution should be submitted "to all the white male inhabitants of this Territory for approval or disapproval;" and "that the ballots cast at said election shall be indorsed 'constitution with slavery' and 'constitution without slavery,' and that if a majority should be found for the constitution with slavery, the constitution should be transmitted to Congress; but if there was a majority for the constitution without slavery, then the article providing for slavery should be stricken out; but the right of property in slaves then in the Territory should in no manner be interfered with."

This mode and kind of submission could not be dignified with the character of even apparent fairness. It was esteemed by the people—and justly so, I believe—as an unqualified insult to the free-State men. They, as conscientious men, were opposed to slavery, and desired to make Kansas a free State. They had been taught that freedom was no crime. They had been taught, and believed, that they had as clear a right to vote Kansas, not only partly, but entirely a free State, as the pro-slavery men had to vote it a slave State in whole or in part; but of this they were deprived. True, sir, on condition of adopting all other parts of the constitution, with its (in their estimation) monstrous provisions, they might exercise the poor privilege of not making Kansas a free State, but of making it a lesser slave State. And in this manner every man was compelled to vote for slavery, or not to vote at all. This, sir, no honest free-State man could do. Sir, it was an insult and mockery. If they believed that slavery was wrong—and I suppose they had a right to believe so—I submit to any honest, honorable mind, whether the fact of there being one thousand or one hundred thousand slaves in Kansas, held by authority of its constitution, could make one particle of difference in the principle. And, sir, I put no high estimate of honorable intention on the motives of him who honestly desired Kansas to become a free State, that could accommodate his conscience to voting it a perpetual slave State, although it might be restricted in the number of its slaves. And this being the only question on which a vote could be cast, it did, in effect and practically so, deny the right of free suffrage to every free-State man in that Territory; and no one can fairly escape from this conclusion. How many slaves there were, or is now, I know not; nor do I care, for the purpose of this argument. Men had a right to vote for a free government, without spot or blemish. This has been denied them. With what grace they will submit to this decision, time must determine.

But not content with this monstrous provision, at section nine of the schedule we find the following:

"Sec. 9. Any person offering to vote at the aforesaid election upon said constitution shall be challenged to take an oath to support the Constitution of the United States, and to support this constitution, under the penalties of perjury under the territorial laws."

Sir, human ingenuity was profuse of evil schemes, at the formation of this constitution, to prevent any opposition to its provisions. Submitted fairly, says the President, for approval or rejection; submitted "for approval or disapproval," is the language of the schedule, and yet before a man could vote at that election, he must raise his hand before God and man, and swear to support the very instrument he abhors, and which we are told he could disapprove and reject by his vote. Was common honesty ever more at fault? Now I demand, in the name of reason and truth, can he who possesses one honorable impulse or truthful emotion reject, oppose, or disapprove a constitution he has solemnly sworn to support, by a vote given on the condition of such an oath? But, as if not content with this effect of the prescribed oath, we find in the constitution the following provision, to which this oath extends, pledging, under the pains and penalties of perjury, the support of the voter to its principles:

"Sec. 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave and its increase is the same, and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Was ever such oath required before? Never; no, never. And no emergency could now have induced its requirement but the establishment of human slavery. The view I have taken of the result of this submission is fully admitted in a recent number of the Charleston Mercury. That paper contains the following:

"We lay before our readers this morning the message of the President of the United States. It is, as was to be expected, an able document, sound in almost all of its positions, and worthy of the Chief Magistrate of our great confederated Republic. The main point of difficulty and delicacy is in the affairs of Kansas. He thinks that the convention of Kansas, in submitting only the clause in the constitution relating to slavery, has fulfilled what he supposes to be the requisition of the Kansas-Nebraska act. We are equally satisfied with the action of the convention. We differ, too, with the President as to what is submitted to the vote of the people. We do not think that the question of slavery or no slavery is submitted to the vote of the people. Whether the clause in the constitution is voted out or voted in, slavery exists, and has a guarantee in the constitution that it shall not be interfered with; whilst, if the slavery party in Kansas can keep or get the majority of the Legislature, they may open wide the door for the immigration of slaves. But this, also, is a small matter of difference with the President. It is enough for us that he goes with the South in the policy of admitting Kansas into the Union with the constitution she shall present, whether with or without the slavery clause. We heartily support his policy, although we may not agree in all his reasoning. And, above all, we rejoice for the sake of our old partiality, and our advocacy of him before he reached the illustrious dignity of the Presidency, that he has not soiled his fame by identifying it with Walker."

The same result is admitted in the Lecompton Democrat, of November 19, in which, speaking of the submission of the constitution to the people, it says:

"But, at all events, the slavery question should have been fully and fairly put to the people for their decision. This, as we understand it, has not been done. No matter how the people may vote, if this constitution should prevail, Kansas will be a slave State. We would not object to this result if the people should so will it; but we think they should have a full opportunity to determine the character of the institutions of the new State."

And thus while it is claimed that the slavery clause was fairly submitted for approval or rejection, it must be conceded by all, that in no event could Kansas be other than a slave State.

But gentlemen, to escape these conclusions, assume that the people of Kansas, who did not vote, tacitly acquiesced in the vote on the constitution taken in December last. No such inference can be legitimately drawn. The free-State men were prevented by the terms of the submission from voting, as has been shown. How, then, can an implication arise of acquiescence by not voting? He only is concluded by the vote of others, when he himself might have voted. But, sir, there is no question of implication.

The people of Kansas are known to be opposed, by a large majority, to the Lecompton constitution. This, sir, is a matter of history of the day; and so conscious is the President of their determined opposition that he denominates their acts rebellion. This should be an answer to the subtleties of his supporters. But the people have acted directly on this question, and their will and opinions are no longer a matter of conjecture. On the 4th of January last, the people cast a vote of over twelve thousand against the Lecompton constitution in an election where frauds were not even charged, being a majority of nearly seven thousand over the vote cast in December for it, and in this estimate, I doubt not that I calculate for it, not less than twenty-five hundred fraudulent votes. Again, at the election for members of the Territorial Legislature, and for Delegate to Congress, the people, in a most unequivocal manner, decided for a free State by a large and decided majority, and yet we are told that the people of Kansas, while using every means in their power to prevent the adoption of a slave constitution, are to be presumed as acquiescing in the means used to make it a slave State. This is a kind of reasoning and logic, I think, but seldom used, and will not, I believe, be favorably appreciated by the country.

In view of all these facts, I can but consider this pretended submission as a trick and fraud upon the people, and should not, and I trust will not, be sustained.

In support of the opinion of the fraudulent design of those who originated and produced the Lecompton constitution, I desire to submit a statement of Mr. Stanton, late acting-Governor of Kansas. In his address to the people of the United States, speaking of the pro-slavery party in Kansas, he says:

"It was apparent that all the machinery had been artfully prepared for a repetition of gross frauds, similar to those which had been attempted in October; and it was in view of all these facts, after the adjournment of the convention, that the people of the Territory, by an almost unanimous demand, called upon me, as the acting Governor, to convene an extra session of the Legislature, in order to enable them peaceably to protect themselves against the wrongs evidently contemplated by the adoption of this constitution."

Again, in the same address, he says:

"Recent events have shown that their apprehensions were well founded. Enormous frauds have been perpetrated at the precincts of Oxford, Shawnee, and Kickapoo; and it may well be believed that this result was actually designed by the artful leaders who devised the plan and framework of the Lecompton constitution."

And now, through these means, and such agencies, a constitution is presented for our approval, establishing slavery in its largest extent; and the anomaly is presented of Congress, being urged by the Executive, to place Kansas in the Union as a State under a constitution which a large majority of the people detest and abhor, and with their Delegate in Congress, elected upon that issue by a majority of some five thousand free-State votes, opposing her admission; and, also, with a known majority of at least four to one of her people protesting that the constitution presented is not their act, or the embodiment of their will.

But, Mr. Chairman, there are other considerations that commend themselves more properly to the discretionary power of Congress; I mean the effect upon the rights and interests of the people of the United States by the admission of Kansas as a slave State. The interest that we all have in the character, growth, and prosperity of all new States, is a matter of no ordinary import. Our interest in the future of that Territory embraced within the limits of the proposed State of Kansas is in no wise diminished by the inauguration of a State government therein. It is yet our domain; it is to be peopled by emigrants from among us, and of us; it is to be the home (I hope and trust the happy home) of our children and our friends. Their interest will be our interest; their destiny should be our destiny.

The people North and South, East and West, have the same equal, joint interest in all the Territories; in all the wealth, fame, and glory, of our common Republic; and, sir, it is our equal duty to maintain its honor and to perpetuate its power. And any act inconsistent with the rights of the people of any part or portion of our common country, either North or South, is a wrong and aggression that should not be tolerated or permitted. And, unless we can enjoy equally and mutually the benefits of our common country, and the purchase of our common treasure, we shall have failed in one of the great objects of our Union; and I feel bound, by a sense of duty to our common country, to oppose, as best I may, any measure that will lead to such consequences.

The equal enjoyment of the right of emigration to the Territories and new States is one of the important features of our system of government; and any element introduced into the organic act of a Territory or new State in derogation of such principle is subversive of an important element of our institutions. And for this reason, if for no other, I should feel compelled to oppose the introduction of Kansas as a slave State.

Prohibit slavery, and the laboring masses of the North and South, of the teeming East and the growing West, enter that country on exact and certain equality. The reward of honorable toil, the great avenue to wealth and power in our free government, is secured to all alike. The emigrants from every part of the extended Confederacy meet in Kansas, then, upon that high equality that American freemen alone can appreciate. With that element of wealth—free labor, undebased—they become, in fact, lords of the soil, peers of the land. Their houses reared by the industry of their own hand, are consecrated as fitting habitations of those in whose hands are intrusted the destinies of this Republic. Yea, sir, the rich, the wealthy, of the North and South, can alike enjoy the fruits and participate in the advantages of the new State. I grant you the southern planter cannot take with him his slaves—slavery is an institution of his State—nor can he remove his plantation and cotton fields; but he can enjoy there the profits that both produce, where one is located and the other tolerated. Equally so with the capitalist of the free States. The incorporations in which are invested his wealth, and which require his supervision, are institutions of the State in which he lives. His mills, his manufactories, and his wheat fields, are local in their character, and he can only enjoy in Kansas the profits they may return where they are situated; but each may take with him the same kind of property, the same elements of wealth and happiness, to his new home.

Here then, again, is found a perfect equality of rights and privileges; and more than this should not be asked. It was upon this principle that the fathers of the Republic, in 1787—when twelve of the thirteen States of the Confederacy were slave States, with a full knowledge of the effects of the institution of slavery upon the country, politically and socially—in preparing for settlement and occupation by their own people, inaugurated the first free territorial government in America; embracing all that region now included within the boundaries of five independent States of this Union; and which now gives free, happy homes to more than six million industrious, worthy, and intelligent inhabitants. If the slaveholding States were excluded from a participation in the advantages of that new country, they themselves misjudged. The clear vision of Jefferson and his contemporaries saw the result from the beginning. They acted for the whole country; not for Virginia, not for Massachusetts, not for Georgia, not for New England, not for the South—but for the people of the whole land; the toiling millions who had sustained the Republic in her greatest need, and fought her battles in her hour of peril.

Sir, I ask of gentlemen who of our common country was excluded from that territory? None, sir; none. The sons and daughters of every State, North, South, East and West, met on her rich plains, and in her fertile valleys, with equal rights and equal interests; together they dug the rich ores from the mountains, and built cities on the plains; they worshiped at the same altar, and sung the same song of gladness; they knew but one emotion, one love of country and of home. And whatever of calamity may befall our country, mark you well, sir, no power can sunder the bonds of the early association of the kindred hearts of that people. And this policy and like results I would carry from the cold North to the milder South; from the East to the shores of the Pacific, wherever our territories extend. And is there a man so blinded by prejudice, or seduced by fanaticism, that with all these rich results before him, he regrets the policy of the Fathers? But establish slavery there, and you prevent and defeat all this; you rob labor of its dignity by its contact and conflict with debased, degraded slave labor. Freemen of the North will not, cannot, in their natures, in their pride of manhood, labor with and beside slaves sold as cattle in the market. The natural impulses of their natures spurn the contaminating influences of slavery. Free labor thinks, acts, progresses, and improves. Slave labor is denied thought; it is driven; corrupts and retrogrades. Antagonistical in all their elements, they cannot harmonize or commingle; one must exclude the other. And on the decision of the issue now presented hangs the fate of this great element of American prosperity within the extended boundaries of the new State of Kansas. Shall, then, the mighty tide of emigration from the free North, that surges westward in its course, leaving States in its track, be turned away from our public domain? and new States in the vigorous growing West, to the frozen regions of the North, and surrender to degraded slaves the fertile fields of our western possessions? To this, in the name of my constituents, I answer, no.

But, Mr. Chairman, we want that new State of Kansas for the abode of free white citizens. The flow of emigration has, within a few years, filled up Ohio, Indiana, and Illinois, to repletion, and spreading north, has planted out the States of Michigan and Wisconsin. Overleaping the broad Mississippi, Iowa springs to manhood, and Minnesota feels the quick throbbings of her young strength; but at the Missouri river, the dark form of slavery, in its hideous deformity, lies across, and blocks up the way of its onward march, demanding Kansas as its own. Missouri contains a slave population of some hundred thousand. Kansas may, and doubtless will, if a slave State, have as many. Georgia numbers over three hundred thousand slaves. May not Kansas, in "chattels," thrive as well. And that number of slaves in any State must, of necessity, exclude the same number of free citizens. A hundred thousand slaves will, beyond controversy, require and appropriate the same, or nearly the same, amount of our territory that would a hundred thousand free white citizens. Thus, sir, will compete for the occupation of our public domain and new States, the property of the South with the freemen of the North. And in this manner will be turned away, of our population, from Kansas, a number equal to the number of slaves introduced—a system against which I protest, as unfair and degrading to the great-laboring interest of the country, and subversive of the principle of individual and State equality. I would gladly speak of the moral effect and political power of slavery, but my time is nearly spent.

But, Mr. Chairman, what is to be the result of the wild commotion that pervades the whole country? We are told on the one hand, that to refuse the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, will result in severing the bonds of the Union, now strained to their utmost tension; and, on the other hand, that to force that constitution upon the people of Kansas will rouse that wronged and injured people to the last resort against oppression—revolution and rebellion. I regret to hear such predictions. I do not believe that the integrity of the Government and the virtue of the people are so nearly spent as to warrant such apprehensions.

The dissolution of the Union has become a topic that can be discussed and considered without abhorrence. The strange and unwelcome emotions that, but a few years since, were aroused by a suggestion of the possibility of the dismemberment of the Confederacy, have given place to a cool and dispassionate calculation of the chances of a cool perpetuity. Every breeze that ruffles or chafes the political elements of the country induces a threat of dissolution, or a desire for its accomplishment. Sir, I hope we may not familiarize ourselves with that suggestion until its enormity will arise to startle us; and I adjure gentlemen to seek some other remedy for their real or imaginary wrongs. I cannot, nay, I will not, believe that we are in danger of that great calamity. The tenure of our Union is not so frail that the refusal to extend human bondage will work its ruin; nor will the oppression and the utter disregard of the dearest rights of our fellow-citizens of Kansas cement its power. Its attributes are humanity and justice. And when they fail, then, sir, you may fear the mutterings of the gathering storm. Then the fires that burn upon our altars will grow dim, and the spirits of the heroic past will have withdrawn from their watchings over our councils. But if, in the providence of God, that hour shall come, we have then but one duty to perform; and, sir, that is to be true to freedom, justice, and humanity, regardless of consequences, and trust the future of our country to the guidance of that Power that out of the gloom of the Revolution produced the star of its destiny.

But I will indulge in no forebodings of evil. The threats that are made here and elsewhere, pass me as the idle wind. I believe, yea, I think I know, that the great mass of the people are true to the Union, and unseduced from their attachments to its institutions. And there, sir, is my hope and confidence in its perpetuity.

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Chairman, did I not feel that my silence upon the question of admitting Kansas as a State into the Union under the Lecompton constitution might be misconstrued, and that it might be supposed that I was indifferent as to the result of the struggle now going on in this House, I should leave the discussion of the subject entirely to others. But the question involves too much of interest to the whole country, and especially to the South, to allow me to hazard anything by consulting my own personal comfort. Indeed, sir, I should feel that I had been recreant to my trust, did I not raise my voice, however impotent, in advocacy of the great principle of non-intervention; and did I not repel the numerous assaults which have been made in the course of this debate, upon the South and her institutions.

The question as presented for our consideration is a plain and simple one, and did we but confine ourselves to the real issue, would be one easy of solution. Shall Kansas be admitted as a State into the Union under the Lecompton constitution? As statesmen we should examine this question in the light of the Federal Constitution, and the general scope of our powers under it. We should come to our determination unbiased by any sectional interests; uninfluenced by any preconceived opinions as to the social or moral aspect of society in that Territory; and unalterably fixed in our purpose to do our whole duty, leaving consequences to take care of themselves. Principle, precedent, and patriotism might be marshaled as aids in the examination of the question; but prejudice, passion, and fanaticism should play no part in it. The nature of the question itself, the state of public sentiment in the country, the peace of society, the harmony of the States, and it may be, the perpetuity of the Union demand such a course. And yet, sir, members forgetting these solemn duties and obligations, over-stepping the limits of fair and legitimate debate, have made war, not only in this Territory, but in fifteen States of this Union, upon the institution of slavery, and the right of slave owners to their property. Scarcely a speech has been made in opposition to the bill that has not gone into the question of slavery, in a moral, social, and political point of view, and that has not made this the great turning point of the argument, the very pivot upon which the whole opposition hinges. We have been told again and again, that this opposition would never cease until this slavery clause was stricken out, though it should receive at the ballot-box the sanction and indorsement of every voter in Kansas. We have been assured that the fiat has gone forth, that no more slave States are to enter this Confederacy, in all coming time.

It matters not that a few who still call themselves Democrats, attempt to place their opposition upon other grounds, and call off our attention from the main point of attack. It matters not that they profess to separate themselves from the body of this abolition army, and fortify themselves behind some mud redoubts, in one quarter firing at us with the hope of engaging our attention, while these sappers and miners are pushing forward their insidious operations at another point. As friends of the measure, we are not to be drawn off by such a feint; and, while it would afford us pleasure to dislodge these deserters from their hiding places, and show them that they have even less than a fig leaf to cover their nakedness, yet every consideration of prudence, of self-preservation, requires that our small arms, and our great arms, should be turned against the main body of their forces; submitting, for the time being, to the annoyances of these pseudo-Democrats, and leaving for a future day the settlement of accounts with them. I therefore beg the indulgence of this House, while I trace briefly, (before discussing the Lecompton constitution,) the slavery agitation, and the general course of the Abolition party, from its inception down to the present time; believing, as I do, that a proper understanding of this subject, and the events that have marked its past history; a proper appreciation of our rights springing out of the system, and the correlative duties that attach to us as slaveholders, should be impressed upon the mind of every citizen, who may be called upon to act a responsible part in the thrilling drama that may soon open up before us.

For a quarter of a century, or more, almost the only question which has disturbed our domestic tranquillity, threatened the integrity of the Constitution, and the stability of the Union, is that of slavery. It is true that other questions have arisen, which for a time seemed to portend fearful consequences; but not partaking altogether of a sectional character, not founded in prejudice, or poisoned by fanaticism; not constituting the capital in trade of those who live by agitation, and are borne into place and power only when the storm prevails; these questions, after being fully canvassed, have been settled to the satisfaction of every portion of our country. Compromises have sometimes been made as to other questions than slavery, which, though not coming up to the full measure of our rights under the Constitution, yet, for the sake of peace and harmony among the States, have been acquiesced in, and maintained in good faith. The South has sometimes felt that heavy exactions were laid upon her; that hard terms were imposed; that compacts had been entered into that would have been "more honored in the breach than in the observance;" and yet, sir, her pledges have been redeemed; her promises have been fulfilled; her obligations have been maintained inviolate.

Slavery, too, has been the subject of compromise. Although, so far as the power of the Federal Government over the question, is concerned, nothing is left to doubt or implication. A few plain provisions in the Constitution point out its limited jurisdiction over the subject, and its connection with it; yet pledges, outside of any just claim to intervention, on the part of the Government, have been given and received. Rights, which our enemies affected to consider doubtful, have been surrendered, for a recognition of others, the existence of which common honesty should blush to deny. But these compromises, however deliberately entered into; these pledges, however solemnly given; have constituted no barrier against insult, innovation, and injury, on the part of our enemies, who seem determined to consummate their purpose of abolishing slavery; though compromises fall, though pledges be broken, and though the Constitution and the Union themselves perish in the conflict.

When the original Thirteen Colonies made their Declaration of Independence, in 1776, slavery was one of the domestic institutions in all of them. And when the Federal Constitution was adopted in 1789, it still existed in all except Massachusetts. It is well known to all of us, that the most difficult subject of adjustment in the convention which formed that Constitution, was the slavery question. After long debate, and patriotic effort, the few plain provisions contained in that instrument touching the subject were agreed upon as follows: First, the principle, that in adjusting taxation and representation, five slaves should be considered as three white persons; secondly, that slaves escaping into free States should not thereby be discharged from servitude, but should be delivered up on claim of the party to whom their service or labor was due; and thirdly, that Congress should not prohibit the foreign slave trade before the year 1808. And in the end, so completely did the views of the framers of that Constitution harmonize, that the two first provisions were adopted by a unanimous vote, while the remaining one in relation to the slave trade, was ingrafted upon the Constitution, mainly by the votes of the northern States, the South almost in a body voting against it, declaring their preference that an end should be put to this traffic at once. Thus it will be seen that the North is responsible for all the slaves imported into the United States from the adoption of the Federal Constitution to the year 1808, a period of nearly twenty years. This course was dictated by avarice, for at that time nearly all the shipping belonging to citizens of the United States was in the hands of northern men. Commerce was controlled by them, and the profits of the slave trade went into their pockets; and hence the opposition to interdicting this traffic as long as it could be made a source of revenue to them.

I have said that these provisions touching the question of slavery were plain and simple. So thought the framers of that instrument. No difficulty seemed to grow out of their construction while they were intrusted with the administration of the Government; and were they occupying our seats to-day, but one opinion would control every mind, but one feeling animate every heart.

For thirty years after the adoption of that Constitution, with an occasional interruption, the South received the measure of her rights under it so far as slavery was concerned; and it was not until Missouri asked to be admitted as a State into the Union, in 1819, that this fanatical anti-slavery spirit seemed to stand forth in all its giant proportions. The people of the Missouri Territory, impressed with the reasonable opinion that this Territory, being the common property of all the States, open to occupation and settlement alike by the citizens of each, who could carry with them any species of property which they held in the State from which they emigrated, and having authority of law to erect themselves into a State, regulating their domestic institutions in their own way, framed their constitution with Republican features spreading over every page of it. That constitution was presented to Congress for action upon it; and, strange to say, so rapidly had this fanatical spirit of abolitionism spread through the North, that Representatives opposed her admission upon the miserable and paltry ground that she had incorporated into her fundamental law a clause tolerating slavery, an institution that existed in every colony at the time of the Declaration of Independence, and in every State, save one, at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. What a reflection was their conduct upon the memory of those good men who, thirty years before, were not ashamed to give guarantees for the protection of this species of property even by constitutional sanction. What a poor return of gratitude was this for the sacrifices which they had made in money expended, hardships endured, and blood freely poured out, to build up for us our present system of Government! It is well their spirits are not disturbed by the degeneracy of the times. It is well they are beyond the reach of cowardly knaves and canting hypocrites, lest they should be despoiled of their well-earned honors, and their names given over to infamy, because they dared to make the Constitution under which we live.

I will not go into a history of the contest over the Missouri constitution. It is humiliating to my pride to contemplate the events of that struggle. Had I the power, I would, for the honor of my own section, forever blot out the page which perpetuates the history of wrongs ignominiously submitted to, surrenders ingloriously made, to appease the rapacious appetite of that reasonable Abolition party. Thanks to the Supreme Court of the United States, that highest and best tribunal known to the land, that, by its decision, it has wiped out, as far as it could do, the disgrace which that surrender of our rights stamped upon us. Missouri came in as a State, however, with the constitution she had formed, the South, in consideration thereof, having forever parted with the right to take slaves into one half of the common territory—that portion lying north of 36° 30'—merely reserving the privilege, already belonging to her, of taking slaves to that portion of it lying south of that line. I never contemplate this so-called compromise and the circumstances of its adoption, but my thoughts turn to the highwayman, who, with pistol pointed at the breast of the defenseless traveler, whispers into his ear, "here is a serious difficulty, suddenly sprung up. I desire that it be amicably settled, and to our mutual benefit. Just place in my hand your purse; I will spare your life, and thus an honorable compromise may be effected." The Abolition party of the North, well satisfied with the result of this experiment, seeing how easy a matter it was to despoil the South of her rights, retired, in the true spirit of a Robin Hood, to bide its time, and watch an occasion when another successful sally could be made. Having wronged us, of course that party became our enemy; for it seems to be one of the immutable laws of nature, that those we injure we come to hate and persecute. From this time forward human ingenuity seemed to be upon the rack to devise and execute plans to grieve and annoy us, and render unpleasant and insecure the domestic relations of master and servant.

For the next thirty years we were subjected to every species of attack that envy and malice could suggest; and thus the Hall of the House of Representatives was converted into a sort of Pandemonium, where the infernal orgies of this Abolition party were to be celebrated. Petitions for the abolition of slavery in the District of Columbia, territory ceded by Maryland and Virginia to the Government, as a common meeting ground for the representatives of the nation, were crowded upon the attention of this body. Incendiary documents were sought to be transmitted through the mails to the South, the object of which was to incite our slaves to insurrection and bloodshed. The trade in slaves between the southern States was to be interdicted, and the citizen emigrating from one to the other was not to be allowed to carry with him such property. The fugitive slave law, enacted by Congress in pursuance of the Constitution, for the reclamation of those who should escape from us into the free States, was sought to be repealed, or if not repealed, was to be resisted and abrogated by treachery and rebellion. The Wilmot proviso, by which we were to be excluded from the Territories, the common property of the States, was sought to be fastened upon us. Florida and Texas were resisted upon their application for admission as States into the Union, because their constitutions tolerated slavery. Our negroes were seduced from our homes and forced from our possession when traveling with them through the free States. Our churches were riven asunder, and we excluded from the sacramental board on account of owning the same property that belonged to the framers of the Constitution: the pulpit, the press, the hustings were all so many stand-points from which they hurled their poisoned shafts at us. A thousand other grievances were inflicted upon us, which an hour's speech will not allow me to enumerate, but which, if inflicted upon any foreign nation, would have been just cause for a declaration of war. Yet these indignities have been borne, coming, as they did, from those from whom we had a right to expect better things, if not upon the score of equality, at least upon the score of interest, seeing that we have been tributary to them, under our system of tax laws, with no remunerating equivalent.

Thus did matters go on from bad to worse, year after year, until the Mexican campaign opened in 1846; and our Army had been thrown into a distant country, surrounded by an enemy of semi-barbarians, and dependent entirely upon the home Government for supplies. In order to force upon the South submission to their unjust demands, the proposition to vote men and money to prosecute that war was sought to be encumbered by the Wilmot proviso, or in other words, by an amendment declaring that all territory acquired in that war should be forever closed against slavery. If up to this time sufficient evidence had been wanting to prove the hardening and corrupting influence of abolition sentiment upon the human heart, here was irrefragible proof upon that point. Our Army in the heart of an enemy's country, sustaining, almost miraculously, our flag in the midst of perils and hardships such as have seldom fallen to the lot of man; making forced marches by day and sleeping upon their arms at night, with few of the necessities, and none of the comforts of even a military campaign; with plague, pestilence, and famine pressing hard upon them. And yet, sir, when an appropriation, out of the national Treasury, is asked for, to feed, clothe, and reinforce them, it must be coupled with this infamous amendment, and unless adopted all supplies are to be withheld, and our gallant little band in Mexico left to perish from hunger, or fall victims to the superior force of a relentless foe. What an immortality of infamy did the participants in this scheme achieve for themselves! How deep and indelibly is the brand of traitor stamped upon their foreheads! But patriotism and the good sense of the country prevailed; the war was conducted to a successful and honorable close, and a large scope of territory was added to our boundaries.

In 1850, California, formed out of a part of that territory, asked to be admitted as a State into the Union. Here was another opportunity for Abolition rapacity to gratify itself. Being the common territory of all the States, as the fruits of their common efforts, of course the South had a right to expect that her interest would be looked to in its disposition and settlement. A southern President had taken the responsibility of ordering our army to the Rio Grande to repel invasion, for which the whole Abolition pack, Tray, Blanche, and Sweetheart, broke loose upon him. Southern chivalry had given renown to every battle-field; southern blood had flowed in every contest; southern money helped to erect every fortification and to fire every gun; a southern general commanded each line of operations; a southern soldiery made up the rank and file of the army in the proportion of three to one, taking the population of the two sections into account; a southern governor was appointed to maintain and uphold our authority in Mexico after its surrender; a southern commissioner negotiated the treaty of peace between the two nations, by which that territory was ceded to us; and when the amount stipulated to be paid for the cession came to be settled, southern labor and southern capital, under the operations of our tariff system, had to bear the onus, and pay much the larger portion of it. Facts like these, even amongst a band of buccaneers, who live by their prowess and by plunder, would have secured to the respective parties a fair division of the spoils. But not so in this confederation of States. With the Abolition party, all the rules of common honesty that govern men in other conditions of life, high or low, are trampled under foot; the law of meum and tuum is no longer respected, but with them might, backed up by numbers, makes right. How far southern people, who fight your battles, pay your taxes, and work the soil for your benefit, will submit to this state of things, may be seen in the early future.

With the proposition to admit California as a State, the struggle was renewed—the South demanding some portion of that vast domain so lately acquired as an outlet to slavery, to relieve her from the inconvenience and miseries, at no distant day, of a crowded and mixed population. This most reasonable request the North persistently refused to grant us. Odious as the Missouri compromise line had ever been to the South, yet she was willing to adopt it as a basis of settlement of this vexed question. Having abided by it in good faith for thirty years, having permitted the Oregon territorial bill to pass, under Mr. Polk's administration, with its slavery restriction, our Representatives in Congress, bitter as the pill was, stepped forward and proposed to extend it across this new Territory to the Pacific ocean. Over and over again was this proposition submitted to the North by southern Representatives, and as often rejected; yes, sir, indignantly spurned; and the cry was, "free soil away down to the Gulf of Mexico, and over to the Pacific ocean!"

The result of this contest was not unlike all others which had preceded it. California was hurried into the Union as a free State, not under the forms of law, but in direct contravention of all law, and every precedent from the dawn of our national existence to the present time. No census was taken to show her population; no territorial government subjecting her to the accustomed pupilage; no "enabling act," about which we hear such a lugubrious howl raised in the case of Kansas; no convention of delegates elected in pursuance of an act of the Legislature competent to provide for such election; but with a constitution, made, we know not when, where, or by whom, except from rumor, with an area large enough for half a dozen States, she was forced in against the consent of the South, and forever dedicated to free soil. At the same time it was determined to give territorial governments to Utah and New Mexico. The principle of the Missouri compromise was no longer to be observed in the organization of Territories. It was fully ignored and scornfully trampled under foot by northern men, who now affect to regard it with such holy reverence; and who, with a reckless mendacity and juggling duplicity that merits the scorn and contempt of every honest heart, essay to play "the game of fast and loose" as policy, prejudice, or plunder may dictate.

In the midst of this excitement, thirteen northern States, through their Legislatures, resolved that the Wilmot proviso should be applied to all territory, whether north or south of the Missouri line; in other words, requiring Congress, by its action, to exclude slavery from all the territory belonging to the United States. An act for this purpose had passed one branch of Congress, and was defeated in the other; and, to avert the disgrace which seemed to be impending over us, the South again proposed to extend the Missouri line to the Pacific, which was again rejected by the North. Intense excitement prevailed throughout the land. The Union was regarded as being in imminent peril. At this juncture of affairs, the North, rich in resources and fruitful in expedients, looking to the overthrow of slavery and the ruin of the South, stepped forward with a new principle of compromise, by some called "squatter," and by others "popular sovereignty," under which the people of the Territories, without any intervention on the part of the Federal Government or any of its branches, were to be left free to determine the question for themselves, whether or not slavery should exist under the constitution which they should frame. After long debate, and fierce opposition on the part of the South, the proposition was finally adopted; and, upon this principle of non-intervention, the territorial governments of Utah and New Mexico were organized, although the whole of the former, and a part of the latter Territory, lie north of that consecrated line. Not satisfied with aiming a blow at slavery in the Territories and new States to be admitted, Texas must be dragged into the arena, and that part of it lying north of the Missouri line must be made a peace-offering to our enemies, although in the same series of measures they were abrogating this line in Utah and New Mexico. The District of Columbia, too, must be brought into hotch-potch; the slave trade must be there abolished, and slavery itself, to the extent that if a man, in passing through that District, should place his slave in depot for safe-keeping, for a night only, in the morning he came out a free man, his master having lost all claim upon him.

In the same connection, as a sort of sedative to southern mortification and chagrin, as a "quid pro quo" for these humiliating concessions made to this great Moloch of Abolitionism, the fugitive slave law, by the united vote of the South and a few Democrats of the North, was remodeled, and given us in place of the law already in existence on the subject. The promise was distinctly made that the slavery question was forever banished the Halls of Congress; that our property should be returned to us in good faith, without obstruction or difficulty; and that a new era had dawned upon us in the history of our Government. How fallacious our hopes in this respect! The slavery agitation did not cease in Congress or out of it. The fugitive slave law was not enforced in good faith; but, on the contrary, the Legislatures of many of the northern States passed laws refusing to us the use of their jails for the confinement of our slaves when taken into custody, and attempted to give to the slave the right to sue out a writ habeas corpus, and have a hearing before their State courts; in some instances, as in Massachusetts, laying heavy fines and penalties upon those of their citizens who should aid in retaining a slave to his master, and disqualifying such from holding any office of honor, profit, or trust, under the State government. Although the law was explicit in its terms, and based upon a plain provision of the Federal Constitution, yet, to attempt its enforcement in Massachusetts, and in some other States, imperiled the lives of all who were engaged in this attempt; as well that of the officer of the law as the slaveowner. In many instances human life was sacrificed by the mob that assembled to bid defiance to the law, and trample underfoot the rights of the citizen. If, at last, the law was enforced, it was at a sacrifice burdensome to the Government and ruinous to the master. We all remember the exciting case of Burns, in the city of Boston, in which the fearless and upright Judge Loring presided, and returned the slave to his master, and, for so doing, has been removed from office by Banks, the Black Republican Governor of Massachusetts; where the deputy marshal was murdered by the mob for daring to do his duty as a minister of the law; and where it cost the Federal Government, aside from the cost to the master, the sum of $13,115 to defray the expenses of a "posse comitatus," and of sixteen military companies called out to suppress the mob and enforce the law. A stronger exemplification of Punic faith is not to be found in the history of any nation, civilized or savage. A more flagrant and reckless disregard of the principles of comity, good neighborhood, and simple justice, the world cannot present.

Thus did matters progress until the meeting of the Thirty-Third Congress, in 1854. At the preceding session of that body, a territorial government had been asked for the country now embraced in Kansas and Nebraska. Petitions had been sent to Congress to that effect, and referred to the respective Committees of the two Houses on Territories, but no reports made upon them. Now, it became apparent that a government and laws must be extended over this Territory, as rights were springing up between the settlers upon this public domain, and conflicts were arising between the whites and the Indians there to be found. This must be done by Congress; and the question naturally arose, what sort of a bill shall be framed for this purpose? It would not do to frame it upon the principle of the Missouri compromise line; for this had been repudiated in the organization of governments for Utah and New Mexico, and the principle of non-intervention substituted in its stead. This, then, being the last principle of compromise or settlement between the North and South, of course the Committee on Territories, in both Houses of Congress, set themselves to work to frame a bill in conformity with this doctrine. It was prepared, and introduced simultaneously in both branches of Congress. Of course, no opposition could be anticipated from the North; for it was the principle of non-intervention which had been brought forward and urged by that section, and reluctantly accepted and acquiesced in by the South. The Abolition party of the North, caring nothing for plighted faith, utterly insensible to the promptings of fairness, or the dictates of justice, with its Protean adaptability and characteristic treachery, turned upon this principle, denounced it without stint, and made the cast-off Missouri line its ultimatum. After a most elaborate and acrimonious debate; after the fiercest struggle I have ever witnessed in legislation, the South insisting upon the principle, and the North, with a few exceptions, opposing it, the bill passed organizing territorial governments for Kansas and Nebraska.

Here, then, was a field open for northern and southern enterprise, with no odious distinctions against the institutions or rights of either, to which each man might go, carrying with him whatever species of property was held by him, and in due time, when population should justify it, form a State government, regulating in their constitution their domestic relations, as other States had done, and come into the sisterhood upon terms of equality. But in what spirit was this proposition met by the Abolition party of the North? When it was ascertained that the bill would pass, but before its passage, members of Congress met together in secret conclave, organized themselves into an Emigrant Aid Society, and set on foot a scheme for throwing into Kansas a population to be gathered up from the purlieus of Boston and other large cities, without reference to qualifications as citizens, socially, morally, or politically. The inebriate, the pauper, the criminal, (provided they were hostile to slavery,) were all accepted and put upon a forward movement for Kansas. Such an exodus of pestiferous bipeds was never witnessed before from any land. The very highways were contaminated by their march, and a moral taint spread through the atmosphere where they passed. Could it be supposed that southern gentlemen in Missouri and other surrounding States could restrain their indignation at such a flagrant disregard of good faith, such vile machinations to defeat them in the enjoyment of their just and equal rights? The Abolitionists themselves did not expect such acquiescence; for instead of putting into the hands of these emigrants implements of husbandry, and turning their attention to the cultivation of the soil, we find that lectures were delivered from the pulpit on the Sabbath day, and contributions levied, for the purpose of procuring arms with which to equip their emissaries. Even women (I cannot call them ladies) were found to rise in a public assembly, and with a blood-thirstiness that should have mantled their cheeks with shame, subscribe Sharpe's rifles to the enterprise. In confirmation of what I say upon this point, I beg leave to read to this committee an extract from the able and lucid report of Judge Douglas, on the subject of Kansas affairs, made to the Senate, on the 12th day of March, 1856. He says:

"When the emigrants sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri in large numbers on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolish Kansas as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institutions of slavery within the limits of Missouri. These apprehensions increased and spread with the progress of events, until they became the settled convictions of the people of that portion of the State most exposed to the danger by their proximity to the Kansas border. The natural consequence was, that immediate steps were taken by the people of the western counties of Missouri to stimulate, organize, and carry into effect a system of emigration similar to that of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the avowed purpose of counteracting the effects, and protecting themselves and their domestic institutions from the consequences, of that company's operations.

"The material difference in the character of the two rival and conflicting movements consists in the fact that the one had its origin in an aggressive, and the other in a defensive policy; the one was organized in pursuance of the provisions and claiming to act under the authority of a legislative enactment of a distant State, whose internal prosperity and domestic security did not depend upon the success of the movement; while the other was the spontaneous action of the people living in the immediate vicinity of the theater of operations, excited by a sense of common danger, to the necessity of protecting their own firesides from the apprehended horrors of servile insurrection and intestine war."

Of course this is to be taken as good authority upon this point, coming, as it does, from the very head and front of the anti-Lecompton movement. Here, then, and in this way, commenced the scenes of riot and bloodshed which have thrilled with horror every heart in the land. I here assert today what, in my deliberate judgment and in my conscience, I believe to be true: that the Free-Soil party of the North, who organized these emigrant aid societies, are responsible to God for every battle which has been fought, every life which has been sacrificed, and every drop of blood which has been shed in Kansas. I delight not to dwell upon these scenes, but will draw the curtain over them, and pass now to the consideration, briefly, of the Lecompton constitution, and close with some general remarks.

Kansas presents herself for admission as a State into the Union with a constitution having all the forms, and bearing the impress, of law. It is contended, however, that this constitution has not been framed and adopted in accordance with law or the wishes of the people of Kansas, but in violation of both; and we are solemnly invoked to examine the question before we act upon it. The first inquiry, then, which naturally arises, is, how far can Congress push its investigation as to the regularity of the proceedings which gave birth to this constitution? On the one hand, it is argued that we must look to the instrument itself, and not beyond it; and should it appear to be republican in its character, then Congress must receive it, and admit her as a State. On the other hand, it is contended that Congress has the right, and it becomes our duty to investigate all the minutiae of the proceedings looking to the organization of a State government; and to this end, that we have a right to go out to every election precinct, inquire into all the frauds that may have been practiced in voting; that we must judge of the qualification of members of the Territorial Legislature that provided for the call of a convention, and of the qualification of the members of the convention elected by the people; and finally, that we must sit in judgment upon the action of the convention, and see that the constitution formed by it is referred back to the people for ratification. I find myself compelled to differ from both of these positions. I do not believe we should take it for granted that the instrument before us is the work of the people of Kansas, simply because it is certified by a particular individual to be such, or because it bears the broad seal of the Governor of the Territory or the president of the convention. Nor do I believe that we have a right to go out ad libitum to hunt up evidence to overthrow it. The truth, according to my view of it, lies just between the two extremes. The case comes before us upon a record which it is our duty to inspect, and from that record determine whether all has been done that ought to be required of the people of Kansas to entitle them to come in as a State. What is it that constitutes that record? First, the Kansas-Nebraska act organizing this Territory. This, of course, should be examined with a view to ascertain the powers conferred and the duties required of the people of Kansas, the general scope and meaning of the act itself, and the object and intention of its framers.

As to the powers to be conferred upon the people under that act, we find, first, the power to elect a Legislature. Section twenty-two provides:

"That the legislative power and authority of said Territory shall be vested in the Governor and a Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly shall consist of a Council and House of Representatives."

The authority to elect a Legislature, then, is clearly given. It is so declared in the Kansas territorial act. In the second place, we examine the act to see under what forms of law, and under whose directions, it was to be elected. The same section (twenty-two) provides:

"The first election shall be held at such time and places, and be conducted in such manner, both as to the persons who shall superintend such election and the returns therefor, as the Governor shall appoint and direct."

In the third place, we must inquire what were the powers conferred upon that Legislature under that act. Section twenty-four provides:

"That the legislative power of the Territory shall extend to all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of this act."

Here, then, is a general grant of powers, limited only by the Federal Constitution and the provisions of the Kansas territorial act. No other restriction is imposed. What, then, are rightful subjects of legislation? Is not one of them the power to provide for a call of a convention to be elected by the people? Has not the existence of this power in Territorial Legislatures been often recognized by Congress in the fact of admitting new States which came into being precisely as Kansas has done? But to come directly to the point: Does it conflict, or is it inconsistent with, the Constitution of the United States? If so, with what clause, and where is it to be found? On the contrary, does it not conform to the spirit, at least, of that instrument, which seems to look to the organization and admission of new States into the Union? The third section, fourth article, of that Constitution provides as follows:

"New States may be admitted by the Congress into this Union."

Who are to organize these new States? Has Congress the power to do it? Clearly not; but it must be done by the people of the Territories. In confirmation of the fact that this power does belong to them, I quote the tenth article of amendments to that Constitution, as follows:

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

The power to make a constitution for a new State is not reserved to the States respectively, nor to them in the aggregate, to be exercised by Congress, therefore it belongs "to the people." I conclude, then, that the power of the Kansas Legislature to provide for the call of a convention is, in the language of the act, "consistent with the Constitution of the United States." Is it consistent with the provisions of the Kansas act? To arrive at a proper solution of this question we must take the act itself, and determine from its language and general bearing, whether it was the intention of those who framed it, as well as those who passed it, that Kansas should remain as a Territory, or whether, in due time, she should emerge from her pupilage and take her rank in the Confederacy as a State.

Section nineteen of the Kansas territorial act, after describing her boundaries, and defining her limits, provides as follows:

"The same is hereby created into a temporary government, by the name of the Territory of Kansas; and when admitted as a State or States, the said Territory, or any portion of the same, shall be received into the Union, with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their submission."

This language is plain and simple, and clearly establishes three propositions; first, that the territorial government was intended to be a temporary one; and secondly, that Kansas was to be admitted as a State or States into the Union after the temporary government had answered its purpose; and thirdly, that the State was to come into the Union "with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe at the time of their admission." There is, therefore, nothing inconsistent with the Kansas territorial act, in the provision by the Legislature, for the call of a convention of delegates to be elected by the people, but such course seems to harmonize fully with its intent and meaning.

The next point in this record to be examined, is, was that election ordered for members of the Legislature by the Governor, and was it conducted according to the provisions of the Kansas act? The Governor did order such election, appointing persons to supervise it and make returns thereof. The election took place, certificates were given by the proper officers, to members elected; they assembled, determined the qualifications of their own members, as they had a right to do, and were recognized as a properly constituted Legislature by the Governor, who had ordered the election, by having official intercourse with them, and sending in a message to them. The Federal Government has indorsed it as a constitutional and legal body, by paying its expenses and ordering out troops to uphold and enforce its enactments. It was also recognized as such by Judge Douglas, who in his able report to the Senate of 12th March, 1856, uses the following language:

"The election was held in obedience to the proclamation of the Governor of the Territory, which prescribed the mode of proceeding, the form of the oath and returns, the precautionary safeguards against illegal voting, and the mode of contesting the election."

Again, he says:

"So far as the question involves the legality of the Kansas Legislature, and the validity of its acts, it is entirely immaterial whether we adopt the reasoning and conclusions of the minority or majority reports, for each proves that the Legislature was legally and duly constituted."

Another point of legitimate inquiry, from the record, is, did that Legislature thus elected provide, by a plain and simple enactment, for the election of delegates to that convention, to take place in the ordinary way. There seems to be no controversy among parties upon this point. The law was passed by both branches of the Legislature, and although vetoed by the Governor, under some frivolous pretext, yet it passed both bodies by a two-thirds vote, thus making it a law over the Governor's veto. I cannot give room for the whole act, but submit the following sections:

"Sec. 1. That there shall be at the first general election to come off in October, 1856, a poll opened at the several places of voting throughout this Territory, for taking the sense of the people of this Territory upon the expediency of calling a convention to form a State constitution."

"Sec. 2. It shall be the duty of the judges at the several election precincts in this Territory, at the election aforesaid, to cause a poll to be opened, which poll shall contain two columns, one to be headed 'convention,' the other, 'no convention'; and they shall cause the vote of each individual voter to be set in the appropriate column."

The same Legislature that passed the act authorizing an election of delegates by the people to the convention, prescribed the qualification of voters for such delegates as it had a right under the Kansas bill to do, and passed what was called "the registration act." This required all who desired to take part in that election to come forward by a given day, some time off, and register or enroll their names, that it might be known on the election day who were citizens in Kansas.

Again, let us inquire, as it is proper to do, did an election take place for delegates under the act of the Legislature providing for it; and did they constitute a body representing the sovereignty of the people of Kansas? Just before that election, Governor Walker addressed the people of the Territory, and spoke the following language:

"The people of Kansas are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to form a constitution and State government."

Judge Douglas, in a speech in Chicago, in June, 1857, is reported as having addressed the people as follows:

"He spoke of the fairness and justice of the law, giving the people an opportunity of expressing their honest convictions on the subject of slavery in a constitutional manner, by means of a constitutional convention soon to meet, to decide that and all other important matters connected with the future of the new State of Kansas. The people of that beautiful Territory would soon speak. We would soon have, he had no doubt, a free and quiet expression of opinion by means of the elective franchise, from that silent, but most certain weapon of a free people—the ballot-box. Should the enemies of that mode of settling the much vexed question of slavery in that Territory blindly and obstinately refuse to exercise the rights assured them by the laws of Congress, upon their heads, and theirs alone, will rest the responsibility."

Here, then, is the concurrent testimony of Walker and Douglas; that the Legislature had done its duty "fully;" that nothing remained but for the legal voters to go to the ballot-box, and "participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates." The election day came on, an election was had, certificates of election were given to those who had received a majority of the votes polled, as in other cases of popular elections. We know not, we have no right to inquire, who went to the ballot-box, or who staid away. These delegates, thus elected, went up to the convention on the day appointed for its meeting, clothed with all the authority which the people had the right to confer.

Now, sir, we come to the last feature of this record. Did this convention thus elected and convened pass upon and adopt the constitution now under consideration? What right have we to doubt it? It comes to us certified as their act, under the seal of the president of the convention, through whom it was to be transmitted to Congress. The truth or validity of that certificate I have never heard called into question. Here our investigation must stop. The question as to whether the constitution, or any part of it, was referred to the people for approval, is a matter about which we have no right to inquire. It is a matter for the consideration alone of the convention that formed it. If they chose to withhold it from ratification by a popular vote, it was entirely competent for them to do so. About one half of the States in this Union have been admitted without their constitutions having such popular indorsement, and some of them presenting constitutions formed without any authority of law whatever. If, then, the convention had a right to refer it or not, as it deemed advisable, it cannot become material to inquire whether the whole or a part of it was submitted for ratification. If the whole of it had been referred back, it would have been right; if only a part, it would still have been right; or if no part of it, the convention would yet have been in the line of its duty. I conclude, then, that all has been done which we have a right to require at the hands of the people of Kansas, and she now presents herself, not in the attitude of a supplicant, begging admission into the Federal Union; but with her constitution in her hand, embodying her sovereign will, she demands a place amongst us.

What right have we to reject her application? At whose instance is it to be done? Who is to be gratified by it? Is it the peaceable, law-abiding citizens of the Territory? No, sir, but a band of outlaws in Kansas who are just as much in rebellion against this Government as Brigham Young and his followers; who have refused to submit to legal enactments, have attempted to subvert the power and authority of the Federal Government in that Territory, and have organized themselves into a military force the better to consummate their treasonable purposes. It is to be done to gratify a set of political gamblers here at home who have dared to stake a nation's happiness and perpetuity upon the unhallowed game which they are playing for office and its poor emoluments.

In passing on to my conclusion, I will notice one point which is made by the opponents of the bill. Gentlemen object to it because they say that even the submission of the constitution, so far as relates to slavery, is not a fair one. That submission, say they, looks only to the future introduction of slavery into the State, while it recognizes and protects slavery to the extent of its present existence there. Let us see whether this objection is well taken. It will be admitted that the right of private property, having once attached, cannot be interfered with for its destruction, nor can it be taken from the owner for public uses, except for a full and fair consideration. Did, then, the right to hold slaves in this Territory attach at any time? Under the decision in the Dred Scott case, this right did attach whenever the slaveholder went into that Territory with his slave. If this right, then, did attach, and the right to property cannot be interfered with by Government for its destruction, with what show of reason can it be argued that this matter of private rights should be referred to the people? It is the duty of Government to protect, and not destroy, the rights of property. Hence the convention acted wisely when it refused to submit the rights to private property to the people, but undertook to place them beyond the reach of the popular voice and declare that such subsisting rights should not be interfered with. The convention had unquestionably the power to submit to the people, as it did, the question whether any such rights should attach in future; but, certainly, rights already vested could not be divested by the popular voice however potent we may be inclined to regard it. Then, sir, to object to the constitution on this ground, is to strike at the inviolable tenure by which we hold private property.

But you say you deny the authority of the Dred Scott case, and that under that decision no such rights attach. Then I hold you bound by the territorial act, which, to all intents and purposes, recognizes the right of the people of the Territory of Kansas to hold slaves. In it appears the following language:

"In all cases involving title to slaves, the said writs of error or appeals shall be allowed and decided by the said Supreme Court without regard to the value of the matter, property, or title in controversy."

Is not this a clear recognition of such right? How can you establish a tribunal to determine the rights of property or title to slaves, without at the same time admitting that such rights exist? A strange anomaly would it be, and a prodigious waste of time, in Congress, to provide for the adjudication of rights which you say could never spring up. This objection to the constitution, like all others which I have heard, is as baseless as the "fabric of a vision."

Before I conclude, I wish to address a few remarks to my Democratic friends who are yielding to the embraces of the Black Republican party upon this question. Do you fully understand and appreciate your position before the country? Nine tenths of the Democratic masses are in favor of receiving Kansas as a State into the Union, under the Lecompton constitution. Nearly the same proportion of Democratic members upon this floor take the same view of the matter. The President of the United States, who has been chosen by the whole party for his experience, his integrity, and statesmanship, is urging it upon us as a peace measure, to drive this irritating and dangerous question out of Congress, to localize it, and thus cut off the supplies, the pabulum which sustains abolitionism. Can you place yourselves in antagonism to the Democratic party upon this question, which threatens to disrupt it? When it is hard-pressed on all sides by its enemies, can you give them aid and comfort?

We of the South know that you have breasted the storm in the passage and support of the Kansas-Nebraska act. We have seen you stand, like a rock in mid-ocean, while the waves of faction and fanaticism, swollen to mountain proportions, lashed you with demoniac fury; and we felt that you were entitled to gratitude, especially from southern hearts, for your manly courage and fidelity to principle. We have been taught to rely upon your aid in securing to us the measure of our just constitutional rights upon this great question. And now when the last scene has come, when the last battle is to be fought for the great principle of non-intervention, and the cap-stone is to go up with shouting, you draw back, desert your old friends, and are found holding counsel with Abolitionists, and devising plans for the defeat of this great principle; and the overthrow of Democracy. Let me tell you that the responsibility which you are assuming is a most fearful one. You are in alliance with men who compass your destruction; who would spear you in the back at any moment to forward their prospects; who are aiming at the disintegration of the Democratic party, and in that event, the consummation of all their hopes and purposes. For years, while we have stood together, we have been able to foil them in all their attempts when they have struck at the sacredness of the Constitution, the inviolability of civil and religious liberty, and the freedom of conscience. And now is it not worse than madness to lend yourselves willing instruments to bad men in pursuit of national ruin? Better that you should forego some preferences, make some sacrifices to preserve our Democratic organization, than put to hazard the hopes of a nation, which are indissolubly bound up with it.

"Humanity, with all its fears,
With all its hopes of future years,
Is hanging breathless on its fate."

Mr. Chairman, I shall make no issues for the people of my State or district, touching this subject. I shall undertake to pledge them to no course of conduct. Mississippi, in 1851, through a convention of delegates elected by the people, after declaring that, although not satisfied with a series of acts called the compromise, yet she would acquiesce in them, resolved that a violation of the rights of the people of the State might occur, "which would amount to intolerable oppression, and would justify a resort to measures of resistance," among which was designated the following:

"The refusal by Congress to admit a new State into the Union on the ground of her tolerating slavery in her limits."

The convention which passed this resolution was not composed of Fire-Eaters, as the States-rights men of Mississippi are called; but of Union men, who look upon themselves as the peculiar friends and guardians of the Government. These positions were taken by the people in no spirit of vain glory, I apprehend, nor with a view to intimidate any party or section of the country; but with solemn deliberation, and from a sense of duty. Georgia, and other southern States, stand upon the same platform; and unless I have misapprehended the views and feelings of the people of these States; unless I have miscalculated as to their spirit and determination, in the execution of their pledges and resolves, there is strong reason to believe that, if Kansas is refused admission as a State, under the constitution now presented, measures will be taken to dissolve their connection with this Union. No power on earth can make the people of the South believe that Kansas is to be kept out for any other sufficient reason than that her constitution allows slavery in her limits. Cover up your designs as you may; make a feint in this direction or that; fly what colors you please at your mast-head; the South is not to be wheedled, cajoled, or deceived any longer by your movements. Self-proud and self-confident, she is watching your maneuvers; hoping for the best, yet prepared for the worst. Now that her numerical strength has departed, and the strength of principle only remains to protect her from Federal aggression, whenever this barrier is broken down, and she is left to trust to her own resources, I give the pledge here to-day, that her rights and her honor will be fully vindicated. Tell me not that strength lies alone in numbers. A sense of right, united with the indomitable will, makes heroes of men.

Of our enemies I would ask, do you expect to abolish the distinctions of color, of intellect, taste, and physical organization, which nature has written so legibly upon the white man and the black? Do you expect to break down the barriers which she has erected to the amalgamation of the races? Have you not seen the fruitless attempts which have been made to accomplish this end? Have you not been often pointed to the experiment of this leveling process in the island of Jamaica; and have you not seen its disastrous results? Look at the Columbian Republics of South America, and see there the effort made to abolish all the distinctions between the negro, the Indian, and the white man. Under the lead of Bolivar, the most distinguished man of his day and nation, all men were put upon a common platform of equality. Let history tell the story of this utopian scheme. We find that instead of elevating the negro to the level of the white man, instead of inspiring him with the feelings and attributes of our own color, the white man was degraded to the level of the negro. Society deteriorated; their social institutions were corrupted; their religion became idolatry; and to-day darkness and superstition hang like the pall of death over that otherwise beautiful land.

In the war of 1812-13, between the United States and Great Britain, many of our runaway slaves were received on board of English vessels, conveyed away and colonized upon the African coast at Sierra Leone. From that day to the present England has nurtured and nourished that colony, with the hope of proving to the world that her policy in regard to Jamaica was correct, and that her theory in regard to the equality of the races was founded in truth and in nature. But all the reports from that colony go to establish exactly an opposite conclusion; and it has been ascertained in the last few years that these colonists have actually been guilty of selling their children to slave vessels coasting in that quarter. Hence you find such a revolution in public sentiment of both France and England, and a disposition manifested to open the slave trade, under the specious pretext of an apprentice system. Has history no warning voice for you? Are its teachings to remain forever "a sealed book," so far as you are concerned? Like the bewildered traveler, who fixes his eye upon the "ignis fatuus," and follows its lead along the thorny path, through dark caverns, or over the precipice, have you set your heart upon, and are you determined to follow, this phantom of abolition, though it cause you to trample under foot the very laws of nature, the experience of all past ages, the fragments of a broken Constitution, and ultimately precipitate you into the very gulf of national ruin? When you have succeeded to your heart's content in all your purposes, what will you do with the three million negroes you have liberated? Will you receive them into the free States, and endow them with all the privileges of citizenship? Will you give them a place amongst you, "a local habitation and a name?" You know you will not, for even now several of your States have passed laws preventing their ingress into their borders. Even the Canadas contemplate a scheme of separate colonization for them, satisfied that they are not fit elements of freedom for any well organized society. Do you expect them, if set at liberty, to remain amongst us, or we amongst them, upon terms of equality? If so, you have misconceived southern character. Even if we were inclined to this state of things, and were willing to coexist in the same Territory with them, the thing would be impossible. The industry of the white man would be taxed to uphold the indolence of the negro, property would have no protection, life itself no safeguards in the midst of such a population suddenly discharged from bondage. A war of extermination of one or other of the races would follow.

Then let me ask the question, and receive a candid answer—have not the United States of North America thus far pursued the most sensible and rational course in the management and disposal of the mixed elements of which our population consists? The Indian is kept in his native forest to pursue the bent of his own untamed nature, with agencies to protect his interest and supply his wants, and such means and appliances for his education and elevation as we can afford. The negro is employed, as his physical nature would seem to indicate was proper, in the cultivation of the soil, in performing menial services that in communities differently organized fall upon the poorer class of white men, and constitute them a different caste, without any difference in color, physiology, or intellectual capacity. Every man knows that, in the free States, the waiter who blacks the boots and brushes the coat is not considered the equal of him who wears them, any more than the slave upon the southern plantation is considered the equal of his master. There is this distinction, too, in these types of society. The negro is contented with his servitude, or at least does not chafe under it, and most frequently considers his master as his best friend; while the white servant performs his duties grudgingly, and feels that there is a sort of antagonism between him and his employer, between labor and capital. While we leave the Indian in his forest, and the negro upon the plantation, the white man with us is engaged in the higher pursuits of the mechanic arts, trade, commerce, science, literature, and the perfection of human government; studying the interest of every element of society, and giving harmony to the whole; seeking not to abolish the distinctions which the Supreme Being has ordained amongst men; but leaving the great insuperable barriers of color, capacity, physical structure, appetites, and passions, to be directed into the proper channel, and made subservient to the common good.

But, in conclusion, we are told, come what may, Kansas or no Kansas, Abolition or what not, that this Confederation of States must and shall continue; that the North will see to it that southern States are kept in the Union at all hazards; that the military arm of the Government will be invoked and wielded to secure such a result. All I have to say, in reply to this declaration, is, there are stout hearts and strong arms in the South. March down your abolition cohorts into slave territory to enforce your abolition decrees. We are an enthusiastic people, and will give them a warm reception. And it shall be my highest ambition to hunt out that member of this body who dares to place himself at the head of such an expedition, that I may, hand to hand, give him a hospitable entertainment. If you are determined to baptize your nefarious purposes in blood—if justice, the Constitution, the Union—if the memories of a common struggle by a common ancestry, to secure to us the high privileges which we now enjoy—if the hopes and happiness of future generations, here and elsewhere—are not sufficient to stay this march, then, sir, a million of swords will "leap from their scabbards" to avenge our wrongs. Your abolition army will be met, not only by three hundred and fifty thousand slave owners, but by every proud and noble-hearted non-slaveholder whom you would dare undertake to reduce to the humiliating condition of negro equality.

I have been born and reared in the South. I have associated much and intimately with men in the humbler walks of life who are no slave owners; and when Abolitionists count upon their support in the event of a sectional collision growing out of the question of slavery; when they base their calculations upon receiving aid and comfort from them, or that their swords will be turned upon their brethren of the South, they display a stolid ignorance, only equaled by their frenzied infatuation. With us there is no distinction, socially and politically, between the rich and poor. Labor is not arrayed against capital, but the road to fortune and preferment is a highway open alike to every aspirant. So indissolubly are we united in feeling and in interest, that if you but touch a chord connected with either, it vibrates through our whole social system, and puts in more rapid motion the blood of every heart. Should a sectional war be thrust upon us against our wishes, against our solemn protest, against nature, and against God, you will find men arming for the conflict, not only from the sections where slavery is found, but, like Roderick Dhu's men, they will spring up from every brake and bush on the mountain top or in the valley's depth. But one feeling will animate every heart; but one cause will nerve every arm; but one common shout will go up for victory, or one common heap of the slain tell the sad story of defeat.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, I have long been of the opinion that speech-making was one of the evils in this body. I believe that more attention to the details of business, and less to speech-making, would greatly subserve the public interests. Acting on this principle, I served through the three sessions of the Thirty-Fourth Congress without occupying any portion of the time of the House except for explanation, and then never for personal explanation. If I consulted my own feelings I should still pursue that policy; but, Mr. Chairman, I need scarcely say that a question is pending before this House which demands the most careful consideration and the most prudent action at our hands.

The fact that certain documents purporting to be a constitution for Kansas, and asking admission for her into this Union, have been recently presented to Congress, has disclosed a division of the Democratic party on this floor, and elsewhere, which was not anticipated; and I cannot but conclude that there must be some imperative reason controlling this division, and throwing the supporters of the present Administration into a minority in this House.

Under ordinary circumstances, it might have been expected that Kansas, applying here for admission as a State under a constitution with or without slavery, would have received an affirmative response by a fair majority vote of this body; and although I need not say what would have been my course on such a supposition, yet it is but fair to acknowledge, what I believe to be the truth, that every northern Democrat in this Hall would have stood honestly pledged to support such a measure, and his constituents would have expected him to vote for it; and I have no doubt that each of them would have redeemed his pledge in good faith. Politically, they are my enemies; and I am theirs. I have never asked nor received political favors at their hands; nor do I now ask or expect such from them. I make this statement in justice to them, and especially as due to the Democracy of my State, who are without a Representative on this floor. Open dealing demands that they should not be misapprehended or misstated with my consent. It has been aptly said that one portion of the Democratic party in this contest stands upon the "Cincinnati platform," but a much larger portion stand upon the "Cincinnati Directory." Candor requires me to say much the largest portion of the Democracy of my State stands upon the platform.

Now, sir, without further preliminary, I propose to examine the only two questions in the premises which ought to be settled in order to determine our proper course in relation to this subject. These two questions are:

1. Is Kansas properly here asking for admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution?
2. Does this Lecompton constitution embody the fairly expressed, unbiased will of a majority of the legal voters of Kansas?

If these two questions can be satisfactorily answered in the affirmative, then there should be an end of all strife. But if the propositions implied in these questions be not true, then there is an end of all power and of all right on the part of Congress in the premises.

Nothing can be clearer than that the admission of a State into the Union is in the nature of a contract, the parties to which are the United States and the inchoate State. There can be no contract without competent contracting parties; and if Kansas be not legally here to ask for or consent to the proposed admission, then such admission on our part would be not only intervention, but oppression.

Sir, I deny that Kansas is properly here at all asking admission. The Lecompton contrivance, which is the only ground or pretense on which such admission is now urged, is the offspring of the frauds and trickery of a small number of reckless men, whom the people of Kansas regard as usurpers; and the presentation of it here is an act of rebellion against the laws of the Territory, and the authority of the United States. The convention that framed it was the creature of a Legislature brought into existence by armed intervention, by invasion, and by violence—a total subversion of the organic act, and a clear violation of the Federal Constitution.

This Legislature was chosen at an election in the Territory, at which 6,331 votes were polled. The whole Territory was divided into eighteen election districts, which were formed into ten council districts and thirteen representative districts. An invasion took place at the time of this election, which extended to every council district, to every representative district except one, and to every election district but three. By the poll-books and the census rolls, on file in the office of the Secretary of the Territory, it appears, that of the whole 6,331 votes polled at this election, 898 of them only were cast by residents of the Territory, and 5,433 by non-residents. As about three weeks elapsed between the time of the completion of the census and the election, some trifling changes may have taken place. As navigation was scarcely opened, the changes from immigration could not have exceeded a hundred. I feel authorized to say, the whole number of legal votes cast could not have exceeded a thousand. Whence came the other votes? These votes were given by the armed invaders, after they had first driven from the polls, by threats and by violence, more than two thirds of the legal voters, whose names appear on the census rolls.

So much for the documentary evidence on file in the Territory. As to who these invaders were,

I remark, it was proved before the committee, of which I was a member, by the testimony of three hundred and twenty-six witnesses, selected mainly from amongst residents of Kansas and Missouri, of every shade of political opinion, and some of them of the highest respectability, that 4,921 of them came from Missouri for the express purpose of carrying the election; that the invasion was neither accidental nor unorganized. It was deliberately formed, thoroughly organized, and extended to every council district, and to every representative district except one, for the express purpose of carrying, in both branches, the entire Legislature that was to give form and character to the institutions of the Territory, and to provide the means of controlling all succeeding Legislatures.

The organization of companies, the enlistment of men, and the payment of expenses, were promoted, if not wholly accomplished, by means of clubs or societies formed in Missouri, which met in secret, and were bound by certain oaths or obligations to use all lawful means in their power to make Kansas a slave State. Of course, they themselves were to be the judges of what was lawful in the premises. And the invasion itself furnished the first illustration of what, in their view, was lawful.

At the time the witnesses were examined before the committee, I have reason to believe, and do believe, that not one of them knew whether a comparison of the names on the census rolls and the poll lists was ever to be made; or if made, whether or not the comparison would furnish corroboration or contradiction of their statements. Nor did the committee, at that time, know what the comparison would develop. But its completion not only confirmed, beyond all controversy, the truthfulness of the witnesses, but established the fact, by this unerring test, that the fraudulent votes were some four hundred more than the parol testimony made them. The Lecompton convention was called into existence by the act of a Legislature, one branch of which was elected by those invaders at that time; the other branch was the offspring of its unjust apportionment and its illegal and unconstitutional test-oaths, and of new frauds.

But it is said that this Legislature had been recognized by the President and by both branches of Congress. This is not true in fact, nor is any recognition possible which could at all legalize these frauds. As this invasion was in direct violation of the organic act and the whole scope and spirit of the constitution, a total subversion of the law organizing the territorial government, no recognition could legalize this subversion or overthrow of the organic act, unless the recognition was equivalent to the repeal of the organic act. The act and its subversion being in their nature contrary the one to the other could, by no possibility be, without pro tanto, destroying one or the other. And if the recognition amounted to a repeal of the organic act, in whole or in such parts as provided for a Legislature, then it follows that the Legislature could not exist, for the law authorizing it is supposed to be repealed by the force of the recognition. The truth is, it is absurd to talk about recognizing wholesale frauds that amount to a complete overthrow of the organic act. It is a contradiction in terms. And the President might as well have undertaken to enlighten his clerical correspondents upon the subject of recognizing piracy, robbery, or murder, as the robbery of the people of Kansas of their rights by the subversion of the Kansas-Nebraska act. The recognition might make its authors "accessories after the fact," but could not at all change the nature of the crime or disprove its existence.

But, as a matter of fact, this House never in any manner recognized, or attempted to recognize, the Legislature of the 30th March, 1855, but in several different ways, at different times, treated it and its acts as nullities, as was fully shown the other day by my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SHERMAN.] I need not therefore enumerate the facts here.

We see, therefore, that the "Lecompton constitution," being, as it was, the creature of usurpation, the child of an "illegal despotism," was as destitute of all rightful authority in its origin, as it is of popular favor in its maturity. Illegitimate in its origin, it is now in its development, by at least four fifths of those who were expected to "father it," loathed and feared, shunned and scorned.

In this connection, I wish to enter my most solemn protest against any such recognition ever being established as a precedent. If this should ever become the settled doctrine of this Government, it would not only destroy slavery in all the States, but all local control of domestic institutions of every kind; crush out and destroy every vestige of "State Rights," and speedily destroy the Union itself. For if the people of Missouri can organize an invading force of five thousand men, arm them, and march them into Kansas, distribute them through all the districts, and of the two thousand nine hundred and five legal voters of the Territory, drive from the polls all except eight hundred and ninety-eight, and by means of more than five thousand illegal votes thus distributed, elect the entire Legislature, in both its branches, in spite of the people or their organic law, then, when this Legislature, so elected, assembles and adopts one hundred and fifty-four chapters of the statutes of Missouri, without so much as dotting one i or crossing one t, but attempting to localize and apply this wholesale spurious legislation, by gravely enacting that, "whenever the words 'State of Missouri' occur in these chapters, it shall be understood to mean 'Territory of Kansas,'" and then complete this Kansas (?) code by a series of acts that would shame the worst despot that ever walked the face of the earth—one of which acts made it a felony, punishable in the penitentiary, for the people to say, write, or print, what the organic act said they might do; and when the people protest and remonstrate against this wholesale robbery of their rights, this total subversion of the organic law, utterly denying the legality of this monstrous usurpation, eloquently demanding of the President, by every consideration of patriotic duty, by every tie that binds good men to their country, by all the fearful sanctions of his oath of office, to overthrow this monster of fraud and violence, and restore their rights, and "leave them perfectly free to form and regulate their own domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States;" if the President, with the documentary evidence on file in the office of the Secretary of the Territory, showing that of the whole six thousand three hundred and thirty-one votes, six sevenths of them were given by non-residents, in violation of the organic act, which he was sworn to execute; I say, if the President, either because the fear of the then prospective Cincinnati convention was before his eyes, or for any other reason, not only refuse all relief, but, upon the demand of the usurpers and their friends, stretch forth his arm and use the military power of the Government to compel the people to submit to the pretended laws thus imposed upon them, thus converting the Army into a contemptible posse, or bogus constables; and if this is to become the established doctrine, the ruling policy, the approved action, of Democratic (?) administrations, why may not the people of Illinois, or any other free State, organize invading forces of her own citizens; distribute them at all the voting precincts in Missouri; choose a Legislature for her; enact Illinois laws for her, particularly those prohibiting slavery; and then, if the people of Missouri are in any wise factious, call upon the Executive to follow the precedent; to declare the people of Missouri rebels, and put them down, and compel submission to the laws (?) by the whole power of the Government.

Sir, of all the domestic institutions of this country, none are more dependent for safety upon the strict adherence to State rights than slavery. Let its friends beware how they sanction a precedent that is subversive of all local organic laws. If you do not wish to plant thorns in the dying pillow of slavery, let no excitement, no hope of temporary advantage, lead you to abandon the great anchor of all your well-grounded hopes. Let no man deceive himself upon this most vital point. Whosoever acknowledges the legality of this Lecompton swindle of this monstrous usurpation, gives his sanction to this precedent, and, Haman-like, is erecting the gallows upon which, at no distant day, he may "Feel the halter draw

With poor opinion of the law."

Away, then, with this illegitimate Lecompton bantling! this Cunningham baby! Kansas is not here, either asking or consenting to admission under this detestable fraud.

But even if we should, for the sake of the argument, admit the validity of the law authorizing the Lecompton convention by conceding the legal existence of the bogus Legislature, still its organization was fraudulent and in utter violation of the pretended law authorizing it. If it be admitted that this political Burdell might have been the father of such a child, still it is as clear as the noon-day sun that it was never born of its pretended mother, but was a bantling from the lowest ranks of fraud, vice, and usurpation.

Mr. Walker, in speaking on that subject, says:

"That convention had vital, not technical, defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment—as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses—by the submission of the constitution for ratification or rejection by the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly-organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken, and the voters registered; and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters.

"These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give a solitary vote for delegates to the convention."

Mr. Stanton, the acting-Governor of Kansas, under whom this registry was made, and this census taken, says:

"There are thirty-eight counties, gentlemen, in the Territory of Kansas, including the distant county of Arapahoe. In nineteen of these counties an imperfect register was obtained, giving a vote of nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one. In the other nineteen counties there was no census and no registration."

That is, nineteen thirty-fourths of the districts were left out altogether from the very basis of representation.

In nine of the disfranchised counties in which no census was taken, 1,624 votes were cast against the constitution, as certified by Denver:

Counties.	Against.	With slavery.	Without slavery.	Total.
Allen	192	1	4	196
Anderson	177	-	-	177
Breckinridge	191	-	-	191
Coffee	463	-	4	467
Davis	21	-	-	21
Franklin	304	-	-	304
Madison	40	-	-	40
Richardson	177	-	1	178
Woodson	50	-	-	50

The whole number of votes given for all the delegates to the Lecompton convention was between seventeen and eighteen hundred; but the number cast for those members who signed the constitution could not have exceeded one thousand. And yet 1,624, without any fault of their own, were excluded from voting in nine of the nineteen disfranchised counties. From the other disfranchised counties I have no returns.

As has been fully shown by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, by Governor Walker, Mr. Secretary Stanton, and others, the law directed a census to be taken in all the counties, and a registration to be made of all the legal voters, by officers appointed for the purpose, over whose appointment the people could have no control. This census was imperfectly taken in one half of the counties, and not taken, or attempted to be taken at all, in the other counties. The registration of qualified voters was not attempted in fifteen counties, and imperfectly, even fraudulently done, in the other counties. Admit, if you please, that the census and enrollment were more imperfect in these counties from the hostility of a portion of the people to the whole scheme: still the fact remains that nineteen counties were partially and fifteen counties wholly disfranchised in utter violation of the law authorizing the convention, and, as Governor Walker well says, "without any fault of the people." Grant, if you please, for the sake of the argument, that the people did wrong in not voting for delegates in the counties where they could: still the fact remains that these other counties were disfranchised without any fault of their own, and this in violation of the pretended law of the convention's existence. Every attempt made by these counties to exercise their rights was defeated by the rejection of the members which they did elect, for the very reason that no registry had been made for them. Nine of these nineteen disfranchised counties have since, at an election authorized by the Territorial Legislature, admitted to have been fairly elected in October last, and recognized by the President in his instructions to Governor Denver, cast nearly as many votes against the constitution as were cast in the whole Territory for the delegates who framed it. Many of the delegates elected were chosen with the distinct understanding, nay, under the written pledge, that the constitution to be framed, not the slavery clause under the constitution, but the constitution itself, should be submitted to the whole people for their acceptance or rejection. Without this pledge they could not have been elected. But when their work is completed they refuse to submit it to the vote of the people, because they would vote it down—the very reason that makes submission imperative. But the President comes to the rescue by giving us to understand that the people would have voted it down without reference to its merits? Sir, who made him the judge of the reasons that control the votes of freemen? Why should our Chief Magistrate take this step in advance of the worst tyranny that ever existed? He tells us it is impossible for any people to proceed more regularly in the formation of a constitution than has been done in Kansas. Sir, I submit, it is impossible for proceedings to be more irregular or unfair; impossible that the subversion of the laws and the disregard of the popular will in any Territory could be more complete. And whatever may be our action, whether we vote for or against this Lecompton-Cunningham contrivance, it will stand for all time, whenever justice and fair dealing, liberty and truth, shall be respected as the very synonym of fraud and trickery, of usurpation and violence; in short, of every element of tyranny.

The President thinks we mistake the state of affairs in Kansas. The people are not divided into political parties simply striving for the mastery, but a portion of them are in rebellion against the laws. I give the substance of his remarks without having his language before me. Sir, if the President had characterized the invasion of 30th March, which, by the aid of a small minority—not over six hundred of the two thousand nine hundred and five legal voters of the Territory—usurped the government and trampled the organic law under their feet, and all the outrages traceable directly to this overthrow of the organic act of the Territory, as rebellion, we might, for once, have conceded that he was right. But I deny that resistance to a subversion of the law is rebellion against the law. Resistance to the overthrow of the law is in the highest sense obedience to the law. And let the Administration beware, lest by their aid and comfort to usurpers they be found violators of the law. Resistance to usurpers is obedience to law? Let us not be diverted from the real question. Away with all side issues. Let us hear no more about Kansas being rejected simply because the Lecompton constitution recognizes slavery. Sir, I repeat, Kansas is not here asking admission with or without slavery. This is not her act and deed. Its presentation here is in direct opposition to the territorial authority established by Congress, and is rebellion.

Upon the second branch of this subject I scarcely need detain the committee one moment. So far from reflecting the will of the people, this whole scheme is detested, loathed, and scorned by at least four fifths of all the legal voters in the Territory. Its friends were obliged to violate their solemn written pledges to submit it to the people for ratification or rejection, to save it from oblivion. And attempts are made to give reasons why the most unreasonable majority would have rejected it. From a careful examination of the facts, aided by some knowledge of the Territory and its people, it is my deliberate judgment that there are not two thousand five hundred legal voters in the Territory who approve of this pretended constitution. Of all the votes cast or returned on the 21st of December, in my opinion at least four thousand of them were fraudulent. Of one thing I am certain. I can demonstrate beyond all power of successful contradiction that down to the 1st of July, 1856, the time of making the Kansas report, the pro-slavery party had never polled, at any election in the Territory, seven hundred legal votes. Gentlemen talk about Abolitionists and "emigrant aid societies." Sir, of all the free-State men in Kansas, when I was there, more than three fourths of them were Kansas-Nebraska Democrats. And especially is this true of those whose course has been most loudly condemned. This is true of Lane, Roberts, Jenkins, and others.

Another fact is apparent to every observer. A large proportion, probably more than half, of the emigrants from Missouri who came into the Territory pro-slavery men as actual settlers, have become free-State men, and are now among the most inflexible opponents of this Lecompton swindle. The better feelings of their natures revolted against the fraud and trickery and violence practiced, and they remonstrated, protesting that Kansas should be made a slave State by fair means, or not at all. They were abused and denounced, and then, as some of them expressed it, they "got on to the fence," and after a while, "come clear over"—a process similar to that developed in the history of the four Governors. Gentlemen talk of the "Emigrant Aid Society," and I was amused at the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. ANDERSON,] the other day, on this subject, in connection with the frauds of the 30th of March, 1855. Sir, I could have told that gentleman the precise number of votes cast at that election by "emigrant aid men," sent out during the whole four months immediately preceding that election. I could have told him how many went out under the auspices of the society; how many of them were women and children; how many men; and how many of them voted at this election; and what their names were. But for the reluctance I always feel at interrupting zealous speakers, I should have told him; for I was sorry to witness those random thrusts with his virgin blade into this oft-assaulted phantom. Right valiantly he renewed the assault upon this Quixotic windmill. I could have told him that the whole number sent out after the close of navigation in the fall of 1854, down to and including the 30th of March, 1855, (the day of election,) under the auspices of the Emigrant Aid Society, was one hundred and sixty-six persons, of whom sixty-nine were women and children, and ninety-seven men; and of these, only thirty-seven voted at this election, and they became actual settlers and had a right to vote. Sir, I measure my terms with exact accuracy when I say the number was thirty-seven. It was not thirty-eight, or thirty-six, or any other number, more or less, than thirty-seven. And yet the hundredth time, more or less, this bugbear is trotted out to divert attention from, and to excuse, palliate, and justify, a complete subversion of the organic act by an armed invasion of five thousand men, under the control of secret conclaves, gotten up for the express purpose of slavery propaganda.

Sir, I care nothing for the emigrant aid societies. I never belonged to them. I never aided them in any way. But, after the most careful examination of all the facts, I do not believe it can be shown that one single northern man ever went to Kansas for the express purpose of voting at any election without the intention of settling in the Territory. The efforts of the North, so far as they appear, were directed to promoting the settlement of the country by men who sympathized with their views, and not to the defeat of the will of the actual settlers by spurious votes, or by violence.

At the election held on the 4th of January last, an election admitted to be lawful and peaceful, at which more votes were polled than have ever been given at any other election, this constitution was voted down by more than ten thousand majority. The Territorial Legislature, who fairly reflect the will of a vast majority of the people, by a unanimous vote declare the whole thing is the work of a small minority of the people living in nineteen of the thirty-eight counties only. With the greatest possible solemnity, and in the highest forms known to the law, they protest against this being the expression of the will of the people of Kansas, or its being received as her act and deed. But why dwell longer? Amidst the most persistent, systematic efforts to stifle inquiry, to throttle every attempt at investigation, the evidences of this wicked and foul conspiracy rise on every hand, mountain high. It was so when the committee were prosecuting their labor in Kansas in 1856.

Amidst all the confusion and violence, the frauds and trickery, the cunning and treachery, the spirit of the highest seemed to brood over the surface of that vast sea of chaos, and everywhere the celestial form of truth was seen rising up from the depths beneath—more and more disclosing her symmetrical proportions, and assisting her unity, dignity, divinity, and power. All effects to crush her but hastened the development, until she stood forth telling the one complete, harmonious story of a people's wrongs. Sir, from my inmost soul I believe the hand of a just God is in this business. He who planted this glorious Republic, and has hitherto led us, will fight the battles of the oppressed people of Kansas, and, in spite of their sneers and their rage, He "will cause the wrath" of these usurpers "to praise Him, and the remainder of wrath He will restrain."

My conclusion, then, is, Kansas is not here asking admission at our hands; nor does this Lecompton swindle reflect her will; and Congress has neither the power nor the right to admit her. It is to her the emblem of usurpation, oppression, violence, and suffering. It is, for the best of all reasons, more odious to her than the "stamp act" was to our fathers.

Notwithstanding all the guarantees of the Kansas-Nebraska act, giving them the right to self-government, as was claimed by the Democratic party, they have, in the short period of their history, suffered at the hands of Democratic Administrations more oppression and tyranny, violence and usurpation, than all that the people of the whole thirteen Colonies suffered at the hands of Great Britain during the whole period of their colonial existence. I will take any man, at any time, in any place, argument for argument, fact for fact, and prove the truth of this statement. And such is the uniformity of the distinctive marks of tyranny in different ages, that nearly all of the grievances so masterly enumerated in the Declaration of Independence, apply as cases in point to the sufferings of the people of Kansas. And, sir, let me tell gentlemen they never can be conquered. There is no power on earth that can subdue them. They may be exterminated; but subdued, never! Gentlemen must consider this question is not whether negroes shall be slaves, but whether white men, Anglo-Saxons, can be free. The history of the race furnishes the answer. Besides, fraud, oppressions, and violence, cannot be made the substrata of the institutions of an enduring State. When will men learn this plain truth, that fraud, injustice, and oppression, cannot obtain lasting power over a free people, or enduring peace in a republican State?

But we are told that southern rights are involved, and the rejection of the Lecompton contrivance would be a humiliation to the South.

Sir, I wish to say, once for all, no vote or act of mine shall ever inflict a known wrong upon the South, or any other section of the Union, or tend to their humiliation. So far from feeling hostility, I consider their success our success; their glory our glory; their humiliation our humiliation—one and all the children of a common heritage.

But I deny that the South, as such, has any rights in the premises. Neither has the North.

The citizens of all sections have the right to emigrate to Kansas; and when they become settlers, are entitled to the rights secured under the constitution and the organic act. But there are no longer southern rights, or northern rights; but Kansas rights. The people, North and South, who do not choose to go, have the right to insist that the Government of Kansas, shall be republican in form. Is not this the whole of it? Sir, we are to look to the rights of Kansas. Every speech echoes the cry, "southern rights," "northern rights," and yet none of them tell us what rights either the North or South have. It is easy to cry out "aggression," "encroachment," but the charge is not yet proved, scarcely attempted. If any section has the right to set up this cry, it is the "West," and not the South or the North. Dismiss, then, this false issue, and meet the question upon its merits. Is Kansas here asking admission? Does the Lecompton contrivance express the will of her people? The solution of the real question involves no humiliation to the North or the South. A false issue is stated—the humiliation of the South is claimed to be involved, and a dissolution of the Union is threatened. As the old women and young children of the "North" have ceased to be frightened at this cry, I need not dwell upon it.

Equally foreign to the real issue is the discussion of slavery in the abstract. For hours together we have listened to labored arguments by southern members to prove that slavery is recognized by the Bible. Have these arguments convinced any one in or out of this House? Suppose the proposition be true or false: does the one or the other prove that the Lecompton constitution is the act and deed of Kansas, or that it reflects the will of her people? Certainly not. Sir, I do not believe this is the proper place to discuss or determine the Bible argument of slavery. But, since it has been constantly thrust upon us, I cannot forbear to introduce here the few brief words of another, which, I believe, express the sentiments of twenty-nine thirtieths of the people of my district upon the discussion of the subject everywhere:

"The spirit of slavery never seeks refuge in the Bible of its own accord. The horns of the altar are its last resort—seized only in desperation as it rushes from the terror of the avenger's arm. Like other unclean spirits, it 'hatheth the light, neither cometh to the light, lest its deeds should be reproved.' Goaded to frenzy in its conflicts with conscience and common sense, denied all quarter, and hunted from every covert, it vaults over the sacred inclosure, and courses up and down the Bible, seeking rest and finding none. The law of love, glowing on every page, flashes around it an omnipresent anguish and despair. It shrinks from the hated light, and howls under the consuming touch, as demons quailed before the Son of God, and shrieked, 'Torment us not!' At last, it slinks away under the types of the Mosaic system, and seeks to burrow out of sight among their shadows. Vain hope! Its asylum is its sepulcher; its city of refuge, the city of destruction. It flies from light into the sun, from heat into devouring fire, and from the voice of God into the thickest of his thunders."

Alike inappropriate is the discussion, of which we have heard so much, about the balance of power between the North and the South. Sir, this fanciful equilibrium between the North and the South has proved the Pandora's box from which have sprung sectional strifes and legislative anomalies. The idea is as chimerical as it is mischievous. The Constitution establishes the elements of power under our system. It does not create, but only recognizes them. In their nature they were inherent and inalienable existing long before the Constitution. Population is the chief element of power. The number of those to be governed, whose consent is requisite to its proper exercise, is the measure of the power. By what process, then, under this system will you make six million of people equal in political power to thirteen million? Nay, if the institution, peculiar to the South and so much cherished by her, has in sixty-nine years, under the legitimate working of the Constitution, produced this disparity in numbers, what shall hinder it becoming still greater in the future, since the stream of European emigration is all the time increasing in its volume and force as the beneficent character of our institutions are becoming more known, and the great enterprises and improvements of the day furnish increasing employment, and a heartier welcome is extended to those who are escaping from the oppression of the Old World? If the South would retain power must she not have population? And can the streams of free emigration be turned into the slave States? Will the mass of free and slave laborers mingle in the same State or community? Are not the two systems of slave and free labor antagonistic and hostile to each other? And does not the establishment of the one in a State as effectually exclude the other as would a "wall of fire?" Call it prejudice if you will. Call it what you please, it exists as a fact, and must inevitably work out its results. But for slavery the South would have had more population to-day than the North, as she has more and richer soil and a milder climate. It is not for us to complain of her or her institutions. Her course rests in her own sovereign pleasure. It is not for us to dictate or complain of her action. Let her do what seemeth her good without any interference from without. But if, in the exercise of her own sovereign will, she still cherishes in her bosom an institution that necessarily drives from her the very elements of power she so much desires, why does she still complain?

Before the revolutionary war the people of Virginia and Georgia, in their primary assemblies, complained of the British Government for thrusting upon them this system, which tended to keep out free labor, the mechanic arts, and the great elements of healthful growth and prosperity. It is not less true to-day. The sacred memories that cluster around the names of these glorious old States, prevent my speaking of either of them but in terms of the profoundest respect. But I am speaking of the power of a State and the means of its increase. Does any man doubt that but for slavery, Virginia would have had forty Representatives to-day on this floor? I make no comparison in any spirit of hostility; far otherwise. When the Constitution was adopted, the first apportionment was embodied in the instrument itself. By it Virginia had ten members, and New York six. In all the elements of greatness and power she far exceeded New York. Once and a half her size, abounding in minerals, but little waste land, a genial climate, and she possessed superior commercial advantages. Norfolk had three times the commerce of New York. Less than three fourths of a century have rolled round, and the whole trade of Norfolk scarcely furnishes a unit with which to reckon up the business of New York. Both were slave States. New York abolished slavery. Trade and commerce, and the mechanic arts began to thrive, her agricultural resources have been rapidly developed, and she is filled to overflowing with an active, bustling, enterprising, thriving population, and she has thirty-three members, and Virginia thirteen on this floor.

It does not concern me, in this connection, to dwell upon the evils or advantages attendant upon these developments under the one system or the other, nor to discuss with gentlemen the effects of emancipation in the West Indies, or any other foreign country. It is the balance of power, and the means of preserving it alone, we are considering. And emancipation in the northern States of this Union would be a more suitable example for southern statesmen to consider; especially, if the balance of power is what they desire. Just in proportion as the South has hugged this system of slavery to her bosom, has its stench repelled the laboring white men from seeking homes within her borders, bringing with them the elements of power and prosperity to the State. Do not your own white laborers instinctively recoil from every species of labor performed by slaves, and thus lead a life of miserable compromise between degradation and idleness on the one hand, and starvation on the other? and thus the very sources of prosperity and power are dried up or palsied. If no more slaves were to be sold to go out of those States, is there one single section of land in Virginia, Maryland, Delaware, or Missouri, that is worth more money with any conceivable number of slaves on it, than it would be if there were not one slave in those States? I think not. But this is no concern of ours. All we ask is, if you desire power, do not hug that to your bosoms which repels the elements of power, by a law as irresistible as the law that keeps the planets in their orbits.

But suppose that a majority of this House and of the Senate can be found in the high excitement, the utter blindness of the moment, to vote for the admission of Kansas on this fraudulent application—suppose you celebrate the nuptials with songs and rejoicings. What have you gained by going through these mocking forms of law? Proclaim the bans and perform the marriage ceremony, but you will find in the end that you have admitted into this family of sister States, not the virgin daughter of Kansas, happy in her own choice and cheerfully yielding her priceless and free-born treasures to the alliance she has sought, but only a foul and despicable courtesan begotten in wickedness and debauched in all her career; formidable only in her crime and her impudence, and destined to be driven from the soil she has polluted, under the execration and the scorn of all just men. And what will you have gained by the shameful farce? A new State to the Union? By no means. For Kansas, in the proper sovereignty of her real people, will spurn your unhallowed embrace. She will warn you away from her sacred presence as a virtuous woman would wither, by her frown, the base miscreant that approaches only to insult her.

And will you have buried the question and disposed of a most serious disturbing subject by this great peace measure, as the President would blindly and erroneously have us believe? No, gentlemen; you have done no such thing. You have only aggravated, a thousand fold, the original wrong! Instead of peace, you have incited and inflamed the strife. You have treated the creature of five thousand invaders from Missouri on the soil of Kansas as though it were the lawful child of the lawful citizens of Kansas; and as far as your authority can go, you have invested and installed this bastard pretender with all the sovereign prerogatives and rights of the State of Kansas; while, at the same time, you have ignored the existence and the will of the real people of Kansas, and dealt with them as though they were rebels and traitors. And do gentlemen flatter themselves that this will bring enduring peace, while every fact and every principle involved in it shows, beyond all doubt, that it is only marked by fraud and injustice from the beginning to the end? What is to be the fruit of such a victory as this? I ask gentlemen to pause and consider it well before they reach forth their hands to pluck the trophies which they vainly flatter themselves are just now within their grasp.

If it is expected by gentlemen here or elsewhere, that, this act once passed, the strife will soon be over, and the people of Kansas will quietly settle down into acquiescence, leaving their usurpers to enjoy the spoils of an unholy triumph, they may as well be told at once that no such result will follow. They have suffered one outrage after another, until forbearance has ceased to be a virtue; and nothing but their desire to avoid collision with the General Government, and to leave the way open for the redress of grievances by the Federal Congress, has long since prevented them from breaking forth with desolating indignation on their oppressors. They have waited and borne on patiently, still hoping and believing that justice would be done them here; they have waited to see the closing act of the drama, and are prepared to meet it in whatever shape it may come; peacefully and gratefully, if we will but do them simple justice, and still observe the stipulations of their organic act; but, if we will not do that—if we mean to give them this fraud, baptized by Federal action, back again, to shame and outrage them—if we mean to force it on them—then there is no longer any hope of peace and reconciliation. It will "make the infant sinews strong as steel." They will do as the fathers of the Revolution did—another Washington will marshal her sons for the strife; another Henry will arise to herald the purpose of the people, to expose the despotism of our boasted constitutional Government, to show it has been made the worst of all tyrannies, that it has trampled down the most sacred rights of the people, that it has denied them every principle of self-government, and to proclaim, in a voice of thunder, rolling through the whole land, that "resistance to tyrants is obedience to God."

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Chairman, in discussing the question of the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution, I must be content to pass over an already well reaped field. Had I obtained the floor at an early period of this debate, my views would have had at least the appearance of originality, which I cannot hope to command for them now, concentrated as the discussion of this question has already had upon it the force of so many intellects in this and the other branch of Congress.

When the Kansas-Nebraska bill became a law, the country fondly hoped that Congress had at last established a permanent principle in the formation of territorial governments, preparatory to their admission as States, upon the basis of which all future Territories would be organized, and by which Kansas and Nebraska would be enabled, eventually, to come into the Union without a question as to the existence or non-existence of slavery within their limits. The repeal of the Missouri compromise, virtually effected by the principle of the compromise measures of 1850, and legally consummated by the Kansas-Nebraska bill, wiped out a fruitful source of bad feeling, and relieved one section of the Union from the inequality which, under its existence, it had so long suffered. The principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, as defined by its authors and supporters everywhere throughout the length and breadth of the land, cannot be better stated than by reading the material clause of that measure:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

The party opposed to the Kansas-Nebraska bill held that the act of 1820 was constitutional. They contended that Congress had absolute power over the question of slavery in the Territories. They went even further, and contended that slavery in this country could exist nowhere except by express authority of law. Whilst each one of these propositions was untenable, and whilst the Democratic party held the opposite, these questions had never been presented to that tribunal which, under our Constitution, had alone the right to determine the power of Congress over the question. But since the passage of that bill, the Supreme Court has decided all the questions in controversy; they have declared that the Missouri prohibition was unconstitutional; that Congress has no power over the subject of slavery in the Territories, and that the people thereof have no right to exclude the institution of slavery until they reach the period of change from the condition of a Territory to that of a State. I have been taught, Mr. Chairman, to venerate that high tribunal, to regard its determination of all questions as final and binding upon every loyal citizen of the country, and to acquiesce gracefully in any decision it may make upon any issue before it. That, sir, was the school in which I was taught, as I had hoped every citizen of this country had been. I was mistaken, sir. To my surprise I find that court denounced for its decision upon this question, its decree hooted at and derided, and its spotless integrity assailed. It has been charged that it formed a corrupt and unholy combination with the slave power; that it and the present Executive formed a coalition to "undermine the national Legislature and destroy the liberties of the people;" that a mock issue by the means of which this decision could be reached had been concocted, and that the court had stretched, nay exceeded, its constitutional authority to decide these points; and that, therefore, its decision should not be regarded. These denunciations, sir, coming from the members of the Republican party, an organization so perfectly destitute of political integrity itself as to make no assault upon private or official character too detestable for its leaders to attempt, can well be attributed to that ruthless disregard of everything sacred in our Government which has characterized that party from its formation to the present moment.

But, sir, I was struck with astonishment to notice a Senator from my own State, [Mr. CRYSTENDEN,] in a speech which is paraded in full in the New York Tribune, (an unusual locality for a speech of a southern man,) instead of denouncing these infamous slanders and treasonable assaults upon the Supreme Court, giving to them the aid of a criticism of his own upon their decision in the Dred Scott case—availing himself of the occasion to protest his high opinion of the Missouri compromise, and to set up his senatorial dictum of the propriety of that measure against that of the court declaring its unconstitutionality. Sir, it was indeed a strange spectacle to behold a southern Senator finding fault with a decision of the Supreme Court declaring unconstitutional a restriction which prevented the people of his State from enjoying equally with those of others the right of property in the common territory of the Union—territory acquired as well by their blood and treasure as that of any other section of the Union. Sir, that Senator will find that the people of Kentucky will rebuke all attacks upon the decisions of the highest tribunal recognized by the Constitution, whether they emanate from their open and avowed enemies—the Black Republicans—or on the other hand are the result of the tenacious opinions of one of her own sons, although they may have been entertained for "thirty years."

We have been told, Mr. Chairman, time and again, that the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill was itself the cause of all the riot, treason, bloodshed, revolution, murder, and every other crime, which has marked the history of Kansas since that time. That these were the legitimate results of that bill is too absurd a proposition to require serious refutation. Why, sir, if that be true, why have such scenes and crimes not illustrated the history of Nebraska, the government of which was formed by the same bill as that of Kansas. Nebraska is quiet, Kansas is turbulent. You, gentlemen of the Republican party, are responsible for every act of lawlessness which has been committed in Kansas. You sowed the seed which has been the fruitful source of every iota of the trouble which it has been the misfortune of Kansas to suffer. You ask me how you are responsible? I will tell you. No sooner had that bill passed, than fearful that if the Territory was left to be populated according to the regular progress of settlement, that Kansas would become a slave State, you set on foot here, in Washington, a plan to stimulate an unnatural immigration from the North therein, to make war upon the security of slave title in Kansas, and to prevent your brethren of the South enjoying their property therein; your members of Congress started the thing here. The Hon. Daniel Mace, then a member of Congress, one of the founders of the scheme of emigrant aid, before a select committee of the last House testified to the fact, and stated that the leading object of the movement was "to prevent the introduction of slavery into Kansas." Your present ally, the Senator from Illinois, charged upon you in the Senate, in his report on Kansas affairs, at the first session of the last Congress, as follows:

"Finding opposition to the principles of the act unavailing in the Halls of Congress, and under the forms of the Constitution, combinations were immediately entered into, in some portions of the Union, to control the political destinies, and form and regulate the domestic institutions of these Territories and future States, through the machinery of emigrant aid societies."

Your Emigrant Aid Society, under the presidency of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THAYER,] which followed the congressional movement here, and which has fomented most of the treason in Kansas, came in for a notice in the Senator's report. Referring to it, he said:

"It becomes a question of fearful import how far the operations of the company (the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Society) are compatible with the rights and liberties of the people."

It was these movements—these emigrant aid societies—stimulated by the bitter, hostile antagonism of the Republicans of the North against the South, formed for the very purpose of defeating a fair operation of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and not the bill itself, that has caused all the difficulties in Kansas.

I now, Mr. Chairman, propose to trace the history of this Territory up to the time of the presentation of the Lecompton constitution to Congress. The Kansas-Nebraska bill became a law on the 30th of May, 1854. The first Territorial Legislature assembled under that act, passed an act in July, 1855, submitting to the people the question as to whether they would call a convention to form a State constitution, preparatory to admission into the Union. This vote was taken on the first Monday of October, 1856, more than sixteen months after the passage of the bill submitting the question, giving to the people an ample opportunity to reflect upon the subject. There was no indecent haste to hurry the grave and important question to a precipitate issue. Sufficient time was afforded for additional immigration into the Territory, so as to avoid the possibility of an improper determination of the question as to whether Kansas should be a State or not. The Territorial Legislature met in January, 1857, and on the 20th of February thereafter, in accordance with the instructions of the people, passed a law for taking a census, for making a registry of voters, and for the election of delegates to a convention.

Under the provisions of this act, nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one names were returned as legal voters. In some of the counties no registration was had, from the fact that in some of them the inhabitants, urged on to do so by the Black Republican party, refused to have their names registered, and in others gave fictitious instead of their bona fide names. In the counties in which there was no registration, the evidence is conclusive that the voters could not possibly have exceeded three thousand. So careful was the Legislature to have a fair election and a full expression of the sentiments of the people in the election of delegates, that they provided by law that one month should be allowed for the correction of the list of voters returned, by adding to the same names which may have been omitted, or striking off others which had been improperly registered. The then Governor was actively engaged in urging the people to comply with the law, and have their names registered. The list of voters having been completed according to the requirements of the law, the acting Governor (Stanton) proceeded to apportion the delegates, (the same being limited to sixty,) so as to secure an equality of representation. The election of delegates took place on the 3d Monday of June, 1857. The convention met in September, 1857; and, after deliberation, agreed upon what is known as the Lecompton constitution. The convention submitted to the people so much of said constitution as embraced "the only question of difference" between them—namely, the slavery question. The vote was taken on the 21st day of December, 1857, which resulted as follows: constitution with slavery, 6,226; constitution without slavery, 569—making an aggregate of 6,795 votes polled.

Thus, Mr. Chairman, I have traced the history of this constitution from its first inception down to its presentation to Congress. We see that, in every step taken, there has been a fixed and settled effort, upon the part of its friends, to give to it not only the sanction of law, but to make it the strongest reflection of popular opinion. And yet, sir, we are told that this constitution is attempted to be forced upon the people; that it is the offspring of fraud; and that to give it the addition of congressional sanction will be to impose upon the people of Kansas a monstrous wrong. Let us examine the reasons which form the basis of this assumption. Did the Legislature have the power to submit the question as to whether there should be a convention or not, to the people? That is conceded. Were there any unjust restrictions prescribed by the act submitting this question, which would fetter a fair expression of the popular will upon this subject? There were not, sir. It would seem, Mr. Chairman, that this point being conceded, it would carry with it also the concession that the Legislature had the power to pass the act calling the convention, which it did, in response to the popular vote instructing it to do so. But, sir, in order to place its power to pass the convention act upon impregnable ground, I will read from the opinions of two of the leaders of the anti-Lecompton party, which contain an answer to all the three hour speeches that the late Secretary of the Territory can deliver throughout the country, or to all the essays that the late Governor can write to anti-Lecompton meetings. Acting-Governor Stanton, before the election, in his inaugural address, said:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention; and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light, the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that in order to avoid all pretenses for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will in some form provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference be thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress, without delay, as one of the sovereign States of the American Union; and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

Mr. MONTGOMERY. I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; I will not yield the floor, because you take me off from my line of argument.

Mr. MONTGOMERY. You have said there were no test-oaths. I want to know if there was not an oath to support the constitution?

Mr. BURNETT. I will answer that question. The gentleman asks me if the voters were not required to take an oath to support the constitution. I answer that, if the constitution was adopted, they were; and I ask him if it is not the duty of every citizen of this country to support the constitution whenever it is adopted; and, whether he has taken such an oath or not, if there is not an implied obligation resting upon him, as high as any oath which could be administered to him, to support and maintain that government so long as it exists? Away, then, with this matter about test oaths. Does the gentleman complain that citizens of each State are required to obey and support their constitutions? All of the voters, sir, were invited to come to the polls, and by their votes decide the question as to whether they would have a State or not. Governor Walker, on the 27th May, also before the election, said:

"Under our practice the preliminary act of framing a State constitution is uniformly performed through the instrumentality of a convention of delegates chosen by the people themselves. That convention is now about to be elected by you on the call of the Territorial Legislature, created and still recognized by Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment."

"The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress; and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States."

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to form a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate functions when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but cannot compel the performance of that duty."

It will be seen that Mr. Stanton says nothing about referring the whole question to the people, as he now contends should have been done; but merely hoped that the convention would do what it afterwards did, namely: submit "the great distracting question regarding their social institutions to a fair vote of the actual bona fide residents." Nor did he contend for this submission as a matter of necessity—as something requisite to give validity to the work of the convention. No, sir, he made then no such absurd pretensions, but merely hoped that it would be done "to avoid all pretenses for resistance to the peaceful operations of the law" calling the convention. That is, to try and prevent what he is now aiding in doing, a factious opposition to the ratification of the Lecompton constitution by Congress. The convention was then, in his opinion, rightly the ultimate opinion of the popular will, for he says:

"The act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates."

Governor Walker's opinion, which I have quoted, is identical with that of Mr. Stanton; indeed, a coincidence in sentiment upon everything connected with Kansas marked their joint career in that Territory.

Mr. Stanton, who was busy speaking, urging upon all the people to vote in the election of delegates, said not a word about submitting the entire constitution to the people. Governor Walker did say he hoped it would be done; but there was no power to compel it. The single question of slavery was all that it was deemed necessary to submit. They, as well as Judge DOUGLAS, the leader of the anti-Lecompton forces of the Senate, never dreamed of the submission of any other part of the constitution to the popular vote. Governor Walker, in his inaugural address, said:

"You should not console yourselves, my fellow-citizens, with the reflection that you may by a subsequent vote defeat the ratification of the constitution. Although most anxious to secure to you the exercise of that great constitutional right, and believing that the convention is the servant and not the master of the people, yet I have no power to dictate the proceedings of that body."

Mr. DOUGLAS, in his celebrated Springfield speech, delivered on the 12th day of June, 1857, previous to the meeting of the convention, said:

"Kansas, is about to speak for herself, through her delegates assembled in convention to form a constitution preparatory to her admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States. Peace and prosperity now prevail throughout her borders. The law under which her delegates are about to be elected is believed to be just and fair in all its objects and provisions. There is every reason to hope and believe that the law will be fairly interpreted and impartially executed, so as to insure to every bona fide inhabitant the free and quiet exercise of the elective franchise. If any portion of the inhabitants, acting under the advice of political leaders in distant States, shall choose to absent themselves from the polls, and withhold their votes with a view of leaving the free-State Democrats in a minority, and thus securing a pro-slavery constitution in opposition to the wishes of a majority of the people living under it, let the responsibility rest upon those who, for partisan purposes, will sacrifice the principles they profess to cherish and promote. Upon them, and upon the political party for whose benefit and under the direction of whose leaders they act, let the blame be visited of fastening upon the people of a new State institutions repugnant to their feelings, and in violation of their wishes. The organic act secures to the people of Kansas the sole and exclusive right of forming and regulating their domestic institutions to suit themselves, subject to no other limitation than that which the Constitution of the United States imposes. The Democratic party is determined to see the great fundamental principle of the organic act carried out in good faith. The present election law in Kansas is acknowledged to be fair and just. The rights of the voters are clearly defined, and the exercise of these rights will be efficiently and scrupulously protected. Hence, if the majority of the people of Kansas desire to have it a free State, (and we are told by the Republican party that nine tenths of the people of that Territory are free-State men,) there is no obstacle in the way of bringing Kansas into the Union as a free State by the votes and voice of her own people, and in conformity to the great principles of the Kansas-Nebraska act; provided all the free-State men will go to the polls and vote their principles in accordance with their professions. If such is not the result, let the consequences be visited upon the heads of those whose policy it is to produce strife, anarchy, and bloodshed in Kansas; that their party may profit by slavery agitation in the northern States of this Union."

Why, Mr. Chairman, it was never contemplated by the people even that the constitution would be submitted to them, for the Legislature showed by its action that it did not deem it necessary that it should be, and did not intend it to be; for it passed the convention act over the veto of Governor Geary, who vetoed it because it did not provide for the submission of the constitution to a popular vote.

Mr. Chairman, every Democratic member of the last Congress, including Judge DOUGLAS, is committed to the provisions of the Kansas convention act. It will be recollected that the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] during the last Congress, introduced a bill, which was referred to the Committee on Territories and reported back amended, to the Senate, by Judge DOUGLAS. This bill looked to the same results which have flowed from the Kansas convention act, namely, the formation of a State constitution, and was passed by the Senate, and defeated by the Black Republicans in the House. For this bill every Democratic member of Congress in good standing voted. The provisions of the Toombs bill, as thus voted for, were identical with those of the Kansas convention act. The qualification for voters in both were the same. Their great leading features were alike. Neither of them provided for a popular ratification of the work of the convention. None of the gentlemen, who are now clamorous anti-Lecomptonists, moved to amend the Toombs bill by inserting a provision for submitting the constitution to the people. On the contrary, sir, strange as it may appear, the history of that measure shows that, as originally introduced by the Senator from Georgia, it contained the following provision:

"That the propositions be, and the same are hereby, offered to the said convention of the people of Kansas, when formed, for their free acceptance or rejection; which, if accepted by the convention and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution, shall be obligatory upon the United States and the said State of Kansas."

As reported back from the Committee on Territories by the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] the words "and ratified by the people at the election for the adoption of the constitution," were stricken out; and with this provision stricken out by the Committee on Territories, it passed the Senate, and was voted for by every Democrat on this floor. How can the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] reconcile the absence of this provision in the bill as originally introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] from the one as reported back by him from the committee, with his present violent opposition to the admission of Kansas because its constitution was not submitted to the people?

Mr. Chairman, it is with no pleasure that I thus refer to the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS.] I have been his long and fast friend. In two successive presidential contests he was my choice of all our distinguished northern Democratic statesmen for the Democratic nomination for the Presidency. But, sir, he is now acting in opposition to his old friends; he is giving the aid of his great name, talents, and statesmanship, to the Black Republicans, in opposition to the Democratic party. As the leader of the Black Republicans upon this question, he has been the origin of the division which the Democratic phalanx in this House show. The Black Republican party had become disorganized; but now, with the potent aid of his leadership, their drooping spirits have been revived, and they have been made to attain an importance which makes them confident of a triumph over the Administration and the Democratic party. Mr. Chairman, no man regrets Judge DOUGLAS's present position more than I do.

We are told that the Kansas-Nebraska bill, by leaving the people of the Territories free to regulate their own domestic institutions, had reference to other institutions than that of domestic slavery; that it was meant to embrace all domestic institutions. Sir, this is not a true construction of that act. Previous to its passage, under the Missouri compromise, the people were left free to regulate all their domestic institutions except that of slavery. It was in reference to that institution alone that they were restricted. The Kansas-Nebraska bill removed that restriction. It referred to no other domestic institutions, because no others were restricted. It was to the institution of slavery alone that it had reference; and it was especially to leave the people free to have slavery, or not, in the Territory, as they pleased, that that clause of the bill was inserted. The whole history of the struggle in Kansas shows that this was the only question involved; it has been the issue of every battle fought; it has been the bone of contention both in and out of the Territory. In the last presidential canvass it was an issue made upon the Democratic party by the Black Republicans. Judge DOUGLAS himself so regarded it; for in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, as originally reported by him from the Committee on Territories, the material section made reference only to the question of slavery; and he proposed to settle that, even, not by a vote of the people, but through their representatives in convention. I read it:

"All the questions appertaining to slavery in the Territory, and in the new States to be formed therefrom, are to be left to the decision of the people residing therein, through their appropriate representatives."

Thus it will be seen that Judge DOUGLAS did not then propose to go as far as the Lecompton convention has. He did not even propose to refer the slavery question to the people. The Lecompton convention did. The convention, in submitting this isolated question—it being the absorbing one of all others—had met the demands of those who in good faith desired to see it settled by the people.

Mr. Chairman, looking at the action of the States of the Union, the weight of precedent is against the position that a constitution should be submitted to the people before its acceptance by Congress. Vermont, Connecticut, Delaware, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Tennessee, Kentucky, Arkansas, Missouri, and Illinois, never submitted their constitutions to the people, which was the organic law of each of them at the time of their becoming States of the Union. We find that but two of the seventeen remaining States submitted their constitutions to a vote of the people without being required by previous law so to do—to wit, Florida and California. Rhode Island had no constitution at all. My own State (Kentucky) was admitted into the Union in 1791 without a constitution. She subsequently adopted a constitution; but Congress to this day has never seen it or recognized it in any way. (See Gluskey's Political Text-Book, or Encyclopedia, p. 300.)

Mr. Chairman, I do not deem it necessary to add to the argument which has already been adduced in reply to the objection that the State of Kansas should not be admitted because there was no enabling act passed by Congress authorizing her to form a State constitution. It has been clearly shown that the Kansas-Nebraska act was an enabling act. It would be a mockery to say to a people, in the solemn form of a congressional enactment, you are left "perfectly free to form and regulate" your "domestic institutions in" your "own way," and then to deny to them the right of doing the only thing through the means of which they can form and regulate their domestic institutions; namely, the making of a State constitution, and application to Congress for admission. The line of precedent is irregular. Some States were authorized by enabling acts to form constitutions; others were not. Vermont, Kentucky, Tennessee, Florida, Arkansas, California, and others, formed State constitutions without the authority of enabling acts. The case of Tennessee on this point was a striking one.

Tennessee formed a constitution which was transmitted by Governor Blount to President Washington. The latter communicated it to Congress with the recommendation that Tennessee be admitted. The Senate instructed its committee merely to bring in an enabling act authorizing Tennessee to form a State constitution. The report of the Senate committee on the subject took the distinct ground that an enabling act by Congress previous to a formation of a constitution by a Territory desiring admission into the Union as a State, was essential. The committee said "that Congress must have previously enacted that the whole of the territory ceded, &c., should be laid out by Congress for one State before the inhabitants thereof [admitting them to amount to sixty thousand free persons] could claim to be admitted as a new State into the Union." The Senate carried out the views of the committee; rejected the application of Tennessee for admission, with her constitution then already formed; but passed an enabling act in the usual form. In the House, that master-mind, Mr. Giles, from a committee to whom the Senate bill had been referred, made a report contending that no enabling act was necessary, and that Tennessee should be admitted without further delay. Mr. Madison, Mr. Macon, Albert Gallatin, and other distinguished men sustained by speeches Mr. Giles's report, and a bill was passed by the House in lieu of the Senate bill, immediately admitting Tennessee. The Senate reconsidered its action, and passed the House bill. Thus Tennessee was admitted into the Union without an enabling act, and the forms of such an act were declared by that Congress, composed of many of the early great men of the Republic, entirely unnecessary.

But, sir, this objection to the admission of Kansas comes with bad grace from that party who, during the last Congress, passed a bill in this body admitting Kansas under the Topeka constitution—a constitution which was the offspring of a revolutionary movement on the part of a small minority of the people of Kansas, rotten to the core with treason—some of them with indictments suspended over their heads—miscreants who were there with the mad purpose of keeping alive agitation, so as to keep the gentlemen on the other side of the House, by means of such excitement, in power here. Yes, sir, such a constitution, without any of the forms of law, the emanation from the brain of such characters, was passed in this House by the Black Republicans. And yet, sir, they prate to us about frauds, violence, and the want of an enabling act in the present case.

Mr. Chairman, it is impossible for me to reconcile the present position of the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] and that of the leader of the anti-Lecompton forces in this body, [Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois,] with that taken by them on the admission of California. Then, sir, a State, formed without any of the forms of law, by a people from every portion of the Union, and inhabitants from every portion of the world, Chinese, Mexicans, Spaniards, half-breeds, and men of all classes and character, without reference to their being aliens or citizens, upon the mere call of a military general, was admitted into the Union, not only by the assent of the Senator and Representative from Illinois, but with their active advocacy in its behalf. The Senator was the champion of the measure in the Senate; the Representative made an elaborate speech to the House in its favor. CALIFORNIA PROSCRIBED SLAVERY IN HER CONSTITUTION. And yet these gentlemen, then the champions of California, now declaim against the irregularities of the Lecompton constitution.

Mr. Chairman, it is argued that the vote on the constitution, taken on the 4th of January last, in pursuance of the act of the Territorial Legislature called together by Mr. Secretary Stanton, is conclusive that the people do not want admission as a State under the Lecompton constitution. Let us look into the vote on that day. It is true, there were some ten thousand votes polled against the constitution. Analyze it, and you will find that a large majority of this vote was polled in the counties which, under the apportionment of Secretary Stanton, had thirty-six of the sixty delegates composing the constitutional convention. The conclusion is inevitable that a large proportion of this vote was fraudulent; for if it was not, how is it that, having the power of a representation in the convention, able to control its action by a majority vote, they did not send delegates to represent their views and make just such a constitution as they wanted, or else defeat any constitution at all. But I hold, sir, that the vote on the 4th of January, on the question of the adoption or rejection of the constitution, was a nullity. The people, in the election of delegates to frame a constitution, conferred upon them all the power that they themselves could have exercised if assembled in mass convention. The people being sovereigns, and the source of all power, under our form of government, delegated this power to their representatives in the convention. The convention being clothed with full power to make a constitution, a subsequent Legislature could no more limit, control, or destroy their power, than they could that of the people, if every individual one of them had assembled in mass convention to form a constitution. Hence I argue that the act of the Legislature, submitting this constitution to a vote of the people on the 4th of January, was in derogation of the rights of the people, and void, and is entitled to no consideration by Congress.

On this point, I refer to but one more result of the election of the 4th of January, and that to show that the people of Kansas desire and expect to be admitted under the Lecompton constitution. On that day an election was also held, regular in its character, under the authority of the constitutional convention, for State officers, a Legislature, and a Congressman. The election was a closely contested one. The pro-slavery Governor was elected by a majority of a few hundred votes. The free-State candidate for Congress was defeated by less than a hundred votes. The contest for the Legislature was so close that it was not until last Saturday that its political complexion was finally determined in favor of the free-State party. This vote shows that parties in the Territory are nearly equally balanced; and the animated contest for the offices under the Lecompton constitution proves that both parties regarded it as fixed that Kansas was to be a State under that constitution. The vote also shows, contrasted with the irregular vote cast on the same day for or against the constitution, that its friends agreed with me in regarding the vote on the same as a nullity, and took no part to carry it on that day. It shows another important fact, that in the irregular vote taken upon the constitution upon the same day, where there was no contest, and where the Black Republicans were not watched, as they were at the places of voting for State officers, there were about four thousand more votes polled against the constitution, than the highest vote given by that party for State officers. Mr. Chairman, I would like for some gentleman who has such a horror of frauds, to satisfactorily explain that vote.

Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said here about the fact that half the counties were unrepresented in the convention. There were twenty-one counties represented. They had complied with the law requiring a registration of voters; hence they were included in the apportionment made by the acting Governor, Stanton. There were three counties unorganized. Of the thirteen others, which it is said were unrepresented, it will be found by the election returns of the 4th of January, that in seven of them there was not a solitary vote polled. In two of the remaining six there were but ninety votes returned, and in the remaining four, one thousand and thirty-five votes. So that it is clearly shown that the charge that more than one half of the people were disfranchised, and not represented in the convention, is utterly false.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. ENGLISH,] in his speech delivered upon this subject, admits that the technicalities of the law are with this constitution; but, says he:

"I thought it was the business of statesmen, in the councils of the nation, to look to great political facts, and that the quibbles and technicalities of law belonged to lawyers."

He further says:

"There have been some irregularities there, and some culpable failures on the part of a portion of the people to exercise the right of suffrage."

How long has it been, sir, since the gentleman from Indiana has ceased to regard the sanctions and forms of law as binding the action of Congress? Does he recollect his speech, during the last Congress, in the Kansas contested-election case of Reeder vs. Whitfield? This case, it will be recollected, arose in this way: General Whitfield was elected Delegate to Congress at the regular election fixed by the Territorial Legislature. He received nearly all the votes at that election. At a subsequent election, held without any authority of law, Governor Reeder was chosen to the same seat, receiving all the votes polled at that so-called election. He claimed the seat on the ground that he received more votes at the election at which he was chosen than General Whitfield did in the regular election which returned him, and that he was the choice of the people of that Territory. It was proposed to send a commission to Kansas to investigate the matter; to make such an investigation as that desired by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] the other day, for which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. ENGLISH] voted. The gentleman from Indiana, in speaking against such an investigation then, said:

"At the election held pursuant to the act of the Kansas Legislature, Mr. Whitfield received twenty-nine hundred votes, Mr. Reeder but thirty-six; the whole number of votes polled being less than three thousand. The latter does not claim to have been elected at that time, nor does he pretend that all the votes cast for Mr. Whitfield were illegal. He alleges that some hundreds of them were illegal; but does not contend, nor does any of his friends, that any other person received more legal votes at that election than Mr. Whitfield. If Mr. Whitfield had received but one hundred legal votes, and that was the highest number of legal votes any individual received, he would still be clearly entitled to the seat."

I will read no more extracts from this speech, but let the gentleman look into it, and he will find it to be a complete answer to his speech delivered here the other day. The anti-Lecomptonites base their opposition to the admission of Kansas upon the same flimsy pretexts that the Black Republicans did their opposition to Whitfield. They tried then to override the forms of law to accomplish their purposes, as do the anti-Lecomptonites now, to reach their ends. Let the gentleman from Indiana act upon the doctrines of his speech last Congress, to which I have referred; let him again acquire a regard for "legal technicalities," for which he now affects so much contempt, and he will yet occupy a proper position on this question. Mr. Chairman, it is said that the constitution of Kansas cannot be changed until after 1864. Upon this point I might be content to refer gentlemen to the unanswerable argument of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. PHILLIPS.] Sir, all power under our form of Government springs from the people. They alone can set up and destroy, alter or amend, their form of government at will. It would indeed be a strange doctrine which would deny to the power creating, the entire control of the creature of their own making. I admit that the people, through their representatives, in forming a State constitution, can place restrictions upon themselves; and if they do so, then their constitution is only amendable by them in accordance with the forms which they have prescribed; but this does not apply in this case, for the Kansas constitution has placed no restriction upon the power of the people to amend at will.

My construction of the fourteenth section of the schedule of the constitution is, that it is a mere limitation upon the power of the Legislature to propose amendments to the constitution; the object of the framers of the constitution being to secure to the people a stable government, not subject to amendment at the mere caprice of the Legislature. The second article in the bill of rights fully recognizes the power of the people to "alter, reform, or abolish, their form of government in such manner as they may think proper." This is the true construction of the constitution on this point. If a majority of the people desire to amend the constitution, let them petition the Legislature to take their sense thereon. The free-State party, having the majority in the Legislature, can submit to a vote of the people the question, "Shall a convention be called to amend the constitution?" If then it be true that a large majority of the people of Kansas are opposed to the Lecompton constitution, they can determine this question affirmatively. Another convention would then be the result, reflecting the popular will, and such amendments would be made as would conform the organic law thereto. I would submit this question to gentlemen who take the opposite view. Suppose this constitution had not provided for its amendment at all: then I submit would there not have been full power in the people to amend the same? Or will the gentleman on the other hand, contend that the constitution would be a permanent one, to last for all time to come, subject to no amendment whatever, and perpetually binding upon the people now in Kansas, and those who may be there for all future time? If in such a case the people would have power to alter or amend the constitution, then they have it in the organic law as it now exists.

Mr. Chairman, the combination of parties which is opposing the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution is a singular one. We find the entire Black Republican organization standing up, to a man, in both Houses of Congress, against it. A few southern Senators and Representatives, and I thank God that there are but few so unmindful of the necessity of a united South at this time, as to connect themselves with the Black Republicans to defeat the admission of a slave State. In addition to these are the anti-Lecompton Democrats, who also, notwithstanding their previous course, are now closely embraced by the Black Republicans, and regarded by them as bone of their bone, and flesh of their flesh. I say to the southern Americans, who are opposing the admission of Kansas, how can you form a part of this combination, when, on Saturday, in this House, in answer to the interrogatory of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. BARKSDALE,] the leader of the Black Republicans boldly avowed that if every man in Kansas voted for a pro-slavery constitution, they would not vote for its admission as a slave State? How can you, I ask, justify this association between yourselves and the enemies of the South, who deny to her the principle that new States, containing constitutions like to that of your own State constitutions, shall be debarred admission into the Union?

Disguise it as you will, the adoption of slavery in the constitution of Kansas is the true secret of opposition to her admission. You may endeavor to palliate your course by claiming it to be the result of a patriotic conviction of duty, but the South will place every man who opposes it upon a common platform, and treat them alike as the enemies of her interests and institutions. And you Democrats of the North, who are opposing this measure of justice to Kansas, have you reflected where it will lead you? Do you not loathe the daily commendations with which you are treated by the New York Tribune and the other Abolition presses of the country? Are such compliments regarded by you as desirable? Is the proffer of a united Republican vote in your next elections grateful to your political aspirations? Senator Seward and the New York Tribune say that there must be no Republican opposition to you, if you remain firm to your present course. Will you permit these open bids to be made for you in the Abolition markets? You may tell us of the "scars which you have received," fighting the battles of the South and the country in the North. These scars will not prevent your fall, if you do not regard with careful eye the character of your associations.

"Vice is a monster of so frightful mien,
As to be hated, needs but to be seen;
Yet seen too oft, familiar with her face,
We first endure, then pity, then embrace."

You are sensitive about your position when charged with any estrangement from your party. You have warned us often not to attempt to read you out of the Democratic party. I have no power to read you out. Every Democrat in this House has no such power; the act of reading out is generally performed by the victim himself; the principles and policy of the Democratic party are clearly defined; every one of its members know what they are; the formality of reading out is not practiced. No sooner do any of its members deviate from its course than the separation becomes natural; and the line of demarcation is as distinct and as well defined as if it had been accomplished by a formal separation by the election of those whose misfortune it is not to conform to its policy. Gentlemen, then, may become the instruments of their own decapitation. They have the election; let them not do that for themselves which they so much deprecate being done by others for them. The question upon which we are now about to act is a vital one. Its solution is of the highest importance to the country; and when the time for action comes, and gentlemen decide which side of this question they intend to take, the country will assign to each one of them his true position.

Mr. Chairman, I cannot forbear testifying my high admiration for those northern Democrats who are voting with us on this question. Unawed by fanaticism, actuated by honest convictions of duty, regardless of the threats of those of their Democratic brethren who have separated from us on this question, unswayed by the gross and unfounded aspersions upon their integrity, that they are operated upon by executive patronage, they present a picture of devotion to principle characteristic of the true northern Democrat, and which has given the northern Democracy the high character which it has, as a political organization, ever maintained.

Mr. Chairman, I have endeavored to present, in as brief a manner as possible, the views which control my action on this question; and have answered some of the leading objections which have been urged against the admission of Kansas under the Lecompton constitution. The question is, whether we will still leave this Kansas issue open; whether bleeding Kansas shall be pictured to us for years to come; whether the fate of the Union shall still continue to tremble on the result; whether it shall be the hobby of the enemies of the Constitution in the next presidential contest to defeat the Democratic party, and carry out their hostile purposes against the integrity of the Union; whether the revolutionary spirit in Kansas shall be left life to continue its course, to retard the prosperity of the Territory, and convulse the entire country, or whether, on the other hand, the question shall be removed from national politics and localized, restricted to the new State, where, through the forms of a well-constituted State government, the people can redress all their real or imaginary grievances. This is a view of the subject which must carry conviction to every mind. The condition of things in Kansas have already been permitted to exist too long. Until the Lecompton constitution was presented, no means of reaching a peaceful solution of the question was afforded us. And shall we now, sir, when an opportunity is offered of healing this "bleeding wound," which has already done so much to impair the stability of the Union, reject the panacea and permit the wound still to remain open.

Mr. Chairman, gentlemen do not seem to contemplate what would be the effect of the rejection of this constitution upon the section from which I come. The South cannot any longer shut its eyes to the purposes of that party in the North, which polled one million three hundred and forty-one thousand eight hundred and twelve votes in the last presidential contest. Its great leader in the Senate [Mr. SEWARD] has not only proclaimed that no more slave States shall be admitted, but has announced its purpose to take the Government into their own hands, and to consecrate this entire continent to freedom. The legitimate inference from this is, that slavery in the States where it now exists will become the victim of their power to abolitionize. Whenever, sir, Congress shall authoritatively announce that no more slave States shall be admitted into the Union, and this first in the gradation of acts which must necessarily reduce the slaveholding States to a condition of vassalage is perpetrated, then, sir, the Union will become a Union of inequality and oppression, and it will be a question of serious moment for the South how far it is consistent with her honor or interests to remain longer in it.

Mr. BLAIR. The attitude of the present Administration upon this Kansas question, and upon the question of slavery generally, has been discussed in almost every conceivable aspect. There is, however, one point of view in which it has not been treated in this Hall; and I propose to state, as frankly and candidly as I can, the position I conceive the Administration and the Democratic party hold upon this question; and also to discuss it in its bearings upon a large class of citizens of the southern States—the non-slaveholding people of those States. I make no apology for approaching this subject. I consider that the system of slavery, which has made the last two or three of our Presidents “fetch and carry” at its beck and nod; which has held the legislative power of this Government in its hands for a series of years; which has swayed even the decisions of the Supreme Court—is of sufficient importance to be discussed, to be grappled with, and to be subdued; and therefore I shall not heed the querulous complaint that this subject has been too much discussed.

It is this institution which has cast its dark shadow upon our land, and which threatens the existence of our free Constitution. I know full well that there is an instinct in the hearts of the people of this country whose ken looks beyond that of the most acute intellect, and which tells them that from this question they are to apprehend danger to the institutions of our country. I am aware that those gentlemen who were elected to this House as the friends of the President, have sufficiently exposed the forfeiture of the pledges made by him in his letter accepting his nomination, made at Cincinnati; and I consider that the violation of his pledges contained in his inaugural address, and in his instructions to Governor Walker, declaring his purpose to secure the people of Kansas the right to decide for themselves the institutions under which they were to live, have also been sufficiently exposed by those who were elected here as Democrats. I never expected him to redeem those pledges. I always supposed they were made to be violated, and shall, therefore, express no surprise at the result. I always believed that Mr. Buchanan was nominated to carry out the policy of his predecessor, which was to fix slavery upon Kansas by force or fraud; and, in my opinion, not only Kansas, but the whole continent is embraced in this conspiracy. Hateful to me as is the design of forcing upon Kansas a constitution abhorred by her people, hateful as are the low and mean frauds by which that policy has been pushed, hateful as are the crimes by which, for the last three years, Kansas has been held in subjugation, still more hateful is the design which I believe has been deliberately formed to extend this constitution over the whole country. I shall give the President the benefit of his own language, to define his own position upon this question. I have in my hand his late special message transmitted to us with the Lecompton constitution; and I call the attention of his friends and admirers to this sentence:

“It has been solemnly adjudged, by the highest judicial tribunal known to our laws, that slavery exists in Kansas by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. Kansas is, therefore, at this moment, as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina. Without this, the equality of the sovereign States composing the Union would be violated, and the use and enjoyment of a Territory acquired by the common treasure of all the States, would be closed against the people and the property of nearly half the members of the Confederacy.”

Kansas is here called a State, and a slave State—made so by the Constitution, says the President, and not by any act of her people. And I desire to know, if the Constitution of the United States makes a slave State of Kansas, the people of which country have never yet given their assent to it, will not that same Constitution carry slavery into those States which acknowledge that constitution now assumed to establish slavery, in State or Territory, wherever the local laws are silent?

The argument of the President in this message, and in his annual message, and in the paper published by him in answer to certain gentlemen in Connecticut, goes to this point. He declares, in effect, that neither Congress, nor the people of a Territory themselves, have the power to prohibit slavery in the Territories. I think his language goes even to the extent of maintaining that a State cannot prohibit or abolish slavery; for, Mr. Chairman, if neither the people of a Territory nor Congress can prohibit slavery for the reasons assigned by the President, the same reasoning would embrace the States made from territory acquired by “the Confederacy of sovereign States.” How happens it that the people of the State of Iowa can prohibit slavery? That was territory acquired by the Confederacy of sovereign States. How can the people of the State of Iowa reverse the rule of justice any more than the people of the Territory of Iowa? The whole argument of the President, the argument of all who agree with him, the argument of the Supreme Court, all assign that as a reason why the people of a Territory cannot prohibit slavery, and why the Congress of the United States cannot exclude slavery from its Territories. It is all grounded on the fact that it is unjust to exclude the property of the people of any one portion of the Confederacy from that which was acquired by the people of the whole Confederacy.

Now, Iowa was acquired by the people of the whole Confederacy—that is, by the Government, representing the whole Confederacy; and it was quite as just and right for Iowa, while a Territory, to exclude slavery, as it was when she became a State. There is no difference. And how can this be accomplished? How can Iowa, or any State, prohibit slavery, if the positions taken by the President and the Democratic party are correct? The people of a Territory have not the power to do it; Congress has not the power; and yet, when the people of a Territory form a constitution, and Congress accepts that constitution—neither of these agencies having the power to exclude slavery—it is found, by some mysterious process, that the State thus created has acquired a power which neither agency concerned in its creation could impart to it. It strikes me, Mr. Chairman, that, if it be conceded that there is no power in Congress, or in the people of a Territory, to exclude the institution of slavery, it follows, as a matter of course, logically and legitimately, that the people of a State cannot do it. And, sir, I find that the organ of the Administration—the Washington Union—has taken that ground; and has declared that it draws the conclusion legitimately from the opinion of the Supreme Court in the Dred Scott case.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman be good enough to tell me what that organ is? I am not aware that the Administration has an organ.

Mr. BLAIR. If anybody has a right to know what that organ is, the gentleman from Pennsylvania is the man.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Be good enough to tell me.

Mr. BLAIR. I referred to the Washington Union by name.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I merely wish to remark that I know of no paper recognized as the organ of the Administration.

Mr. BLAIR. Then the gentleman is ignorant of what is known by everybody else. I say that that paper declared in an article some time ago that no State in the Union could abolish the institution of slavery; that it was unconstitutional to do so; and it grounded itself on the decision of the Supreme Court. I know that subsequently to that, the editor of that paper was elected, by a party vote, Printer of the Senate of the United States. That goes very far—though the gentleman [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] repudiates the paper as the organ of the Administration—to fix it in the minds of the people that the Senate of the United States indorses his views on that subject, especially when we know that these offices go by favor, and that it is very seldom the case that a man is elected Printer, or to any other office, whose sentiments do not accord with those of the majority of the body that elects him. I know that last evening, in the other House, a very distinguished gentleman denied that this was the position of the Democratic party, and, in his place, called for proof. He denied that anybody from the South claimed that a State could not prohibit slavery within its limits. But I undertake to say that the claim is embodied in the extract which I have read from the President’s special message, in which he calls Kansas a State, and says that it is a slave State, and that it was made a slave State by the Federal Constitution, and not by the people. That is the language of the President, and I have heard from every Democrat that has taken the floor in this or the other House, nothing but eulogy of that message, since it was published; and I consider that as an indorsement of the doctrines it contains.

But that is not all. This doctrine is contained in the Dred Scott decision. Every argument that is made to show that neither Congress nor the people of a Territory has the power to prohibit slavery in the Territory, is equally applicable to a State, and is more appropriate as applied to the States, because the Constitution was made for the States, and not for the Territories, and is the supreme law over the constitutions and statutes of the States. I think that is the doctrine of the Democratic party. They may disclaim it now, when it is proclaimed in all its nakedness; but they will yet come up to it whenever occasion offers to carry their principles to the result intended.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I ask those gentlemen who have been so clamorous about popular sovereignty, whether they accept this doctrine? I ask them if they propose to deny all that they have said on the subject of popular sovereignty, and if they will submit to have this institution injected into the Territories and States by what is claimed to be the Constitution of the United States? Will they do it? I suppose they will not be able to resist the majority of their own party in this matter, and they must either embrace this doctrine or be read out.

Now, it matters not to me what ground the leaders of that party assume. They may come forward to sustain this doctrine, and to sustain the policy of the last Administration in forcing upon Kansas an institution abhorred by a large majority of the people, and in forcing this institution on other States and Territories. I do not care how many judicial decisions shall sanction it, or how many regiments may be called out to enforce it; in my opinion, the attempt will fail. The Territories of this Government cannot be wrested from the freemen to whom they belong, to be given up to slaveholders and their slaves, in order to strengthen the oligarchy which rests upon this servile institution.

Gentlemen have proclaimed upon this floor that the Lecompton constitution was accepted by a majority of the people of Kansas. Sir, in my belief, there is not a town or county in Kansas where the Lecompton convention could have sat and performed the work of fraud now before us, without the support of the Federal bayonets. I do not know one town or county in Kansas where they would have had the power to defy the will of the people as they have done, except under the protection of the Federal bayonets. The President tells us, and tells the country, in no equivocal language, that the government which he calls the rightful government of Kansas, would long ago have been subverted by these factious people out there, if it had not been supported by the Federal Army. This is a clear admission on his part that the government there is an usurpation; because there can be no government in violation of the sentiments of the people, unless it be an usurpation. But, sir, that government would have been subverted long ago, but for the interference of the President of the United States; and, whether the fact be admitted by the President or not, it cannot be successfully controverted that the President has exerted his entire energies—he has perverted the whole power and patronage of the Federal Government—to drive free white men out of the Territory of Kansas to make room for negro slaves.

Now, sir, there is a parallel to the history of this transaction which took place many centuries ago, and which I find in a book published nearly a century since. But it is so appropriate to the events that are now transpiring, that I hope the House will have the patience to hear me read it through. I read from Hook’s History of Rome, to show how the great Republic of antiquity fell to decay, when it ceased to cherish the people as landholders, and became an oligarchy, by the very means now being employed in our own:

“It is recorded of Tiberius Gracchus that, in crossing Hetruria in his way to Spain, he observed that there were no other husbandmen or laborers in the country than slaves; and, according to Plutarch, the people—by writings affixed to the porticoes, walls, and tombs—daily exhorted Tiberius to procure a restitution of the public lands to the injured poor.

“From the earliest times of Rome,” proceeds the historian, “it had been the custom of the Romans, when they subdued any of the nations in Italy, to deprive them of a part of their territory. A portion of these lands were sold, and the rest given to the poorer citizens, on condition, says Appian, of their paying annually a tenth of the corn and a fifth of the fruits of the trees, besides a certain number of great and small cattle. In process of time, the rich, by various means, got possession of the lands destined for the subsistence of the poor. This gave occasion to the law obtained by Licinius Stolo, about the year of Rome 388, forbidding any Roman citizen to hold more than five hundred acres of land, or to have on his estate more than one hundred great and five hundred small cattle, and requiring that a certain number of freemen should be employed to cultivate the farms.

"But, notwithstanding these precautions, the Licinian law (observed for some time to the great benefit of the public) fell at length under a total disuse. The rich and mighty continued to possess themselves of the lands of their poor neighbors." "To cultivate the farms they employed foreign slaves. So that Italy was in danger of losing its inhabitants of free condition, (who had no encouragement to marry, no means to educate children,) and of being overrun with slaves, and barbarians, that had neither affection for the Republic nor interest in her preservation."

"Tiberius Gracchus, now a tribune of the people, undertook to remedy these disorders;" * * * "and to soften the matter, Tiberius not only proposed to remit the fines hitherto incurred by the transgressors of the Licinian law, but also, out of the public money, to pay to the present possessors the price of the lands that were to be taken from them." "Never (says Plutarch) was proposed a law more mild and gentle against iniquity and oppression." For these were public lands of which the rich had taken possession with their slaves; "yet the rich made a mighty clamor about the hardship of being strip of their houses, their lands, their inheritances, the burial places of their ancestors, the unspeakable confusion such innovations would produce, the estates in question (acquired by robbery) being settled upon the wives and children of the possessors; and to raise an odium against Gracchus, they gave out that ambition, not a view to the public good, had put him upon this project." * * *

"The poor, on the other hand, complained of the extreme indigence to which they were reduced, and of their inability to bring up children. They enumerated the many battles they had fought in defense of the Republic, notwithstanding which, they were allowed no share of the public lands; nay, the usurpers, to cultivate them, choose rather to employ slaves than citizens of Rome. Gracchus's view was not to make poor men rich, but to strengthen the Republic by an increase of useful members, upon which he thought the safety and welfare of Italy depended. The insurrection and war of the slaves in Sicily, who were not yet quelled, furnished him with sufficient argument for expatiating on the danger of filling Italy with slaves."

"On the day when the tribes met to determine concerning the law, the Tribune maintaining his cause, which was in itself just and noble, with an eloquence that would have set off a bad one, appeared to his adversaries terrible and irresistible. He asked the rich whether they preferred a slave to a citizen; a man unqualified to serve in war to a soldier; an alien to a member of the Republic; and which they thought would be more zealous for its interests? Then as to the miseries of the poor, he said: 'The wild beasts of Italy have caves and dens to shelter them; but the people who expose their lives for the defense of Italy, are allowed nothing but the light and air. They wander up and down with their wives and children, without house, and without habitation. Our generals mock the soldiers; when in battle, they exhort them to fight for their sepulchers and their household gods; for, amongst all that great number of Romans, there is not one who has either a domestic altar or a sepulcher for his ancestors. They fight and die, solely to maintain the riches and luxury of others, and are styled the lords of the universe, while they have not a single foot of ground in their possession.'"

After much resistance from the Patricians, the Tribune finally procured the passage of the law:

"And it being resolved that Triumvirs, or three commissioners, should be constituted for the execution of it, the people named to that employment, Tiberius himself, his father-in-law Appius Claudius, and Caius Gracchus, who at this time was in Spain, serving under Scipio in the Numantine war. These Triumvirs were to examine and judge what lands belonged to the public, as well as to make the intended distribution of them."

Before the law could be put into operation Tiberius was assassinated in the Senate House by certain Senators "who possessed much of the public lands and were extremely unwilling to part with them." These Senators, it is said by the historian, were aided by their clients and slaves, and the blow "which probably dispatched him, he received from a man named L. Rufus, who afterwards gloried in the action." Cicero, who was the orator and partisan of the oligarchy, and whose false glosses in regard to these transactions have been followed by all the historians in the interest of the privileged orders, was himself constrained to admit "That Tiberius Gracchus came nothing short of the virtue of his father, or his grandfather, Africanus, but in this, that he forsook the party of the Senate."

Sallust, the great and perspicacious historian, in a letter to the greatest general and statesman of the Romans, Julius Cæsar, exhorting him to restore the Commonwealth, gives in a single sentence the whole history of Rome, after the Roman people were robbed of all ownership in the soil to feed the grandeur and employ the slaves of the nobility. He says, and I desire to mark the sentence:

"Men of the lowest rank, whether occupying their farms at home or serving in the wars, were amply satisfied themselves, and gave ample satisfaction to their country, so long as they possessed what was sufficient to sustain them. But when, being thrust out of possession of their lands by a gradual usurpation, they, through indigence and idleness, (having nothing to do,) could no longer have any fixed abodes, then they began to covet the wealth of other men, and to put their own liberty and the Commonwealth to sale."

The law procured by Tiberius Gracchus has been denounced by all the writers in the interest of the privileged classes from that day to this as an agrarian law, a law to take from the rich and to give to the poor, when the fact is, Mr. Chairman, that it was a law to distribute among the people the lands which belonged to the public; and now a similar attempt is made by the party of oligarchs in this country to seize the Territories of this Government and plant them with slaves to the exclusion of freemen, and they follow the example of their Roman prototypes and denounce those who oppose them in their schemes as Free-Soilers. I do not know but that the term "agrarian," taken in its true sense, might well stand for a translation of the term "Free-Soiler." In that sense, in the sense of distributing to the people the lands which belong to them, I have no hesitation in accepting the designation; and to show that there is as great necessity for this measure now as there was at the time when Tiberius Gracchus described the destitution of the Roman people, who made that Republic the mistress of the world, I will read from some high authorities in regard to the condition of the non-slaveholding white men of the South, who constitute a large majority of its citizens. I shall quote first the language of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY.] He is giving an account, in a speech made in Alabama, of the condition of his own State, and more particularly of his own county. He says:

"In traversing that county, one will discover numerous farm houses, once the abode of industrious and intelligent freemen, now occupied by slaves or tenantless, deserted, and dilapidated; he will observe fields, once fertile, now unfenced, abandoned, and covered with those evil harbingers, fox-tail and broomsedge; he will see the moss growing on the mouldering walls of once thrifty villages, and will find 'one only master grasps the whole domain,' that once furnished happy homes for a dozen white families."

This is the language of a distinguished Senator from Alabama, describing his own county, and I should suppose that if that gentleman knew anything at all, he would know the condition of the county in which he resides. Nor is it to be supposed that he would exaggerate that which is by no means flattering to his county or his State.

Mr. William Gregg, in a paper before the South Carolina Institute, handling the same subject, remarks:

"Any man who is an observer of things could hardly pass through our country without being struck with the fact that all the capital, enterprise, and intelligence is employed in directing slave labor; and the consequence is, that a large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away an existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest. It is an evil of vast magnitude, and nothing but a change in public sentiment will effect its cure."

I propose to read what was said in the Virginia Legislature in 1832, by a gentleman who is now a distinguished member of this House, [Mr. FAULKNER.] He says:

"Slavery, it is admitted, is an evil. It is an institution which presses heavily against the best interests of the State. It banishes free white labor; it exterminates the mechanic, the artisan, the manufacturer; it deprives them of occupation; it deprives them of bread; it converts the energy of a community into indolence, its power into imbecility, its efficiency into weakness. Sir, being thus injurious, have we not a right to demand its extermination? Shall society suffer, that the slaveholder may continue to gather his crop of human flesh? What is his mere pecuniary claim, compared with the great interests of the common weal? Must the country languish, droop, die, that the slaveholder may flourish? Shall all interests be subservient to one—all rights subordinate to those of the slaveholder? Has not the mechanic, have not the middle classes, their rights—rights incompatible with the existence of slavery?"

And now, sir, I shall conclude these quotations by reading from another very distinguished southern gentleman, who has recently been chosen from the very elite of the chivalry of South Carolina to represent his State in the most august and dignified body in the land—I refer to Governor HAMMOND. Here is his testimony as to their condition, in an address before the South Carolina Institute, in 1850:

"They obtain a precarious subsistence by occasional jobs, by hunting, by fishing, by plundering fields or folds, and too often by what is in its effects far worse—trading with slaves, and seducing them to plunder for their benefit."

I do not know whether this picture is an accurate one or not. It is not true when applied to the slave States in which I have resided. It is not true, where slavery obtains nominally, or where the slaves are few; and especially it is not true of the city and county which I represent upon this floor. The working men and mechanics of St. Louis have too just a sense of the dignity of their own employments to permit themselves to be degraded by the competition of negro slaves. A man might as well attempt to educate his negro for the legal profession as to attempt to put him at a mechanical trade in competition with the mechanics of my district. But, sir, if it be true in regard to those remote southern States where the slaves fill every industrial avocation and employment, why did the Carolinian stop short in his heart-rending description? Why did he not exclaim with the Roman tribune, "shall we prefer our slaves to the citizens of the Republic; men incapable of bearing arms to soldiers?" Unless some voice shall speak that language in tones that will be heard by the people, the history of this country will be written in a sentence, similar to that I have read from Sallust. If by gradual usurpation the people are thrust out of their lands by this dominating oligarchy, they will, as they did in Rome, "put their own liberty and the Commonwealth to sale."

It is very clear that the Senator from South Carolina does not prefer the citizens of the Republic to his slaves. He has, in his recent speech, shown that he was the mouthpiece of the privileged classes—the Cicero of this new oligarchy, and not a tribune of the people. In that speech he says:

"The Senator from New York said yesterday that the whole world had abolished slavery. Ay, the name, but not the thing; and all the powers of the earth cannot abolish it. God only can do it when He repeals the fiat, 'the poor ye always have with you;' for the man who lives by daily labor, and scarcely lives at that, and who has to put out his labor in the market and take the best he can get for it; in short, your whole class of manual laborers and operatives, as you call them, are slaves. The difference between us is, that our slaves are hired for life and well compensated; there is no starvation, no begging, no want of employment among our people, and not too much employment either. Yours are hired by the day, not cared for, and scantily compensated, which may be proved in the most deplorable manner, at any hour, in any street in any of your large towns."

"Your slaves are white, of your own race; you are brothers of one blood. They are your equals in natural endowment of intellect, and they feel galled by their degradation. Our slaves do not vote. We give them no political power. Yours do vote, and being the majority, they are the depositaries of all your political power. If they knew the tremendous secret, that the ballot-box is stronger than an army with bayonets, and could combine, where would you be? Your society would be reconstructed, your government reconstructed, your property divided, not as they have mistakenly attempted to initiate such proceedings by meeting in parks, with arms in their hands, but by the quiet process of the ballot-box. You have been making war upon us to our very hearth-stones. How would you like for us to send lecturers or agitators North; to reach these people this, to aid and assist in combining, and to lead them!"

"Mr. WILSON and others. Send them along."

"Mr. HAMMOND. You say, send them North. There is no need of that. They are coming here. They are thundering at our doors for homesteads of one hundred and sixty acres of land for nothing, and southern Senators are supporting it." * * * "Transient and temporary causes have thus far been your preservation. The great West has been open to your surplus population, and your hordes of semi-barbarian emigrants, who are crowding in year by year. They make a great movement, and you call it progress."

Sir, he prefers his slaves to the citizens of the Republic, and would have the latter deprived of the right of elective franchise, as his negro slaves are. He denounces the man who lives by daily labor, and the whole class of manual laborers and operatives, as slaves. He characterizes our foreign population as a horde of semi-barbarous emigrants, and he would deny them a share of the public lands upon which to build their homes, and educate their children. How would this gentleman have appeared leading the Democratic column in the days of General Jackson's administration? Why, sir, there would have been somebody else read out of that party—rather different persons from those who are now being read out. If this is Democratic doctrine, it is a novel doctrine to me, though I have been reared a Democrat. I make no complaint, however, of having been read out of the party. I should as soon think of complaining of being read out of a chain-gang. [Laughter.] It is not a Democracy which I should wish to sustain, by any means. I have always understood that Democracy concerns itself more about personal rights than about rights of property—the rights of individuals rather than those of monopolizing institutions. In this I may be mistaken, and certainly I am mistaken, if the revelations under this new dispensation are to be received.

Suppose this doctrine had obtained at the time California was acquired. When we acquired California, and the gold discoveries were made there, it is very well known that a workingman could earn in California $1,000 a year by his labor. That was then the value of an able-bodied slave in the old slave States. Do you not suppose that a great many of them would have been carried to California under such a stimulus as that? A distinguished politician of Virginia, in a letter which he addressed to the public press, or to some individual, pending the last presidential election, in speaking of this subject, calculated that Virginia had lost several hundred million dollars by not being permitted to carry her slaves to California; "because," he said, "if a slave could have been taken to California, where he could earn $1,000 a year, instead of being worth $1,000, he would have been worth $5,000. Why, sir, the profit of the business of carrying slaves to California would have been greater than the profits of the African slave trade, without its perils. If the decision of 1857 had been made in 1847, so that slaves could have been removed to California, the whole demand for labor in that land of gold would have been supplied by slaves, and the busy marts of trade, and the gold mines of that country, would have been blackened with slaves, and not a foot of land in the whole State would have been left for the white man to stand upon, and in that way the free white men of this country would have been excluded from their own inheritance—the land they won by their own strong arms.

That is what these gentlemen call Democracy. They are willing to see the free white men of the country excluded from every Territory, and especially from those where the reward of labor is great; and they claim that it is their constitutional right that it shall be done; and they call it Democracy. Why, sir, I want to know whether the white man has not the same right of property in his own labor as the slaveholder has in the labor of his slave? If you exclude the free white man from the Territories, do not you diminish the value of his labor just as you diminish the value of the slave to the owner by excluding them? Which are we to choose between, the millions and millions of free white men in this country, or the few thousand slaveholders? Was the Government founded to protect rights of property in slave labor, and not to protect the rights of freemen to their own labor? This Democracy is very tender of the property of the slaveholder, and is utterly regardless of the rights of property of any other class of people in the Territories.

Now, I apply another test. The oligarchy say that they have the right to take their slaves into the Territories of the Union, and employ them as they see fit, under the Constitution of the United States, and nobody can take that right from them. They can take them into the Territories and make them mechanics, and work them in the mines, in the factories, or in any other way; and if white men don't like that sort of competition the Democracy will tell them to go somewhere else. In Russia, a man can educate his serf or slave, and they frequently do, and make lawyers, doctors, and merchants of them. Now, suppose these southern gentlemen should exercise their constitutional right of educating their slaves, and put them into the learned professions; do you suppose the people of this country would submit, for one instant, to this Russian innovation? Would there not be a cry raised from one end of this land to the other; and why? Have they not the same constitutional right to make lawyers, doctors, and merchants, of their slaves as they have to make them mechanics? Precisely the same. There is no difference whatever. But the Russian nobles never engage in those avocations themselves, and therefore they do not feel the degradation of putting their serfs into the professions. But with us that would be trenching upon the occupation of the slaveholders themselves—the oligarchs—and here the shoe pinches. They demand that they shall be allowed to put their slaves to work side by side with mechanics and laborers; and, in the same breath, they claim that no slave shall be allowed to degrade the employments in which they condescend to engage. I contend that they have no more right to inflict this degradation on mechanics, by placing slave labor in competition with their free labor. Not a whit more; and, as they exercise the right of excluding slaves from the professions in which they are themselves engaged, (as they do by inhibiting their education,) I say they admit the right of others to exclude them from the mechanical trades, and from competition with every freeman who follows an honest calling.

There was a time when this Democratic party was not Democratic in name alone. There was a time when this party took ground against privileged classes, and against every attempt on the part of capitalists to usurp the power of this Government, and pervert it to their own purposes. I instance the case of the United States Bank, where the stockholders undertook to force this Government to allow them to bank on the national revenue. The Democratic party took issue with them, and put them down. Since that time we have had the tariff discussion, where the manufacturing interests of the country—a vast aggregation of wealth—undertook to influence legislation, and effect the passage of laws for their especial benefit, in derogation of the rights and interests of the working classes of the country. The Democratic party took ground against the high protective tariff, and defeated it.

And now here is another question in which this struggle between capital and labor is presented in its most odious and revolting form. Here is a colossal aggregation of wealth invested in negroes, which undertakes to seize this Government to pervert it to its own purpose, and to prevent the freemen of the country from entering the Territories except in competition with slave labor; and the Democratic party, instead of standing where it used to stand, in opposition to these anti-Democratic measures, is as servile a tool of the oligarchy as are the negro slaves themselves.

This is no question of North and South. It is a question between those who contend for caste and privilege, and those who neither have nor desire to have privileges beyond their fellows. It is the old question that has always, in all free countries, subsisted—the question of the wealthy and crafty few endeavoring to steal from the masses of the people all the political power of the Government. Those gentlemen are wrong who say that it is a question of North and South. If there is one class of people on this continent more interested than another in putting a stop to the extension of slavery into the Territories, it is the free white laborers of the South. They have infinitely more interest in the matter than any other class of the people, because they have felt the pressure of the institution. They have been shut out from all ownership in the soil, and driven out of all employment in the States where slavery now exists; and should we allow the territories of the Government to be closed against them, they will have no escape from the oppression which has ground them to the dust. No, sir, it is not a question between the North and South. It is a question which commends itself especially to the non-slaveholding and laboring white men of the South.

Now, sir, this controversy will, in my opinion, end in great good. In the struggle which terminated the American Revolution, the principles of liberty were so deeply instilled in the heart of the people, that when that struggle ended, the slaves were emancipated in a large number of the States, from the impulse which the love of liberty received in that contest. This struggle, which is on the same principle, will terminate in the same way. I know that there are as good men in the South now as there were in the days of the Revolution. There are men—slaveholders—now there who burn to emulate the noble examples of the illustrious men of the Revolution; and the noble State which I have the honor, in part, to represent on this floor, will, in my opinion, have the glory of leading the way in this magnanimous career. Her honor and interest alike beckon her, and that she will not be insensible to these high motives nor regardless of the glorious destiny which awaits her, the legend which she bears upon her shield, "salus populi suprema lex esto," sufficiently attests.

Mr. WORTENDYKE. Mr. Chairman, after the elaborate discussion already had in both wings of the Capitol upon the pending Kansas question, it is not to be expected that much can be wanting to complete the argument on that subject. Therefore, there can be no doubt that this House will now best advance the interests of those whose affairs are in our hands, and also sustain its own credit before the country, by bringing this matter to a speedy determination, and directing its attention somewhat to other matters. Whatever differences of opinion may exist as to the correctness or incorrectness of the proposed measure, all must be aware that there are numerous other important measures remaining for our consideration at the present session, involving serious interests of the whole people, which we, as faithful servants, dare not neglect. I, therefore, believing as I do, that this particular subject has already engrossed more of our time than it is in justice entitled to, would be prepared, and would feel it to be my duty, to bring on the final vote upon this Kansas bill, at this very hour, had I the power so to do, and to forego the privilege, which my right to the floor now entitles me, to make known my own position and views in this matter.

Sir, for nearly four months has the debate upon this question been, at intervals, going on here; and I may say that, as to most of the material principles involved, they have been themes of almost continuous debate and declamation, both in and out of Congress, for the past four years. I am sure, therefore, that, with the intense consideration that has been exhibited on every side for so long a time, we must all be prepared at this moment to meet the issue presented, or as well prepared as we shall ever be.

Depend upon it, sir, there is no part of the annual message of the President of the United States better founded upon fact, and that more readily finds its verification in our own consciousness, than that portion which declares that Kansas has for years occupied too much of public attention, and that it is high time this attention should be directed to far more important objects. It is indeed true, sir, that the country is sick unto loathing of the slavery agitation in Congress. When I speak here of the country, I mean all those who love the general interests, the peace and prosperity of the country, better than the particular interests and selfish aims and intrigues of brawling politicians and howling demagogues, through whose instrumentality this matter has been complicated and prolonged. No matter what may be the differing opinions among the upright, honest, and patriotic masses of our citizens, or what their settled principles in reference to the constitutional rights involved on one side or the other, in the institution of negro slavery in State or Territory, they are heartily disgusted with the ceaseless agitation of this subject, from year to year, for a long series of years in succession, to the prejudice of other more urgent and important interests.

Commercially, socially, and politically, our constituents have been, and are still continuing to be, damaged by the baneful effects of such agitation. From every quarter, and through all the avenues of communication, are coming up to this Capitol the stern injunctions of the people that this unwise lingering in acrimonious denunciation over the Kansas question and the slave question shall be stopped. With the spirit of these injunctions I deeply sympathize, and I deem them well timed and well applied. As a mere politician, in quest of office and notoriety, it might be policy to keep, if I could, the public mind in a violent and bitter commotion; for I would expect, in that character, at least, to have heartlessness enough to gloat upon even the fragments of the wreck and ruin that might succeed such civil commotion. But as a man of true sagacity, I could not even place corrupt hopes upon such a basis; for the people are not fools, to be swayed to and fro to serve any man's will; nor are they disposed to immolate themselves and their interests on the shrine of any man's ambition. Therefore the policy that seems best befitting us, if we intend to meet the approval of the people, will be to take the warning in time which is significantly and patriotically given to us by the Chief Magistrate, and throw the negro question out of Congress in some way, and at the earliest possible moment.

The people of this country are not going to allow this Union to be rent in twain after the example set by a besotted fanaticism in respect to certain institutions in the land. And although great indulgence is allowed in discussion upon all subjects, yet when that discussion becomes a hobby with politicians, and is prostituted to the engendering of sectional strife and hatred between the States, the people will begin to inquire into the proprieties of time and place. You cannot bring the people of this country to the point of letting the Union slide beneath their voluntary passiveness; and when you have succeeded in conjuring up apparent premonitions of such an event, your evil arts are exhausted, and then is the point at which you must stop, or yourselves and your laboratory of evil will be suddenly scattered to the four winds of heaven.

This negro question has now gone, in its effects upon the harmonious union of these States, so far as to boldly vaunt itself against the perpetuity of that harmony, and as far as, in my opinion, it will be allowed to go. Our people are not going to sacrifice all that they value on earth by taunting and defying their own political union, nor by allowing us, their agents, to cut asunder, for our own amusement or interest, the cords that have bound up their interests and their happiness so long and so securely. Sir, negro slavery in the States belongs to the States in all its peculiarities and responsibilities, and not to the Congress of the United States. It has no business here. It was never intended that it should come here. But having come, and remained here for thirty years or more, until its hideous contentions dared to issue great swelling words of vanity against the Union, it must now be dismissed from these Halls as speedily as we are able to give it that dismissal; or the people, now impatient and refusing further endurance, will speedily dismiss us who play with it as with a harmless toy, and loiter away our time in the seeming amusement.

Late events have concentrated all the force of the slavery agitation in that unfortunate Territory, Kansas. There has its foul work been going on for more than three years. We, like the barbarous witnesses of the gladiatorial fight in the Roman amphitheater, have been boisterous in our loud huzzas as the deadly weapons of the combatants have tasted the heart's blood of the victims of our sport. It is shocking to the moral sense of the Christian world that such dire outrage and murderous bestiality should receive its aliment and countenance from the guardians of the national honor. And never will these things cease to pollute our borders until this agitation is stopped here, the fountain from whence they took their rise; and therefore no clamor or denunciation, no vile epithets or base traduction of your patriot President, can subdue the thunder tones of the people who spoke to us through him, their trusted and honored Chief Magistrate, whose patriotism and statesmanship a long life of devoted service has demonstrated to his countrymen.

It is not my purpose to enter into a controversy at this time with those who openly assert their objection to this bill, because this constitution recognizes in form a certain domestic institution. With all such, my argument has been closed long ago in the presence of the people of my district. I then contended for the constitutional right of the people to adopt or prohibit this institution as they should deem fit, the same privilege which my own State has had, and still has, of regulating her own domestic institutions in her own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. I have, therefore, not a word to say now, and in this place, upon this exhausted and rejected issue that was raised for me in another place by the myrmidons of Abolitionism. I have not the patience to countenance its hideous offensiveness in this forum.

Sir, I expect to vote for the admission of Kansas into the Union as a sovereign State, because I believe by doing so I shall contribute to the result, so much to be desired, of banishing forever sectional controversy about slavery from the Halls of Congress. I shall vote for this measure because I believe that her constitution is undeniably republican in its form. I shall vote for it because it comes before us invested with all the sanctions that law and lawful authority can invest it with. I shall vote for it because I can find no reasons to sustain myself, as a legislator and judicial officer, sworn to try this case upon its merits, before the country and my constituents for withholding that vote. I shall vote for it because, if tumult and faction and sectionalism are still to continue on this subject of slavery, I want to leave no record to which an afflicted and distracted country may hereafter point with burning, withering indignation, thereby convicting myself of opening still wider the floodgates of ruin against her peace and prosperity; and I shall vote for it because I wish to abide by the line of safe precedents which our legislative history affords on this subject, and because, at this critical juncture, I fear untried and uncertain and unwarranted innovations. The doctrines and uniform practices of the fathers of the Republic, who stood here long ago, are on my side; and I feel not the less assurance of my safe position on that account.

I am also prepared to vote for the admission of Minnesota and of Oregon, by the right of the same precedents and constitutional rules. I have satisfied myself that their constitutions, too, are undeniably republican in form, and come authenticated and sanctioned by the sovereignty of the respective communities from which they proceed. Indeed, so plain and well-established are the forms and modes of constitution making in this country, that it would indeed be a strange occurrence if any should come before us at this late day in an inadmissible shape; and I am prepared to receive and accept them all, by the same rules and tests of recognition, with hearty congratulations, into the great sisterhood of States. And I would, with pride and exultation, see them rise simultaneously to the glorious constellation that shines out in sparkling beauty over an admiring world; or I would join the escort that would lead each in succession towards that bright galaxy.

It is a remarkable fact, that while it has been long known that Oregon and Minnesota, as well as Kansas, are at our doors, yet hardly a syllable, either of welcome or recognition, has been heard among us with respect to the two former. Have you nothing to consider in respect to these, but let them in without an examination of their credentials? while, by putting unfortunate Kansas upon the rack, and inflicting the tortures of the inquisition, you would soon drive her from your doors in dismay, weak and bleeding, to merciless rancor and unpitied abuse of lawlessness and fanaticism. For remember you now have the power to make her safe and prosperous and comfortable; but you have not the power to bring her back to your doors, a suppliant, as she now is; and if you now repel her with the rude hand which you are raising against her, without good and sufficient, legal and just cause, I fear you will never see her again in the habiliments of humility and peace and friendship. You should not dare to make the rash, unparalleled experiment, especially under the present conflagration of sectional excitement and burning jealousies among the States.

What is your duty in respect to all three of these inchoate States—Kansas, Minnesota, and Oregon—and your whole duty, under the present laws and Constitution of the United States? Is it to inquire whether the constitution which has been presented for your examination and approval, recognizes or denies the right to build canals, or railroads, or balloons? Is it to ascertain and criticize the precise limits or extent of authority that may be exercised under it, through law, by parent over child, guardian over ward, master over apprentice? Is it to sit as censor over these things, or any other local, domestic affair left by the Constitution of the United States to the free will and good pleasure of each State for and by itself? Is it our business to issue the mandate that negro slavery shall in all cases be interdicted, notwithstanding the fact that the Federal Constitution recognized and protected it in any and all of the original States, and in all of which it has existed, with a single exception, under the sanction and guarantees of that Federal Constitution? If this inquisitorial power and right of interference exists now, then it has always existed, and will apply to the old as well as the new States; and would in former times have applied to New Jersey, as it now would to Georgia or Alabama; and abolitionism has gained the day.

If it never existed in regard to my State, I, in the name of some of the people of that State, by authority of the Federal Constitution, to which she is proud to be a faithful party, say to you, you shall not assume that right now in respect to Kansas, or Oregon, or Minnesota; for if you are permitted now so to interfere and usurp in reference to any of these, you will soon seek the power to effect similar usurpations against my State and other States, in some of their domestic regulations. It will not be long before you will issue your mandate to New Jersey to strike from her statute-book that law of hers by which she has provided for the execution of her obligations under the Federal Constitution, "to deliver up, by her own officers and courts, persons coming within her borders owing service or labor in another State, to the party to whom such service or labor may be due." I have no doubt but this statute of my State is as odious to certain persons in other States, as is this slave feature in the constitution of Kansas, or in North Carolina, or Louisiana; and you have about as much right to interfere with it as you have with the other. I see no difference; there is no difference; and you had better not insist any longer upon your efforts in this behalf. It is sheer impudence and unlawful assumption and usurpation upon States-rights, and the people of my State will have no share nor part in its infamous officiousness.

We hold you to the law and the covenants. Your duty is fixed and defined; your limits of jurisdiction are clear and unmistakable, and the first step beyond this is a violation of pledges of faith.

Your power, in its precise and most comprehensive terms, is contained in article four, section three, of the Federal Constitution, in these words: "New States may be admitted by Congress into this Union." And section four, of the same article, requires "the United States to guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government," and to "protect each of them against invasion."

Now the form of government of a new State, as well as of an old State, is generally understood to be embodied and defined in its written constitution or organic law. Now what is the test by which it is to be tried as to its qualification? What particular form shall be denominated republican, in the sense of the Federal compact, or what anti-republican? I suppose this can best be answered by the general features of the several State governments existing at the time of the adoption of the Federal Constitution. Take any one of the States now in existence for your example, if you please, and compare with it this constitution of Kansas, in its form of government proposed, and point out to me, if you can, one particular wherein it is not strictly republican in form. It does not, it seems to me, admit of a question.

Well, then, if no objection can be raised on this point, what else is material to be known before a verdict ought to be rendered by the House of Representatives? Is it to ascertain the genuineness and authenticity of this instrument, purporting to come from the hands of the convention? I have heard of no question or dispute on this point. Is it to find out whether Kansas has expressed, in a legal and orderly way, her desire to change her territorial condition for that of a State, on an equal footing with the other States? We have before us, the acts of the Territorial Legislature, which unquestionably presuppose such willingness and desire on their part; for they prescribe the mode, time, and place in which a convention, for the purpose of forming a constitution for that very purpose, shall be elected and assembled. But even if this convention had been elected and assembled by the mandate of the sovereignty which is higher than the Legislature, and without their agency—as was claimed for the Topeka constitution—those who favored that Topeka constitution here would have been fully and effectually estopped; much more should they be estopped, and hold their peace, when all the legislative authority that was ever recognized by the country and by Congress has, in a regular and formal manner, been the willing instrument of effecting the proposed transition from a territorial pupillage to a State sovereignty. This Congress is not dealing with a State Legislature in this matter, and is not expected or required so to do in the process of admission of a new State, except in the single case provided for in section three of article four; and that is the case where a new State is to be formed by the junction of two or more States or parts of States. Then, and then only, does the Federal Constitution require that the consent of the Legislatures, eo nomine, of States concerned, shall be first had and obtained, before the act of admission can pass. The consent of the Territorial Legislature is in no other case required or expected.

Therefore, the argument that the expression of the present or any other Legislature in Kansas must be consulted, and be our guide in determining this subject, would be as palpably unconstitutional as it might be deceptive and subversive of the supreme sovereignty of any people. The Legislature is not invested with power to make or change constitutions, but to legislate subordinately to organic laws. The power to make constitutions is residuary in the people, and is vested in them to be exercised by them en masse, or by their agents specially commissioned for that purpose, with limited or unrestricted power, as they, the people, may choose when appointing. And this is the only thing that such convention can do—to follow out the articles of instruction, and no more. And it is with them, and them alone, that we have to deal, speaking to us directly and authoritatively in this case, and not with a Legislature not authorized to decide, and therefore, as to us, wholly irresponsible in the ultimate decision of the question, what shall be the people's constitution? A constitution, in the American sense of the term, is the superior of the State Legislature. It is a law unto the State Legislature. It emanates from a power higher than the Legislature—namely, the sovereignty of the people. The Legislature is an agent and representative of sovereignty, it is true; but for a specific purpose only—namely, to legislate under organic law; not to make or change organic law. A people having all power can constitute a representative agent, or agents, with higher powers than those of the Legislature. A convention to make or alter a constitution is such agent, invested with power higher than that of a Legislature. It makes laws that bind and govern a Legislature. And its mandates are higher and more authoritative in that work, and are conclusive against the Legislature. What nonsense, then, what utter inconsistency and arrogance is it, for the present or any other Legislature of Kansas to come into the Congress of the United States and proclaim itself the arbiter of its own superior—the constitutional convention; and to require us, contrary to the Federal Constitution, to treat with it and take its mandate against the formal decree of its master and superior—the sovereign people, speaking in their own chosen way!

But the Legislature of Kansas has, by the people's instructions, been made the agent of helping in the formation of the convention which made this constitution, and there its office in this work ended; for then its power of attorney, so to speak, ended. And for us to inquire further into the subsequent resolves and operations of this Legislature, or of any subsequent one, for the purpose of deciding upon the constitution framed by that convention, would be as absurd and unconstitutional, and abhorrent to American law and American practice, as to require the judge to consult the constable who summoned a jury, before the sentence of the law could be pronounced upon the finding of that jury. And yet, strange to say, there are men who stake their political reputation, it would appear, upon a persistence in such an absurdity. And no epithet is too foul for these gentlemen to utter against such as reject the absurd doctrine; no political or personal tie is too dear to be broken and spurned by them; and all the bitter rancor of malignity is let loose against the honest and unbiased expositors of law and right, if the train of thought and reasoning runs not upon their track, constructed by the Wilmot-proviso party.

But to be a little more specific as to the agency of the Legislature of Kansas in this work. I wish to inquire in what that agency consisted, and what were its limits? The Legislature existed by virtue of the organic territorial act, known as the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854; and to it was delegated, unreservedly, by Congress, legislative power on all rightful subjects of legislation, subject to the Federal Constitution.

As early as July, 1855, so far had the desire of changing the territorial for a State government apparently taken hold of the public mind in Kansas, that the Territorial Legislature thought it incumbent upon them to ask instructions from the people themselves, to be expressed through the ballot-box, whether they desired a convention to be organized for that purpose. In October, 1856, the response was made through the ballot-box. This response was, that the people did authorize such a convention, to be called through the Legislature elected on the same day on which the response was made. Here, then, was a specific delegation of authority to the Legislature for a given and extraordinary and carefully-limited purpose. That delegated power consisted in making for the sovereign people, and in their name, and by their authority, a system of rules and regulations to which they would conform in creating a convention to form a constitution. The Legislature was itself a convention for a specific part of this work of constitution making. Their act in this behalf, so far as they should conform to the authority vested in them by the people, was purely and clearly the act of the people. It was to be a conventional act, not strictly a legislative act in the ordinary technical sense. It was the act of sovereignty, not of mere subordinate legislation.

Well, in what way was this special power exercised? Did it overleap its design, and set to work to form a constitution instanter? Not at all, sir; but, in conformity to its limited and defined authority, it prepared a set of rules and regulations by which another convention should be created and limited in the further prosecution of the great end in view. These rules and regulations and definition of duties for the election and government of the subsequent convention are included in the proceeding commonly known as "the convention act," and is entitled "An act for taking the census, and the election of delegates to a convention," passed February 19, 1857.

It might, with as much propriety, be urged that this convention act was not valid, by our latter-day political philosophers, because it was not submitted afterwards to a vote of the people for ratification, as that the work of the subsequent convention was not valid and conclusive because not submitted to the people. This test of validity and authority, if it applies to the one case, must of necessity apply to the other. There is not a whit of difference between the two, in principle or in law. And yet I doubt whether you could find anybody bold enough to make this objection to the validity of the convention act; and therefore my surprise is the greater in seeing the dogged persistence, as a matter of principle and of necessity, in the other case. What a commentary upon our philosophical consistency! But more of this hereafter.

Well, what are the provisions of this convention act? Let us see. In the first place, that between the 1st of March and the 1st of April, 1857, all persons entitled to vote, being free white male inhabitants, citizens of the United States, over twenty-one years of age, and all other white persons actually residing within their respective counties, should be enrolled or registered. In the next place, that immediately after the 10th of April, 1857, a fair and legible list of such registered voters in the respective counties should be put up in three places in each election precinct, with a view to notice and correction, if errors or omissions should be discovered, and giving time for such corrections and omissions till the 1st of May following. It further provided that there should be sixty delegates distributed among the whole number of registered voters, as equally as it was within the power of man to make such distribution. It provides that on the third Monday in June an election of these sixty delegates should take place in due and prescribed form. It provides that the delegates thus elected should assemble in convention on the first Monday in September, and should proceed to form a "constitution and State government," which should be republican in form, for admission into the Union, on an equal footing "with the original States," in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of Kansas; and, lastly, it defines the nineteen election districts, comprising thirty-four counties, (if we name Pottawatomie, which belonged to Riley county.) So far as I am able to ascertain, these districts covered the entire Territory, so far as it was known to be inhabited, and more than probably was inhabited; and it includes six or seven counties, from which, it is shown by copies of the official returns of the famous election of the 4th January last, not a solitary vote was returned. I shall have occasion to refer to this again before I close.

Thus far, I think, not a reasonable and fair man can fail to acknowledge that in form, as well as in substance, the most scrupulous care and regularity are manifested in the preparatory arrangements for the formation of the constitutional convention, provided that it be conceded that the people of that Territory had a right to form such a convention at all, in any other way than by mass meeting. The Legislature, in the first place, in view of the manifest disasters that were oppressing the people in their territorial condition, submitted the question to the people in a definite form, whether a convention should be called, by the act to which I have referred before, and which is entitled "An act to provide for the call of a convention to form a State constitution." The sixth section of that act provides that "if a majority of persons shall vote in favor of 'convention,'" at said election held therefor, "then it shall be the duty of the Legislature, held next after the said election, to provide for and make all necessary provisions for an election of members to said convention, defining their duties," &c. At the October election of 1856, the same which elected the members of the next Legislature, an almost unanimous response was given for "convention," and from that moment it became the duty of the Legislature to proceed according to the section just quoted; for that was the special instruction conveyed by the responding vote for "convention," thus constituting the assembled Legislature a special convention for a specific purpose. They were to make "all necessary provisions for an election of members to another convention, and defining their duties."

That Legislature did their work. At their session next after this vote in favor of a convention, they provided for and made such "provisions" as they deemed "necessary" for an election of members to said convention. Such provisions are embraced and contained in what is called the "convention act" before stated. Now, the passage of this convention act was as purely an act of sovereignty as the making of a constitution itself. In order to be of binding validity, it must emanate from, and be ratified by, as broad an exercise of the sovereign power as that which follows it, in the shape of a complete and ratified constitution. It was not the fruit of mere legislative discretion, that might be altered or amended by a subsequent Legislature in its ordinary capacity. It was irreversible, except by the same special authority as that which provided it. Yet I have heard nobody contend that this convention act should have been submitted to the ratification of the popular vote, before it should be valid and operative. I suppose it was not considered necessary to do so for the purpose of giving it the unction of sovereignty. There was nothing in the special instructions to the Legislature requiring such submission, and therefore, I suppose, they thought they had power to make final, as well as power to submit, that convention act for approval by separate vote. I do not think they did wrong in not submitting that convention act; nor would I have considered it wrong had they submitted it. The argument for its submission is just as strong as the argument for the submission of the constitution, in a legal point of view. Had I been in Kansas, I might have exercised my influence for both, perhaps, or for one or the other. I might have found reasons that would have made me very anxious about the submission of both, or of one or the other. But I would not have committed the absurdity of taking the position, had I been there, that one or the other or both of these important acts of sovereignty—the making of the convention act, and the making of the constitution by their respective conventions—could not be complete, without the further indulgence of my personal desire that they, or either of them, should have been confirmed by a separate vote.

But I hear no objections made that the convention act was not thus put to the popular vote after its enactment.

I have seen somewhere in the course of this controversy a suggestion that this convention act was not quite as perfect in its details as it might have been; but, strange to say, it was not made the pretext for demanding for it a popular ratification. The special advocates for popular sovereignty let it pass muster without popular ratification in their favorite style.

But I doubt whether any enactment for a similar occasion will be found more satisfactory as a whole, in fairness and equity.

Very good and evident reasons then had Governor Walker to impress upon the people in the Territory the importance of exercising the elective franchise, under the convention act, in the election of their delegates. He knew as well as we do that the act was final, and would conclude all who stayed away from the polls and refused to vote under it, or had refused to be registered to that end. He knew full well that no remedy could be furnished by him, or by us, to such as would not conform to its requirements. And with unanswerable cogency does he conclude his appeal, in these words:

"The law has performed its entire appropriate functions when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but cannot compel the performance of that duty."

And, sir, I doubt not that all law-abiding citizens of Kansas shared in the sentiments so fitly expressed, and congratulated themselves that, after all the tumult and disorder and threatened anarchy that had beset them from the beginning, they could at last rely upon a record unimpeached and unimpeachable. It now alone remained for them to settle through the ballot-box who should be their delegates to form the charter of their new State. Every hope was fixed upon that important proceeding. Every citizen of this whole Union, who loved her peace and interests, and the interests and peace of Kansas, waited with intense solicitude for the consummation of the convention act by the election of delegates. Every hope and purpose of rebellious and traitorous opposition to the free operation of law and order in the Territory expired with the successful consummation of the great work contemplated by that act. And under this apprehension on the part of the party of bad men who strove, as we are told by the then Governor himself, "to perpetuate and diffuse agitation throughout Kansas, and prevent a peaceful settlement of this question," the force of all their insurgent organization against the established authority of the Government was more than ever before exerted to defeat this particular measure. This fact is over and over again certified by the official dispatches from both Walker and Stanton, now on file in the Department of State, and copies of which are before the country. And on the other hand, all the protection that the General Government were authorized to extend for the secure and free operation of the settled law of the Territory was promptly extended. The documents also prove this fact. No dereliction on the part of the General Government at this important crisis would have been pardoned or tolerated by the country, and therefore the most scrupulous fidelity was exacted from the Federal authorities by the Governors of the Territory, and was exercised by the Executive, as the documents show. No dereliction on our part can be set up to vitiate proceedings under that convention act.

Let us look a little more into the execution of the provisions of that act. We are the constitutional judges, with our powers clearly defined in this case; and we must not be swayed by prejudices that might be tolerated outside of this tribunal. Prejudice, and personal or local feelings, must here give place to the inexorable stringency of law and established precedent. The material testimony we are bound to look for; and that must be conclusive.

What complaint, then, do we hear against the execution of the convention act? And upon what foundation is such complaint based? Was the registration of voters in March and April last not made?

The testimony is, that the registration was made of all voters whose registry was not prevented by the violence and threats of the parties now raising the objection of the non-registry of certain persons. The duties of the registering officers were performed faithfully, so far as we know, when they were not prevented by threats and violence and refusals. This is the record and the evidence. Now it is perfectly clear that the refusal of certain persons to be registered could not affect the rights nor privileges of those who were registered. Nearly a month was assigned for the correction and completion of registers by inserting persons not included, or striking off such as should be found erroneously inserted. Have we evidence that these defects or omissions were not attended to according to law where the officers appointed for that purpose were not forced away by those who now complain? None whatever.

But, say the caveaters, of the thirty-seven counties in Kansas, sixteen were utterly disfranchised, by reason of non-registry—sixteen out of thirty-seven. Well, what do they expect us to conclude from this objection? It is a startling statement, sir, and well deserving the notice of the country.

What do they expect the country to conclude from this statement, sir? These objectors well know what the country ought to conclude from such a statement, if true, and made as it is without further remark or comment. It would be this: that by willful and corrupt design, nearly one half of the population had been disfranchised by the deliberate omission on the part of the territorial officers. This is the desired conclusion, sir; and yet, if this conclusion were stated as the objection, it would at once be branded as an unblushing falsehood. Our friends ought to know, if they do not know, that they have no right to promulgate such an impression among the people of this country. I frankly say to my friends here, that were I sitting at my home, enjoying, as I love to do, the quietness and cheerful responsibilities of private life, and hear from this Capitol the oft-repeated declaration made by my political and personal friends, to whom I trusted my interests and the honor of my country; should I hear, then and there, as I hear now, the unqualified declaration that the President of the United States, or anybody else, by fraud, by perfidy, by swindling, by base truckling to the slave power, and such like indelicate means, had disfranchised sixteen out of thirty-seven counties of any State, I confess I should have felt bound to conclude that they who made the charge were at least actuated by high motives of truth and honor in exposing the damning deed.

The conclusion of this their bold argument calls upon me to denounce the President and the Democratic party of my choice, and to join hands and hearts with the political enemies of both, for the purpose of exposing such a foul outrage as the announcement implies. But what would be my mortification and shame to discover that the conclusion was a false one—utterly false; and what, suppose you, would be my detestation of the instruments who caused my deception?

Now let us see. Sixteen out of thirty-seven counties disfranchised by non-registry, is the charge. Out of every thirty-seven, sixteen repelled. Look at it, sir: to the testimony and the truth. How is it found to be? Is this charge that James Buchanan, the President of the United States, turns out, after all, to be a knave and a swindler, as the Black Republican party insist he is, and as some people used to think Andrew Jackson was? And must he be called so by his own political friends, as Andrew Jackson was by some of his political friends? And must those denouncing friends join the camp of the Philistines, as did some of Andrew Jackson's friends in his day? How is it? What is the record and the proof? Here it is.

In three of these sixteen counties so sadly disfranchised, there is not known to be a solitary voter at this hour. These are the counties of Washington, Clay, and Dickinson, lying far back in the uninhabited regions of western Kansas. Not a solitary vote came from there on the 4th of January election, which is so highly regarded by our quondam friends—not a solitary vote.

The same, so far as we know, was true on the 1st of April, 1857, with seven others of the unfortunate sixteen—Weller, Wise, Butler, Wilson, Godfrey, Greenwood, and Hunter. Not a solitary vote came from all these counties in the famous election of January 4, 1858; and certainly we could not have expected any a year ago. This disposes of ten of the sad unfortunates, whose mournful fate is so piously charged against James Buchanan and the Democratic party. As to four others of the disfranchised ones—Franklin, Breckinridge, Coffey, and Anderson—the record is, that the officers appointed for registering votes there were prevented from doing so by the rebellious ruffians who followed the behests of Lane and his associates, by violence, and threats of death and assassination, and driven from the execution of their duties. These are now complaining to us of their own wrong; complaining of a non-registration which they themselves forcibly prohibited. They thus willfully disqualified themselves in advance, with deliberate purposes of resistance to the last to the operation of the convention act in those counties. Upon their heads be the consequences of such acts of unmitigated barbarity and lawlessness; not upon the President of the United States and the Democratic party, who hold to laws which they thus attempted to trample under foot, and seek for confederates in audacity in this House.

Happily, not all of us are yet willing to sanction the Jim Lane party and their proceedings.

In two others of the unfortunate sixteen—Woodson and Madison counties—less than one hundred votes were returned on the 4th of January last; and it has not yet been shown that there was a single voter in them on the 1st of April, 1857. If there was, the number must have been exceedingly small, or we should have heard more of it.

Now, by referring to the election returns of January 4th last, nearly a year after the registration, not over one thousand six hundred votes, good and bad, were returned from all these sixteen disfranchised counties taken together; while the registration of the remaining twenty-one counties had nine thousand two hundred and fifty-one legal voters. That is the official return of the registration.

I make no further comment. This is the argument of disfranchisement upon which so much stress has been laid; and it bears its own refutation upon its face. This is the argument, sir; which, although stating the fact that in a number of counties no vote was had, yet conceals the reason, and thereby deliberately and willfully leaves a false impression upon the minds of thousands of readers who look to them for reliable information and data of reasoning—conceals and covers up the fact that ten out of the sixteen had not a solitary voter as late as the 4th of January last, and exist only upon the map in the uninhabited wilds of that frontier Territory; the remaining six showing, on that late day, only a vote of sixteen hundred or so, all told, and which it cannot but be presumed was far smaller in April, 1856; and that, such as it was, forcibly and willfully prevented from registration by the very persons who now complain that they had not a vote.

Strange indeed, and ominous, does it sound to hear the professed friends of a Democratic Administration reach a conclusion by such an argument as this against that Administration, and coalesce with the very party whose venomous spite was exercised in bringing about the very self-disfranchisement they now charge upon us. I have not so understood Democratic consistency. I say nothing about motives. I have no right here to impugn them, and would not do so if I had. I deal with the case as it stands. But I say here that, come what may, no consideration of expediency nor policy can induce me to stultify myself, and those who sent me here, to make my public record out of such materials, and rest it upon such premises.

This was the condition of things—the registry of voters being thus made agreeably to law, so far as it could be done—when the warning voice of Governor Walker was raised to the people, in these words:

"Those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency; and the absentees are as much bound, under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election; otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain the only alternative."

The election of delegates took place in the month of June, as provided by law, and was conducted orderly and peaceably; nothing appears to the contrary. The result was duly certified and made a record, and is, I think, among the documents on our tables. The members elected were commissioned, and took their seats in convention at Le-compton, on the first Monday of September, 1857, pursuant to the sixteenth section of the convention act, to perform the work assigned them by that section, to wit:

"To form its constitution and State government, which shall be republican in form, for admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States, in all respects whatever, by the name of the State of Kansas."

That constitution, which this convention was directed to form for admission into the Union, is now before us. It is republican in form. It is authentic. No difficulty is known to exist on this score. It comes to you for your verdict on the questions which the Constitution of the United States authorizes you to settle. Is it republican? Was it made by due authority and by a qualified power? And is its identity established? These are the questions, and the only questions we have to determine. And if a judgment is rendered in the affirmative on these three points, no legal bar exists to its admission.

But, says my colleague, we are not bound to admit, for the words are "may admit," not "shall admit." True. The words are "may admit," and the truth is, I have not the least doubt, that it allows him to say "no" in this case, here, provided he can expunge the faith of the Government towards the Territories organized under the Kansas-Nebraska act, and can also expunge the third article of the treaty with France of 1803, to both of which documents I respectfully refer my colleague for the fixing of his discretion. I trust I shall not hear him spurn the authority of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and the force of treaty stipulations, as I have heard certain politicians do.

But, say my opponents, the doctrine of popular sovereignty promulgated by the Kansas-Nebraska act has not been lived up to in this case. The constitution does not come to us ratified by the vote of the people at the ballot-box, after its adoption by the convention. Says my colleague, and others on that side, constitutions must be ratified by a vote of the people after they are made. Robert J. Walker philosophizes on this point most indivisibly and unintelligibly, and most egotistically and absurdly. But, gentlemen, did you think so a few months ago, when you tried a certain Topeka constitution? Did your political philosophy not come to your aid when you ignored this inexorable rule by striking it out of the document called the Toombs bill, a year or two ago?—a document, by the way, that we Democrats circulated by the million all over the land in the presidential campaign of 1856, and for the passage of which we applauded the Democratic Senate, including the distinguished Senator from Illinois, and denounced the Republican House of Representatives for refusing to pass it. Yet this bill made the action of a constitutional convention final, as we all know, without a submission of the instrument to the people. In fact, a provision was originally in the bill that the submission should be made to the people for ratification, but afterwards stricken out, and passed by the vote of the Democratic side of the Senate. So far from issue being taken by the Democracy of my State against the Toombs bill on account of this provision, I do not remember of ever hearing a single Democrat make it a matter of essential objection, until within a few days previous to the meeting of this Congress, when the peculiar creed of Mr. Walker became all at once the only true faith with certain parties.

Neither was this particular mode of ratification considered essential enough to be made a test in the earlier stages of this Republic, in addition to the tests indicated by the Federal Constitution. Since the present General Government went into operation, in 1789, to this day, eighteen new States have been admitted into the Union by Congress, namely, Maine, Vermont, Alabama, Florida, Mississippi, Tennessee, Louisiana, Arkansas, Kentucky, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Michigan, Illinois, Indiana, Ohio, Texas, and California. According to my information, eleven of these eighteen States presented constitutions completed and adopted by convention, and not submitted to the popular vote, and were admitted by Congress, being found republican in form. The others, seven in number, were adopted by the people through a popular vote, and presented to Congress for approval, and these were also admitted without any other test than that of republican form. This is my understanding, and I believe it to be correct. Therefore the precedents do not sustain this objection. Both ways are approved as equally consistent with the American ideas of sovereignty, and the people when left to adopt a constitution in their own way, have perfect liberty to use either way and meet the approval of Congress, if they conform to the constitutional model. And if it is guaranteed that the people of the Territories now have the right to form their institutions in their own way, certainly it would seem the grossest inconsistency, and dictatorial intervention now, in the face of past examples, to say to them that they should be held to the one way, and debarred from the other. Such a course would involve a gross deception. Congress never claimed the right of making the one way or the other way a general test, and never certainly exercised it; and, in my opinion, for Congress at this late day to make this test, would be a usurpation and an insult to popular sovereignty.

Under this same head of precedents for the delegation of sovereign power to make and ratify constitutions, I cite the case of the Federal Constitution itself. It was made by a convention, and its final ratification was by conventions in the States, elected for that purpose by the people, and did not go to the popular vote. Yet that sacred instrument purports to be, and I contend that it is, the solemn act of "the people of the United States." The sovereign power, through their chosen delegates spoke authoritatively and truly the words, "We, the people of the United States of America," &c., as you see in the preamble to the Federal Constitution. Governor Walker's indivisible, undelegated abstractions were not discovered in those days of sound sense and sound learning. I have not yet heard it openly stated that the Federal Constitution was not good for anything because it had not been voted upon at a general election or special election. But if this bill under this objection fails, I shall be prepared to hear the hoarse voice of denunciation against the Federal Constitution, because it had not been so submitted to the popular vote. But should that absurdity ever be heard by me in the future, I trust I shall not be so utterly transformed and metamorphosed by modern political philosophy, as to denounce a patriotic and Democratic President, and Democratic members of Congress and Democratic constituencies as swindlers, and corrupted by patronage, and slave-drivers, and other elegant and suggestive names, because they do not choose to shout for popular sovereignty, in my new sense of the term. On the contrary, I trust I would then, as I do now, contend that the old Constitution is in fact, and in all propriety, what it purports to be, the declaration of the act of "We, the people of the United States of America." And as each of the Old Thirteen started in solid column, under this motto of "We, the people," so each successive State that afterwards joined the gallant train, also, by its own voice, uttered in its own way, joined the universal chorus "We, the people."

Now, Kansas comes with her constitution, as Vermont and Illinois and Tennessee formerly came, through her convention, saying, "we, the people of Kansas, by our representatives in convention assembled," &c.; and straight is heard, "begone, thou graceless and unshapen wretch. Did not the Kansas-Nebraska act say that the people of Kansas should form their domestic institutions in their own way, and dost thou claim to say, in thy lying words, 'we the people of the Territory of Kansas?' The day of representation is past, and that of reform and repentance has come. Old fogy notions are exploded, and so you cannot be 'we the people.'" The great overgrown sinner, the State of New York, allows her Legislature and her grand inquests to say "we the people of the State of New York;" but it is all wrong since the promulgation of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and she should repent in sackcloth and ashes, and truly and honestly henceforth submit her statutes and her indictments to the popular vote, on pain of being made an outcast from decent society, and a graceless vagabond and swindler, according to the latest commentators on the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

But a single fact more, incidental to this branch of the subject, and I dismiss it. It is this: heretofore, in almost all cases wherein constitutions have gone to the popular vote after the convention, it has been done in obedience to a previous legislative or previous conventional act requiring such submission. And I am told that there are only two cases on record in which the convention submitted their work to a popular vote without being expressly required so to do by some previous authority of the people or of Congress. I believe those cases are Florida and California. In all other cases where a popular ratification was had, it was done in obedience to some previous legislation outside of the convention.

Now, in the case of Kansas, it is well known that the Legislature that passed the convention act were required by the then Governor to review that act, by his vetoing it on the ground that it did not direct the convention to submit the constitution to a popular vote. That Legislature passed the act by a constitutional majority over the veto, and refused to instruct the convention. Therefore the convention was elected and met with full and free legal discretion, in this respect, to submit it or not to submit it as they deemed best; with the same discretion that similar conventions in Illinois and Tennessee and other States that had met and acted. Governor Geary preferred, decidedly, that such submission should be made, and he used his best arguments, no doubt, to effect it; but he was overruled. Had I been there, I would have preferred that the submission of the constitution should be made in extenso, and I would have used my best efforts to effect it, as did Geary and Walker and Stanton. But I would have been obliged to submit to the majority there, as well as in Tennessee or Illinois where similar preferences were entertained by some people. This was my feeling and preference; but that preference has no right to affect my judgment, to be rendered as a member of Congress, upon the admission of the State. I hold, and I do most clearly understand, either mode valid and legal in the light both of the Federal Constitution and the organic act and territorial laws, although I have a preference for one mode over the other.

I have no doubt I have spoken as frequently before the people of New Jersey on Kansas and territorial matters, as I found them after the Kansas-Nebraska bill became a law, as any person in that State, especially during the exciting campaign of 1856, and before my election to this floor. And I further believe that my immediate constituents have as thoroughly examined into this territorial question as any constituency in this whole country. And I know that there is no misunderstanding between me and them on this question. My authority is their will and their understanding of this thing; and, happily, my own and only judgment is identical with my official and representative action here.

We thought we had some knowledge of the way in which constitutions have been formed in this country for admission into this Union. We thought that it was fair and consistent that Kansas should be allowed to frame her constitution with no other restraint than what was, or had been, imposed upon other States, either by Congress, or by intermeddling on the part of New Jersey, or New Jersey Congressmen. I proclaimed a hundred times the right conceded by the Democratic party, of freedom to Kansas to frame her institutions in her own way, and congratulated ourselves that the Wilmot proviso doctrine was dead and repudiated by the party.

But it never, in all that campaign, entered into my mind that by proclaiming this grand fundamental and essential idea of popular sovereignty, I was tying up the people of Kansas by my speeches by a restriction upon the exercise of that very sovereignty in their own chosen way, and was imposing upon them the necessity of adopting as their own way, what, in reality, might be found to be only my way and that of several other gentlemen in New Jersey—our way, which was ours in freedom, but might, if made a restriction upon the people of Kansas, be theirs only by duress. I knew perfectly well that both ways had been approved and practiced by the States; and, as everybody knows, we had enough on our hands to settle the principle of freedom of choice, and to defend the Territories from and against unconstitutional restrictions and interference by Congress, without entering into a controversy about the then admitted powers and privileges of an unrestricted and untrammelled people in their local adjustments of sovereign rights.

Indeed, as I intimated before, this question was not one of debate or controversy. We had the example of the Toombs bill on the part of the Democratic party, recognizing the validity and finality of the work of a constitutional convention, implying the expediency of vesting the sovereignty in a convention; and so thought the Territorial Legislature of 1857, in Kansas.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must necessarily bring my remarks to a somewhat abrupt conclusion. I have only to say that the constitutional convention in Kansas, most prudently and wisely, determined to submit to the test of a popular vote the question of slavery. The whole country, especially the majority of the States in the Union, had just passed through a most terrific political contest, in which this slavery question was the only vital element. The public mind in the North was yet intensely fixed upon the operation of the Kansas-Nebraska act, and upon the repeal of the Missouri restriction. A great and powerful political combination existed in the northern States, ready to renew the contest with unabated fierceness upon the first available pretext. The first practical result from the rejection of the Wilmot proviso was to be reached before the country, on the basis of free and unrestricted sovereignty, and therefore it was that everybody in the whole Union, who desired her peace and repose from this distracting subject, was anxious that, on this topic, there should be left no pretext for objection, whatever might be the result of the decision in Kansas. It was a subject in which alone and solely, as to Kansas, the country at large felt an interest, and a deep interest, though no right of control. I rejoice, therefore, that the convention did submit it to the people for their adjustment.

The result to me was unexpected, I confess. I expected the slave clause would be stricken out. But the vote is before me. It is legal, formal, and unimpeached, as to its majority. There is no dispute as to which way the majority of the conceded legal votes is. It was argued here, on the precedent of the New Jersey broad seal controversy, the other day, that we have a right to go behind the returns for the purpose of setting aside this vote. In that case there was a suppressed vote kept back by the returning officers, which, when produced, changed the result of the election. I say, now, in answer to that argument, bring forward, if you can, a suppressed vote in Kansas on the 21st of December last, sufficient to change the majority the other way, and I will yield at once, and I will not allow this constitution. But you do not pretend that there is any such suppressed vote. Nobody believes it; and there is not the slightest evidence or allegation that there is such a vote suppressed and kept back. And, therefore, there remains not a shadow of legal or reasonable doubt that the vote of the 21st of December must be conclusive.

But it is said by some members here, that they pledged themselves before their constituents that this whole constitution should be submitted to the popular vote. I would like to know where they got authority to make such pledges? I never had authority to make them, either by the law or the constitution, or the precedents in our legislative history. And I assure you I never could have been so unguarded as to make such pledges. I did contend that Kansas must decide for slavery or against slavery herself, and arrange her institutions in her own way. And I am sure I was just as well aware then, as I am now, what ways she might choose for herself, as other States had done. All that I protested against was, that New Jersey, New York, and all or any of the other States should undertake to determine those institutions for her, and illegally interfere in the matter. And when gentlemen say they cannot go back to their constituents who elected them without requiring a popular vote on this whole constitution, or that those constituents would find fault, I ask them once more to pause and see by what right either they or their constituents can enforce now, or at any time, a thing that no constitutional, legal, or customary injunction can be found for? I rejoice that the question about which any possible technical objection could be raised—I mean the slavery clause—was submitted to the people. This appeared to interest the nation. Slavery was made a bone of contention in the councils of the nation, and it was judicious and wise to submit that question to the people of Kansas on that account. I do not say that it was necessary. But if there was a necessity, as some contend, that the slavery question must be submitted, that necessity has been satisfied, and we do wrong to indulge any cavils on that score.

But, says my colleague, if a necessity existed for the submission of the slavery question to the popular vote, after the convention had arranged the constitution, the same necessity existed as to every other part. This by no means follows, as has been shown here over and over again. What is the wording of the clause of the Nebraska bill on this subject? and what is the subject-matter of that clause? It is this very subject of slavery. The clause is as follows:

"It being the true intent and meaning of this act not to legislate slavery into any Territory or State, nor to exclude it therefrom, but to leave the people thereof perfectly free to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States."

This clause is alone apt and germane in the plan which holds in the Kansas-Nebraska bill, in the shape of a corollary—a necessary, unavoidable corollary, from the repeal of the Missouri restriction in the same act, and an enunciation or reiteration of the doctrines involved in the compromise measures of 1850. This is the legislative character and relation of the clause; and if so, applies to slavery alone in this place. The statement of the corollary would seem to be surplusage, because self-evident; and is by some considered to be surplusage. But, inasmuch as it was inserted in the bill, many others have contended that it imposed the necessity of a popular vote on the question of slavery, before it should be incorporated in the constitution; and it was to meet the views of these latter expositors that the convention in this case did submit this question to a popular vote, so that nobody should be left unsatisfied. And yet my colleague, the other day, undertook a tilt in logic with Mr. Buchanan, upon the views he had set forth in his messages on this subject, and fairly strove to drive the President into a logical inconsistency. In my opinion, the effort was unsuccessful, although the encounter was a laudable one. I like the self-reliance and bravery which it exhibited. Unfortunately, legislative contexts were in the way, and blocked the conclusion of my colleague.

One word more, and I will dismiss this whole case for the present. It is said that this constitution cannot be altered before 1864. I think differently. I have no space for argument on that point now. If it can be altered, as I believe it can be, it will be done in some legal way. If it cannot be done, as some say it cannot, I cannot help it. I did not make it; and am not responsible in this behalf. New Jersey once had a constitution which was upon its face declared to be "firm and inviolable." But it so happened that in 1844 a constitutional convention was called by the Legislature, and a new constitution made, under which we now live and have our being, all secure and safe, as we think. That constitution was submitted to the people, as the legislative act which called the convention required it to be done. It was ratified by a majority of all the votes cast, the whole of which votes, for and against it, being 23,870, all told; while at the presidential election, held the same year, 76,207 votes were cast. It was adopted by a small minority of voters in the State. So our constitution was changed notwithstanding its declared firmness and inviolability; and that by a minority of voters in the State. I suppose the same thing may be done elsewhere, although I do not mean to dictate that it shall be done elsewhere volens volens.

But certain gentlemen are very much stunned by a vote taken on the 4th of January last, wherein some ten thousand votes are said to be cast against this Lecompton constitution. Now, I have to say, in the first place, that it is not fair for us to take for granted as true the record made up by our political enemies, and repudiate the proven record of our side. But for the strength of argument, it is sometimes done. In the second place, that vote was without the authority of sovereignty, and could not set aside a completed, perfected constitution, made and ratified by that sovereignty, in convention and otherwise, as in the present instance. In the third place, the supposed or ascertained dissatisfaction of a majority of voters to-day, against a member of Congress, or governor, or constable, who was legally elected last year, does not invalidate his official acts, nor screen those who elected him from the responsibility of his acts. He, by constitutional and legal intentment, does their work notwithstanding. This is all I have to say in reply to the announcement of the vote of January 4, be it what it may in reference to this constitution.

And now I have said all that this opportunity allows me to say. I shall give my vote in this matter with confidence, and under a sincere conviction of the correctness of my position. So firm and so confident am I, that I am discharging my duty in this behalf, that no consideration can make me falter or hesitate. The consequences belong to the future. I trust they may be subservient to the interests, the peace, and stability of the whole country. If they are, I shall have my reward in the common enjoyments, of a once more fraternized people. If they are not, I shall still rejoice that I have had the opportunity, in this place of responsibility, to make an honest effort to secure those blessings.

Mr. POTTER. Mr. Chairman, while the compromise measures of 1850 were under consideration in Congress, it was asserted that their enactment was necessary in order that this whole controversy upon the subject of slavery should end; that all discussion thereafter in these Halls should cease; and that this "vexed question" should be forever settled. At the convention of the Democratic party, assembled in Baltimore in 1852, it was resolved "that the Democratic party will resist all slavery agitation in or out of Congress." President Pierce, in his annual message in December, 1853, speaking of the slavery question, said:

"It is no part of my purpose to give prominence to any subject which may properly be regarded as set at rest by the deliberate judgment of the people. But while the present is bright with promise, and the future is full of demand and inducements for the exercise of active intelligence, the past can never be without useful lessons of admonition and instruction. If its dangers serve not as beacons, they will evidently fail to fulfill the objects of a wise design. When the grave shall have closed over all who are now endeavoring to meet the obligations of duty, the year 1850 will be recalled to as a period filled with anxious apprehension. A successful war had just terminated. Peace brought with it a vast augmentation of territory. Disturbing questions arose, bearing upon the domestic institutions of one portion of the Confederacy, and involving the constitutional rights of the States. But notwithstanding differences of opinion and sentiment which then existed in relation to details and specific provisions, the acquiescence of distinguished citizens, whose devotion to the Union can never be doubted, has given renewed vigor to our institutions, and restored a sense of repose and security to the public mind throughout the Confederacy. That this repose is to suffer no shock during my official term, if I have power to avert it, those who placed me here may be assured."

That portion of those who placed him there, who exercise a controlling influence in the affairs of this nation, and whose god is slavery, wished for no such assurance. They were fully aware that he possessed no power, of any kind, which they could not control; they knew "the present was as bright with promise as the future was full of demand." That future was very near; and when it came, they found, as in the past, that the northern supplies were equal to the southern demand. On the 4th of January following, a bill was reported to the Senate repealing that solemn compact which had been entered into in good faith, in 1820, between the North and the South, after a most exciting contest in relation to the admission of Missouri as a slave State; that slavery should forever be excluded from all the Territories of the United States north of 36° 30' north latitude. After thirty-four years of peaceful acquiescence in that agreement, during which the South had appropriated all the territory south of that line to slavery, and as soon as it became necessary to organize a government for a Territory north of that line, it was then, and not until then, coolly proposed to annul that agreement. On the 24th day of May, 1854, that compact, so solemnly entered into, was, in violation of all good faith, of all honor, and of all honesty, broken by the South—in violation, too, of all the pledges made by the Democratic party that they would resist the further agitation of slavery, either in or out of Congress. Where now was the "sense of repose and security" which had been restored "to the public mind"? Where the "repose" which was to "suffer no shock during my official term"? What had become of the "deliberate judgment of the people," which had "set at rest" the subject of slavery? It was utterly disregarded by southern masters as by northern serfs.

Sir, the despotism of the nineteenth century, American slavery, grants no repose to its victims, either white or black. Its cry is "give! give!" and it is never satisfied. While seemingly reposing, it is drawing its folds more closely around its victims, or strengthening itself for new conquests. It is well to remark, that while this proposition to abrogate the restriction upon the extension of slavery was pending in Congress, it met with no favor with the people of the non-slaveholding States, and was carried in opposition to their known will and in the face of their loud remonstrances. In its passage the principles of a representative government were ruthlessly violated, and the executive power of the nation, through the immense patronage it dispenses, was brought to bear upon the representatives of the people to induce them to act in opposition to the known will of their constituents. The same corrupting power was also brought to bear upon the public press of the free States, which, with a unanimity never before witnessed, without regard to party affiliations, had united in echoing the voice of popular indignation at the bare attempt to commit this great wrong. The result affords cumulative evidence of the truth of that great fact which stands out so boldly upon the page of history, that the patronage of Government is not only corrupting in its influences, but, when wielded by a corrupt Executive, leads, through venal subserviency, to despotism. Notwithstanding this unanimity in opposition to the perpetration of this outrage, but a few months had elapsed when the humiliating spectacle was presented to the nation of a corrupted press bowing in lowly submission to the fresh requirements imposed upon it by its acquiescence in that act which it had before designated as a great and wicked wrong. Sir, it was a great and wicked wrong; and the subsequent acquiescence of a portion of those who opposed it in its inception cannot make it right. Besides its violation of good faith in throwing down that barrier which our fathers erected against the ingress of slavery north of the Missouri compromise line, you opened wide the door for those scenes of civil strife, violence, and crime, which have been witnessed, and which are the inevitable and legitimate result of the contact of two antagonistic forces which can never exist together peaceably upon the same soil, but which must, in the very nature of things, be ever arrayed in deadly hostility to each other.

Free labor and slave labor are natural enemies. The one is honorable and ennobling; the other dishonorable and degrading. Free, honest, intelligent labor expands and strengthens all the faculties of the mind; slave labor contracts, weakens, and finally destroys them; crushing out humanity, obliterating the image of God stamped upon every human soul, and transforming the man into a beast of burden. Through the operation of the inexorable laws which control cause and effect, the punishment of all crimes against humanity follows close upon their commission. Slavery degrades not the slave only, but all with whom it comes in contact. Jefferson, on page 39 of his Notes on Virginia, says:

"There must doubtless be an unhappy influence on the manners of our people, produced by the existence of slavery among us. The whole commerce between master and slave is a perpetual exercise of the most boisterous passions; the most unremitting despotism on the one part, and degrading submission on the other. Our children see this, and learn to imitate it, for man is an imitative animal. This quality is the germ of all education in him. From his cradle to his grave, he is learning to do what he sees others do." * * * "The parent storms; the child looks on, catches the lineaments of wrath, puts on the same airs in the circle of smaller slaves, gives a loose rein to the worst of passions, and thus nursed, educated, and daily exercised in tyranny, cannot but be stamped by it with odious peculiarities. The man must be a prodigy who can retain his morals and manners unimpaired by such circumstances."

If, by any possibility, free and slave labor could be brought to work in harmony with each other, it would be impossible for the former, by any influence it could exert, to elevate or ennoble the latter; for, while it is in entire, complete subjection to the will of the master, it cannot rise above it, but must remain forever degraded; and the result would be the gradual demoralization of the free laborer, until he should reach the level of the slave. In opening Kansas to slavery you invited the contest between these two opposing elements, which has been carried on in that devoted Territory for the past three years; a contest in which has flowed the blood of American citizens in deadly conflict with one another, presenting to the world the astonishing spectacle of the Government of a free nation arrayed on the side of oppression, outrage, and crime, against its own people, whose only offense was an open, bold, and manly resistance to tyranny, and a struggle to defend those civil and political rights for which our fathers contended. Under the Kansas-Nebraska act you established a government for Kansas, which professed to leave the people of that Territory perfectly free to form their institutions in their own way. It was contended by many of those in the free States, who subsequently acquiesced in the passage of that act, that under it the people of the Territory, so soon as a territorial government should be organized, could decide for themselves the question of slavery. This was the northern construction, but denied by the South, they contending that the people of the Territory could not prohibit slavery therein until such time as the number of its inhabitants should be sufficiently large to warrant them in framing a constitution, and in applying for admission into the Union. The convention of the Democratic party, for the nomination of a President, at Cincinnati, in 1856, again submitted to southern dictation, by virtually adopting this construction, although it was contended by many of that party, during the late presidential campaign, in the North, that they had done no such thing, and that the resolutions of the convention would bear no such construction.

But there is now no longer any doubt upon this point, since the majority of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the purpose, undoubtedly, of relieving that party of a portion of the odium of such a position, has announced outside of the record of the case before them, the infamous doctrine that the Federal Constitution, which our fathers framed, and from which the slightest recognition of slavery was excluded, because, as Mr. Madison said: "it was wrong to admit into it the idea that there can be property in man," carries slavery into the Territory. Mr. Buchanan also, in his last annual message, fully indorses this odious doctrine, which, if carried out, would establish slavery in every State over which the Constitution extends. It will not be forgotten that this declaration of principle by the Supreme Court, was not made until after the adoption of the same principle by the Cincinnati convention, and it can only be regarded as an endorsement of the position of a political party. With all the advantages thus awarded to the slavery propagandists, by the concessions of the Democratic party, they were still fearful of their inability to establish their darling institution on the soil of Kansas. They therefore resorted to brute force, the fundamental principle of all slavery for aid in accomplishing their diabolical design. At the first election held in that Territory under the new system of territorial "popular sovereignty," for a Delegate to Congress, on the 19th of November, 1854, organized parties of armed men from beyond the limits of the Territory, took possession of the polls, and of 2,871 votes cast, it was estimated by the investigating committee of Congress, that 1,729 were illegal. On the 30th March, 1855, in pursuance of an order from Governor Reeder, an election was held for a Territorial Legislature. Again the Territory was invaded by large bodies of armed men from Missouri, which took forcible possession of the polls and elected a Legislature. Out of 2,905 voters named on the census roll, but 831 were found on the poll-books of the election, and of 1,310 legal votes, 791 were given for the free-State candidates, while hundreds of free-State voters were either driven from the polls by violence, or were prevented, by intimidation, from voting, by these same armed bands of intruders, by whom were polled more than 4,000 illegal votes. But four days were allowed in which protests against these returns could be filed, and consequently but few were made.

In the six districts in which protests were made new elections were ordered; and at these elections the free-State candidates were elected in every district except Leavenworth, which was again carried by a mob from Missouri. The free-State members thus elected were refused their seats, which were given to those originally returned. The Legislature, thus constituted by an invading army, sought to perpetuate its usurped power by the election of its own tools to the various county offices. Among the infamous acts passed by this body of men was one making it felony, punishable with imprisonment from two to five years, to circulate anti-slavery publications, or to deny the right to hold slaves in the Territory; an act conferring the right to vote upon all persons who should pay a poll-tax of one dollar, whether residents or not; and also an act requiring all voters and officers to take an oath to support the fugitive slave law and the acts of the usurping Legislature. Against these proceedings the people of the Territory earnestly protested, through delegates assembled in convention; but they protested in vain. They appealed to the Federal Government; but that Government was already enlisted on the side of their oppressors. On the 1st of October, 1855, the third election was held, the Territory again invaded, and Whitfield returned elected Delegate by two thousand eight hundred votes.

As the free-State men were disfranchised by the imposition of a test oath, as a condition precedent to their right to vote, and because they could not, in the exercise of the elective franchise, under the tyrannical acts of the usurping Legislature, obtain otherwise a full and free expression of the popular will; and because, under the organic act, they believed the people were to be left free to establish and regulate their own institutions in their own way, an election was held on the 9th of October, in pursuance of a resolution adopted by a convention of the people, held on the 5th day of September previous, for the election of a Delegate to Congress, and also for delegates to a convention to frame a constitution. At that election, twenty-four hundred votes were polled, and they were the votes of actual, bona fide residents of the Territory. The people's convention for the formation of a constitution met on the 23d day of October, and framed a constitution which prohibited slavery, and which was submitted to a vote of the people at an election held on the 15th of December. At that election, exclusive of the vote of Leavenworth, where the election was broken up by a mob of pro-slavery men, there were returned one thousand seven hundred and forty-one votes for the constitution, and against it, forty-six. A State government was subsequently organized under that constitution, which was presented to Congress, and ratified by the House. Notwithstanding the people of Kansas were to be left "perfectly free to form their institutions in their own way," on the 11th of February, President Pierce issued his proclamation denouncing the State government thus established by the legal voters of the Territory.

After this denunciation by the President, a regiment of men under Colonel Buford, enlisted in Alabama and other slaveholding States, arrived in the Territory with the avowed purpose of driving out the free-State men. These men were subsequently enrolled into the territorial militia by Governor Shannon, in order to give a color of legality to the atrocities which they intended to commit and which they subsequently committed. In May, Lawrence was attacked by a large force of ruffians; printing-presses were destroyed; buildings burned; stores and dwellings searched and plundered. Marauding parties scoured the Territory, destroying the property of free-State men, and committing every crime known among men. Free-State men were arrested under the slightest pretense, and without process of law. A corrupt and infamous judiciary was ever ready to lend its aid to this huge oppression. Bail was refused when offered. The great writ of right, never refused to the meanest subject of the British throne, was denied to those who were restrained of their liberty without even the forms of bogus law; while Haynes, the murderer of Buffum, a free-State man, under indictment for the crime, was admitted to bail by the infamous Lecompte, and set at liberty; and, when again arrested, the same partisan judge discharged him on habeas corpus. The battles of Pottawatomie, of Black Jack, of Franklin, and Ossawatimie, attest to the world the desperate extremity to which the free-State men were driven in defense of their lives, their property, and their rights as American citizens.

In October, 1857, the Council elected in March, 1855, for two years, having continued to hold over in violation of the organic law, an election was ordered for a new Legislature and for a Delegate to Congress. The majority of the people up to this time, had refused to acknowledge the legality of the usurping Legislature, which had endeavored to perpetuate its power by appointing all the local officers of the Territory; and by test oaths, the imposition of taxes, and other tyrannical means, sought to disfranchise the friends of freedom. But Governor Walker, in his speech at Topeka, having assured them that they should be protected in their right to vote, "not under the act of the Territorial Legislature, but under the laws of Congress," they went to the polls and voted. The result of that election is known to the whole country. The free-State men elected their delegates to Congress and the Legislature. But the miserable faction of usurpers who had thus far wielded the government, true to the principles which had governed them from the beginning, sought to continue their power by the most glaring frauds in the election returns from Kickapoo, Oxford, and McGee. Oxford, a small village in the county of Johnson, returned over sixteen hundred votes for the pro-slavery candidates—more than were cast at any other voting precinct in the Territory. Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton visited this place soon after, and in a proclamation dated October 19, 1857, they say:

"Accordingly, we went to the precinct of Oxford, (which is a village with six houses, including stores, and without a tavern,) and ascertained from the citizens of that vicinity, and especially those of the handsome adjacent village of New Santa Fé, in Missouri, (separated only by a street, and containing about twenty houses,) that altogether not more than one tenth the number of persons represented to have voted were present on the two days of the election, much the smaller number, not exceeding thirty or forty, being present on the last day, when more than fifteen hundred votes are represented as having been given. The people of Oxford, as well as those of the neighboring village of Santa Fé, were astounded at the magnitude of the returns; and all persons, of all parties, in both places, treated the whole affair with derision or indignation, not having heard the alleged result until several days after it had occurred."

These villainous returns were unhesitatingly rejected by Governor Walker; but notwithstanding this, fraudulent as they were, spurious as they had been found, they were subsequently used by the constitutional convention as a basis for the apportionment of members of a State Legislature, and Governor Walker was bitterly denounced by the pro-slavery faction in the Territory and by the Democratic party at the South for daring to do that which his oath of office, his conscience, his self-respect, and his patriotism, demanded of him; for doing that which, had he left undone, would have consigned his name to infamy, and the Territory of Kansas to civil war.

In September last, in accordance with an act of the usurping Legislature, a convention for the purpose of framing a constitution assembled at Lecompton. The delegates comprising that convention were elected in June previous, by only about one tenth of the legal voters of the Territory. The majority of the people took no part in the election, a portion of them being disfranchised by the action of the bogus Legislature, and the others refusing to participate in an election from which a large number of their political friends, whose qualifications were, in every respect, equal to their own, had been excluded. Had they participated, a sufficient number of the free-State men had already been excluded to render their votes entirely nugatory. This is a conclusive reason why the voters of those counties, in which an opportunity was afforded them to register their names and vote, refused so to do. Their silence was the only protest which their despotic rulers could not prevent them from making against this flagrant villainy. Governor Walker, in his letter of resignation, speaking of the convention of Lecompton, says:

"That convention had vital, not technical, defects in the very substance of its organization under the territorial law, which could only be cured, in my judgment, as set forth in my inaugural and other addresses, by the submission of the constitution, for ratification or rejection, to the people. On reference to the territorial law under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four regularly organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention. In each and all of these counties it was required by law that a census should be taken and the voters registered: and when this was completed, the delegates to the convention should be apportioned accordingly. In nineteen of these counties there was no census, and therefore there could be no such apportionment there of delegates, based upon such census. And in fifteen of these counties there was no registry of voters. These fifteen counties, including many of the oldest organized counties of the Territory, were entirely disfranchised, and did not give, and (by no fault of their own) could not give, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. This result was superinduced by the fact that the Territorial Legislature appointed all the sheriffs and probate judges in all these counties, to whom was assigned the duty, by law, of making this census and registry. These officers were political partisans, dissenting from the views and opinions of the people of these counties, as proved by the election in October last. These officers, from want of funds, as they allege, neglected or refused to take any census or make any registry in these counties, and therefore they were entirely disfranchised, and could not, and did not, give a single vote at the election of delegates to the constitutional convention.

"Nor could it be said these counties acquiesced; for, whenever they endeavored, by a subsequent census or registry of their own, to supply this defect occasioned by the previous neglect of the territorial officers, the delegates thus chosen were rejected by the convention. I repeat that, in nineteen counties out of the thirty-four, there was no census; in fifteen counties out of the thirty-four, there was no registry; and not a solitary vote was given, or could be given, for delegates to the convention in any one of those counties. Surely, then, it cannot be said that such a convention, chosen by scarcely more than one tenth of the present voters of Kansas, represented the people of that Territory, and could rightfully impose a constitution upon them without their consent. These nineteen counties in which there was no census, constituted a majority of the counties of the Territory; and those fifteen counties in which there was no registry, gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months' qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates who signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last."

This is a sufficient answer to those who seek to find, in the refusal of the free-State men to vote for delegates to that convention, an argument or excuse for forcing upon them, against their will, a constitution which is as vile and base and fraudulent as the convention which brought it forth. Governor Walker again says, in speaking of the opposition of the people of Kansas to that instrument, in the letter above quoted:

"I state it as a fact, based on a long and intimate association with the people of Kansas, that an overwhelming majority of that people are opposed to that instrument; and my letters state that but one out of the twenty presses of Kansas sustains it."

He further says:

"Some oppose it because so many counties were disfranchised, and unrepresented in the convention; others oppose it because, although, in other cases, the presidents of conventions have been authorized to issue writs of election to the regular territorial or State officers, with the usual judges, with the established precincts and adjudication of returns, in this case unprecedented and vice-regal powers are given to the president of the convention to make the precincts, the judges, and to decide finally upon the returns. From the grant of these unusual and enormous powers, and from other reasons, connected with the fraudulent returns of Oxford and McGee, an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas have no faith in the validity of these returns, and therefore will not vote."

This was written before the election in Kansas on the slave-importation clause of the Lecompton constitution, submitted to a vote of the people on the 21st day of December, 1857. The result of that election verified the implied prediction of Governor Walker, justified the want of faith of the people of Kansas in the validity of the returns, and proved the correctness of the estimate which an overwhelming majority of the people had formed of the depravity and villainy of Calhoun, the president of the convention, and the base tools whom he had appointed to aid him in his fiendish designs. The President of the Territorial Council, and the Speaker of the House, who were present at the counting of the votes, in a statement over their signatures, say:

"In obedience to the polite invitation of Mr. Calhoun, we attended on the day and at the time specified, and witnessed the opening of said returns, examined the poll books, noted the number of votes for and against the single proposition submitted by the schedule of the constitution, and find the following to be the result:

Constitution with slavery.....	6,143
Constitution with no slavery.....	569
Majority.....	5,574

"More than one-half of this majority was cast at those very sparsely settled precincts in the Territory, two of them in the Shawnee Reserve, on lands not open for settlement, viz:

Oxford, Johnson county.....	1,293
Shawnee.....	739
Kickapoo, Leavenworth county.....	1,017

------------	-------

"From our own personal knowledge of the settlements in and around the above places, we have no hesitation in saying that the great bulk of these votes were fraudulent; and, taking into view other palpable but less important frauds, we feel safe in saying, that of the whole votes polled, not over two thousand were legal votes polled by citizens of the Territory."

"The great bulk of these votes fraudulent!" So accustomed were the scoundrels to cheating, they did it from the pure love of the thing; did it when there was no real necessity for it; did it when they knew the free-State men could not and would not vote! Not over two thousand legal votes out of six thousand seven hundred and twelve! And this is popular sovereignty!

The question submitted at that election was not whether Kansas should be a free or a slave State; neither was it "for the constitution" or "against the constitution." The people were not permitted to vote against the constitution; but if they voted at all, they were compelled to vote for its ratification. They were not even allowed to vote for the exclusion or for the prohibition of slavery; but only for or against the further importation of slaves into the State. The existence of slavery in the State is distinctly recognized in this instrument; and its schedule declares "That no slavery shall exist in the State of Kansas, except that the right of property in slaves now in the Territory shall in no manner be interfered with."

So that, with a refinement of cruelty never before conceived of, every person, however strongly and conscientiously he might be opposed to slavery, if he voted at all, was forced to vote for the constitution, and for slavery under it. Sir, call you this a constitution? Call it rather the Juggernaut of slavery—the infernal machine of absolutism, invented by devils for the purpose of crushing out the manhood of its victims! True, Mr. Buchanan, in his annual message to us, says:

"In the schedule, however, providing for the transition from a territorial to a State government, the question has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people whether they will have a constitution 'with or without slavery.'"

"Fairly and explicitly referred!" Did the President suppose that the people of the United States were ignorant of the historical facts connected with the submission of this question to the people of Kansas? Did he forget that the statements of Governor Walker and Secretary Stanton were in direct contradiction to this? Or, presuming on the high position which most unfortunately for the country he at present occupies, did he suppose that he might, with impunity, state what every man in the country who reads a newspaper knows to be untrue? Governor Walker, in his message to the Secretary of State, before quoted, gives among other reasons for the opposition of the people to the constitution, that "the elective franchise is not free, as they cannot vote against the constitution, but only on a single issue, whether any more slaves may be imported, and then only upon that issue by voting for the constitution to which they are opposed." "Fairly and explicitly referred!" Mr. Buchanan does not believe it himself! For in the same message he subsequently says:

"Should the constitution without slavery be adopted by the votes of the majority, the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved."

Reserved how? Reserved to their masters—reserved so that the Legislature of the State of Kansas shall have no power forever to interfere with the relation between master and slave—shall have no power to abolish slavery in that State. Yes, sir, James Buchanan, the President of the United States, an American citizen, who has had some reputation as a statesman, says to the country that the question of slavery in Kansas has been fairly and explicitly referred to the people for their decision; and yet in the same breath he virtually says: "Should the constitution without slavery be adopted, slavery cannot be interfered with, but will be adopted with the constitution."

Surely, if the rapidity with which destruction follows madness be in the ratio of the dementia, Mr. Buchanan's annihilation must be near at hand. In connection with the passage before quoted, and in speaking of that provision of the Lecompton constitution which provides "that the rights of property in slaves now in the Territory are reserved," Mr. Buchanan says further:

"The number of these [slaves] is very small; but if they were greater the provision would be equally just and reasonable."

"The slaves were brought into the Territory under the Constitution of the United States, and are now the property of their masters. This point has at length been finally decided by the highest judicial tribunal of the country, and this upon the plain principle that when a confederacy of sovereign States acquire a new territory at their joint expense, both equality and justice demand that the citizens of one and all of them shall have the right to take into it whatsoever is recognized as property by the common constitution. To have summarily confiscated the property in slaves already in the Territory would have been an act of gross injustice, and contrary to the practice of the older States of the Union which have abolished slavery."

Under the last definition of popular sovereignty, given by the Democratic convention at Cincinnati, it was generally supposed that if the citizens of the Territory had no power while under the territorial government to prohibit slavery within the Territory, a time would come—that is, when they should frame a constitution for their State—when they could exercise such a power. It was understood that the slaveholder who should take his slaves into the Territory, would take them there knowing that a time would come when the people would decide upon the question; and that, in such an event, they might decide that slavery should not exist in the State, but should forever be prohibited. It was understood that he took them there subject to that risk—with a full knowledge of the facts. But it now seems that another downward step is taken; another construction favorable to the "peculiar institution" is placed on the Nebraska-Kansas bill. The President tells us that if the number of slaves were even greater than they are in Kansas, a constitutional provision that the Legislature should not interfere with the rights of property in slaves would be just and reasonable. How, then, stands the case?

The present doctrine of the Democratic party in relation to slavery in the Territories is, that Congress has no right to prohibit it, or to legislate concerning it; that the people of the Territories have no right to prohibit it while under their territorial government; that the Constitution of the United States carries slavery into and establishes it in the Territories; that it is just and reasonable, when the people of a Territory come to form a constitution under which they are to be admitted into the Union, that a provision should be inserted in the constitution reserving to the masters their right of property in their slaves; that is, slavery shall be established in every new State hereafter to be admitted into the Union, if it be the pleasure of even one slave owner to take his slave there while it is a Territory, though all others of the inhabitants of the State be opposed to it. And such is popular sovereignty, as now held by a Democratic President. In assuming this position, the great fact is ignored or forgotten that for more than seventy years Congress continued to exercise the power of prohibiting and regulating slavery in the Territories; or a better and more thorough understanding of the meaning of the Constitution is claimed by the political hucksters of the present day, than was possessed by the patriots who framed it; for, under the Administrations of Washington, of Madison, of Jefferson, and other Presidents, down to 1850—a sufficient length of time to have established the right by prescription, had there been any doubt of the derivation of that power under the Constitution—this power was repeatedly exercised by Congress, and never questioned. In assuming this position, too, the doctrine of popular sovereignty as originally understood has not only been abandoned, but it has been found necessary to place upon the Constitution of the nation a construction so monstrous, a libel so infamous, that the monarchs of the Old World laugh to scorn the results of the great experiment of popular government on this continent. In the message of the President transmitting the Lecompton constitution—the most extraordinary message, I venture to say, that ever emanated from the chief Executive of a civilized people; a message exhibiting the most envenomed hate and insane rage against the free-State men of Kansas, and blind and servile devotion to what he calls the “important domestic institution;” made up of unfounded statements, impotent arguments, and false accusations, intemperate in its language, and undignified in its style; a message which justifies the invasion of Kansas, the frauds on the ballot-box, the atrocious acts of the usurping Legislature, and the frauds, and swindles, and villainies of the miserable faction which has sought to impose its despotic rule on the majority—he says:

“A great delusion seems to pervade the public mind in relation to the condition of parties in Kansas. This arises from the difficulty of inducing the American people to realize the fact that any portion of them should be in a state of rebellion against the government under which they live. When we speak of the affairs of Kansas we are apt to refer merely to the existence of two violent political parties in that Territory, divided by the question of slavery, just as we speak of such parties in States. This presents no adequate idea of the state of the case. The dividing line there is not between two political parties, both acknowledging the existence of the government, but between those who are loyal to this Government and those who have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and usurpation—between those who sustain and those who have done all in their power to overthrow the territorial government established by Congress. This government they would long since have subverted had it not been protected from assaults by the troops of the United States. Such has been the condition of affairs since my inauguration. Ever since that period a large portion of the people of Kansas have been in a state of rebellion against the government, with a military leader at their head of most turbulent and dangerous character. They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied, the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority. They have all the time been endeavoring to subvert and establish a revolutionary government, under the so-called Topeka constitution, in its stead. Even at this very moment the Topeka Legislature are in session.”

Had he told us that a great delusion seemed to pervade his own mind, it would have relieved his message from that barrenness of truth which alone distinguishes it. But the President seems to be in the situation of a man who, unconscious of his own inebriation, regards every other person whom he meets as having imbibed too freely. My present impression, however, is, that he will find the delusion of which he speaks on the increase, if he shall succeed in his efforts to force upon the people of Kansas a government which they loathe; and that this delusion will arise from the “difficulty of inducing the American people to realize the fact that a state of rebellion against the Government under which they live” is any greater crime than is the attempt to force such a government upon them in defiance of their will, or that rebellion, under such circumstances, is a greater evil than submission. If the President means to say that the free-State men of Kansas are not, and have not been, loyal to the Government of the United States, and that they have endeavored to destroy its existence by force and usurpation, he says what is false. If he means to say that they have done all in their power to overthrow the government established by Congress, he again says what is false. That they have refused to acknowledge, down to the present moment, the legitimacy or the validity of the Territorial Legislature which was forced upon them by the armed hordes from Missouri, backed up by the Federal troops, is very true; and I thank God that they never have. As an American citizen, proud of the history of our fathers’ struggle to secure their rights, I feel grateful to the free-State men of Kansas for their bold and manly resistance to tyranny. As a descendant of revolutionary and rebellious ancestors, I rejoice that the spirit of 1776 is not yet extinct, and that Americans will still rebel against oppression. And this government of usurpation they would long since have subverted, and would have driven every oppressor from the soil, had not it and its ruffian supporters been protected by Federal troops.

Why have the majority of the people of Kansas been in a state of rebellion, as the President alleges? Why have they never acknowledged, but constantly renounced and defied, the Territorial Legislature, and been all this time in a state of resistance against its authority? The people of the United States are not apt to rebel against the Government or the laws; especially is this the case with the people of the North. The people of Kansas must, then, have had some good and sufficient reason for their open, bold resistance. And the President, with all his affectation of innocent simplicity and hollow protestations of honest intentions, knows that it was because the attempt was made to crush them to the earth; to deprive them of their inalienable rights; to drive them into abject submission to the will of a few slaveholders; to compel obedience to laws in the enactment of which they had no voice; and to force upon them, by the military power of the nation, a foreign government which they hated and loathed and spurned. Is not this sufficient cause, with American citizens, for rebellion, for defiance, for resistance? If not, then were our fathers guilty of a great crime in rebelling against England; and, undoubtedly, had Mr. Buchanan lived at that time, he would have so regarded it. The President says, “even at this very moment the Topeka Legislature are in session.” Suppose they are: whose business is that? The President’s? I think not. Is it a crime for a Legislature, elected under a constitution which was framed in strict accordance with the terms and principles of the Nebraska-Kansas act; which was—the whole of it—fairly submitted to the people for adoption or rejection, and fairly adopted by them, in the absence of all other government, except that of a foreign mob, to be in session in a Territory of the United States—a Legislature which alone has the confidence of the mass of the people, and which alone possesses the elements of popular sovereignty? With Mr. Buchanan, who has learned, since his election, to despise majorities, and who seeks to trample their will under his feet in blind subservency to the power behind the throne, this may be a mortal offense; but with freemen, who believe in the popular sovereignty of our fathers, it is at least pardonable.

Again, the President charges that—

“The very first paragraph of the Governors message of Robinson, dated the 7th of December, to the Topeka Legislature, now assembled at Lawrence, contains an open defiance of the laws and constitution of the United States.”

And for proof of the charge, he quotes from the message as follows:

“The convention which framed the Topeka constitution originated with the people of Kansas Territory. They have adopted and ratified the same twice by a direct vote; also indirectly through two elections for State officers and members of the Legislature. Yet it has pleased the Administration to regard the whole proceeding as revolutionary.”

The charge is, that the extract which he quotes from Governor Robinson’s message contains an open defiance of the laws and Constitution of the United States! This is just as true and just as false as his other charges and accusations. Let any man, who knows enough to tell the difference between Mr. Buchanan and General Jackson, point out the words in that quotation, adduced as proof of the charge, which can, by any amount of twisting, turning, or perversion, be made to bear such construction, and such person will be a fit and proper successor, in the Democratic line, of James Buchanan. Again, the President says:

“From this statement of facts, the reason becomes palpable why the enemies of the Government, authorized by Congress, have refused to vote for the delegates to the Kansas constitutional convention, and also, afterwards, on the question of slavery, submitted by it to the people. It is because they have ever refused to sanction or recognize any other constitution than that framed at Topeka. Had the whole Lecompton constitution been submitted to the people, the adherents of this organization would doubtless have voted against it; because, if successful, they would thus have removed the obstacles out of the way of their own revolutionary constitution. They would have done this not upon the consideration of the merits of the whole or part of the Lecompton constitution, but simply because they have ever resisted the authority of the government authorized by Congress, from which it emanated. Such being the unfortunate condition of affairs in the Territory, what was the right as well as the duty of the law-abiding people? Were they silently and patiently to submit to the Topeka usurpation, or to adopt the necessary measure to establish a constitution under the authority of the organic law of Congress? That this law recognized the right of the people of the Territory, without an enabling act of Congress, to form a State constitution, is too clear for argument. For Congress to ‘leave the people of the Territory perfectly free,’ in framing their constitution, ‘to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States,’ and then to say that they shall not be permitted to proceed and frame the constitution in their own way without express authority from Congress, appears to be almost a contradiction of terms. It would be much more plausible to contend that Congress had no power to pass such an enabling act, than to argue that the people of a Territory might be kept out of the Union for an indefinite period, and until it might please Congress to permit them to exercise the right of self-government. This would be to adopt, not their own way, but the way which Congress might prescribe.”

Here is another gross misstatement. The government authorized by Congress was such a government as the majority of the people of Kansas should establish. The only government so established was the Topeka government. The few enemies of that government did vote for the Lecompton delegates; and they were the only persons that did so vote. The reason given by the President for not submitting the Lecompton constitution to the people, is worthy of Louis Napoleon. He says that if it had been submitted, those who were opposed to it would have voted against it. It is most remarkable that the President should have made this discovery, and it affords further proof of his great statesmanship and vast perceptive powers. And he says, too, they would have voted against it, not upon the consideration of its merits, but because they were not in favor of it! Why does he say they would not have voted against it upon the consideration of its merits? How does he know that? Who told him? Does he claim the power of omniscience? Can he look into the hearts of men and discern their motives? And what was that to him, supposing they were opposed to the constitution for other reasons than consideration of its merits? Was this a reason for depriving them of their right to vote? Again and again he repeats the slander that the free-State men have resisted the authority of the government authorized by Congress; and again and again I throw back the false charge, accompanied with the appropriate sentiment. In a tone of sadness the President asks, “such being the unfortunate condition of affairs in the Territory,” (that is, there being a majority against the Lecompton constitution,) “what was the right, as well as the duty, of the (bogus) law-abiding people?”—that is to say, of the minority. What was their duty under these unfortunate circumstances? That is the question. Were they silently and patiently to submit to the majority, or to adopt the necessary means to establish a constitution which should be satisfactory to the minority, under the organic law of Congress? That would have been an easy question for honest men to decide, but it was a hard one for the knights of Lecompton.

But the President thinks it is no sort of use to argue about the matter, because it is clear that the people had the right to form a constitution without any enabling act of Congress; and I think the President may be right in this. I agree with him, that for Congress to leave the people of the Territory perfectly free in forming their constitution, to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and then to say they shall not be permitted to frame their constitution in their own way without express authority of Congress—and I go even further than that, and say, the bogus Legislature—appears to me to be, not “almost,” but quite, a contradiction of terms. But my theory differs from that of the President in this: I contend that “the people” means the majority of the bona fide inhabitants of the Territory; while the President contends that it means the pro-slavery inhabitants, even though they be a small minority. It seems to me, as it does not to the President, (and it pains me to differ from him,) “that it would be much more plausible to contend that Congress has no power to pass such an enabling act,” than to argue “that the majority of the people might be kept under the rule and control of the minority for an indefinite period, and until it might please the minority, or Congress, to permit them to share in the rights of government.” This, Mr. Chairman, has a direct application to the Topeka constitution, and brings it fully within the terms of the Kansas-Nebraska act; and the President’s reasoning is a full and complete justification of the Topeka government. And, sir, if this Government had not already degenerated into a despotism as detestable as that of Austria, whenever it chooses to manifest itself, the validity of that constitution would have been acknowledged long ago, and the Administration of the Government would have been saved from the merited disgrace which it has brought upon itself in the eyes of the whole civilized world, and the people of Kansas from the wrongs which have been inflicted upon them. The President, in his insane zeal to libel the friends of freedom in Kansas, has not been careful to make his misstatements consistent with themselves. For instance, he says:

“The truth is, that up till the present moment, the enemies of the existing government still adhere to their Topeka revolutionary constitution and government.”

And again he says:

“They have never acknowledged, but have constantly renounced and defied, the government to which they owe allegiance, and have been all the time in a state of resistance against its authority.”

Then, when speaking of the fact of the free-State men having voted, on the first Monday in January, against the Lecompton constitution, he says:

“A large majority of the persons who voted against the Lecompton constitution were at the same time and place recognizing its valid existence in the most solid and enthusiastic manner by voting under its provisions.”

In one breath he charges that they still adhere to the Topeka government and refuse to acknowledge any other, and in another he declares that they have recognized the Lecompton constitution in the most enthusiastic manner. Extracts of a similar contradictory character might be quoted. They afford a melancholy instance of the repetition in high official position of a not uncommon occurrence in our criminal courts—of the incoherence of false and perjured witnesses. Mr. Buchanan further says:

“The enemies of territorial government determined still to resist the authority of Congress. They refused to vote for the delegates to the convention, not because, from circumstances which I need not detail, there was an omission to register the comparatively few voters who were inhabitants of certain counties in Kansas in the early spring of 1857, but because they had determined at all hazards to adhere to their revolutionary organization, and defeat the establishment of any other constitution than that which they had framed at Topeka. The election was therefore suffered to pass by default; but of this result the qualified electors who refused to vote can never justly complain.”

Here the President professes to give the reason why the free-State men refused to vote; and he says it was not because there had been an omission to register the names of the “comparatively few” voters who were the inhabitants of certain counties of Kansas in the early spring of 1857. He says this, let it be remembered, with the letter of Governor Walker, of December 15, open before him; which letter states that in the territorial law; under which the convention was assembled, thirty-four organized counties were named as election districts for delegates to the convention; that in each and all of these counties the law required that a census should be taken and the voters registered, and the delegates appointed accordingly. He then states that in nineteen of these thirty-four counties no census was taken, and in fifteen no registry of voters; that the fifteen counties included many of the oldest counties in the Territory, and that the people in them did not give and could not give, and by no fault of their own, a solitary vote for delegates to the convention. He also says these fifteen counties in which the people were thus disfranchised gave a much larger vote at the October election, even with the six months’ qualification, than the whole vote given to the delegates that signed the Lecompton constitution on the 7th November last. Again, the President says:

“The question of slavery was submitted to the election of the people on the 21st of December last, in obedience to the mandate of the constitution. Here, again, a fair opportunity was presented to the adherents of the Topeka constitution, if they were the majority, to decide this exciting question in their own way, and thus restore the peace of the distracted Territory; but they again refused to exercise the right of popular sovereignty, and again suffered the election to pass by default.”

Governor Walker says, in reference to this, that the people can vote “only on the single issue whether any more slaves may be imported, and not even then, unless at the same time they will vote for the constitution. Mr. Secretary Stanton says of this:

“Leaving out of view the mode in which the constitution was submitted, that single question upon which they might vote was not presented fairly. The people could merely determine whether or not they would permit the introduction of more slaves into the Territory; for the right of those already in the Territory could not be interfered with. I should blush to present in this way such a question as this to any community upon this continent, and say that it fairly presented to them the question whether they should live under a State government with slavery or without slavery.”

“A fair opportunity,” says the President! Surely he must have adopted the same principle as that which governed another potentate, when he exclaimed, “evil be thou my good!” It is unnecessary to quote further from this gigantic fabrication, which is contradicted in all its material statements and charges by the evidence of the President’s own witnesses, Governor Walker and Mr. Secretary Stanton, and also by the published statements of the former Governors, Reeder and Geary, and Secretary Gihon. Some of the statements contained in the published speech of Mr. Stanton I will not now stop to read, but will append them. From these, as well as from the extracts already quoted from the letter of Governor Walker to Mr. Cass, it is evident that the government in Kansas, which the President constantly avers was a legitimate government established under the Nebraska-Kansas act, has been the government of a small minority, sustained and kept in force only by the military power of the Federal Government, and that the majority have ever been in a state of rebellion against this minority rule and the military power which was stationed there to enforce that rule upon them.

The Kansas-Nebraska act professed to assert a new principle for the government of our Territories—that of popular sovereignty; and we see, as its result, the entire subversion of the fundamental principle of all free government—the enlightened will of the people. The popular sovereignty of the Kansas-Nebraska act was but the whitened sepulcher of the rights of the minority. True popular sovereignty includes, regards, and protects the inherent rights of every person over whom that sovereignty is extended. It is the aggregate will of every person within its jurisdiction. It protects the rights of the minority as well as of the majority. Under it, the majority have no more right to oppress or enslave the minority, than has the absolute monarch of a kingdom to oppress and enslave those over whom he rules by virtue of his power. That monarch may have in his hands the power to enslave his people; but God has not given him, and man cannot give him, any such right. So the majority may assume the power of decreeing that the minority shall be their slaves; but that majority have no such right. The right of the minority, and of each individual of it, to life and liberty, is inherent; derived from the same source, and having the same basis, as that of the majority to the same blessings. Congress has no power, under the Constitution, to establish slavery anywhere; hence, it could confer none upon the people of the Territories.

Congress has the right, in the institution of governments for Territories, to prohibit slavery therein; and it has hitherto exercised that right, as was its duty to do. Under the Nebraska-Kansas act Congress sought, as a matter of political policy, to shift the responsibility which the Constitution has imposed upon it, from itself to the people of the Territories. You repealed the restriction which the men of the past generation had placed upon slavery extension, and assumed to confer upon the people the right to establish it—a right which you never possessed, and which the power of Omnipotence alone could confer. You now behold the work of your hands! Can you pronounce it “good?” The soil of Kansas has been made the battle-ground for contending hosts. Her soil has been stained with the blood of American citizens. Her people have been driven into rebellion against oppressive laws, enacted by an invading army. Her towns and villages have been sacked and plundered. Her ballot-box has been desecrated and destroyed. The power of the Federal Government has been invoked on the side of tyranny, and it sprang with alacrity to its aid. The military arm of the nation has been used to enforce upon American citizens a government in which they were deprived of all participation. In the forum of legislative debate argument has been deposed and brute force inaugurated in its place. An attack, as infamous in its inception as it was cowardly and brutal in its execution, has been made upon the person of one of the representatives of a sovereign State, while engaged in his official duties, in the Capitol of the nation, for words spoken in debate. Threats of disunion and secession, as puerile in their utterance as they are lame and impotent in their intended effects upon free men, are daily uttered on this floor. The memories of the great and good of the past, whose wisdom and virtues are embalmed in the history of our country, to whom we owe all that we have worth possessing, are here openly traduced and slandered. The great truths which our fathers pronounced self-evident, the declaration of which sent a thrill of joy and hope through the hearts of oppressed humanity, are now, in this day of our country’s shame, pronounced “self-evident lies,” “glittering generalities,” and “rhetorical flourishes.” Executive interference with the legislation of Congress is notorious; and charges which, if true, should lead to impeachment, are refused investigation in this House by a party vote. Laws are enacted, systems changed, and great principles violated, without regard to the remonstrances of the people. Corruption stalks abroad at noon-day in the avenues of the capital, and sends forth in multitudinous streams to the people with its patronage, venal demands of acquiescence and subservience.

Such are the demoralizing influences of slavery which seeks to establish and extend its power throughout the length and breadth of this continent—a power which exhausts the life and vigor of commonwealths; destroys the prosperity of nations; corrupts the principles of parties; debases and brutalizes its victims, and drags down to its own level of barbarism, all that yield to its embrace. Under the system of territorial government adopted by our fathers, and which has prevailed for more than half a century, a system which asserted the right as well as the duty of Congress to exclude slavery, the will of the majority has always governed, and was always respected. The history of our country does not furnish an instance of civil commotion or even of an attempt, on the part of a minority, to usurp the power in the establishment of a territorial government previous to the enactment of the Kansas-Nebraska bill. Let us, then, return to the original policy of the Government, and peace and harmony will follow. Let us dare to do right, because it is right. Let us indignantly spurn from us the atheistic sentiment that there can be property in man. Let us declare before the world that no constitution, which recognizes man as a chattel, can be “republican” in form. Let us have the courage and the manhood to declare ourselves the friends of the down-trodden and oppressed, though the victims of oppression may be of another color, or of another clime. With us, sir, the Constitution of our country has deposited a high discretionary power in relation to the admission of new States into the Confederacy—a power which devolves upon us the most important and solemn duty which we can be called upon to discharge. That power we shall soon be called upon to exercise. The instrument before us, purporting to be the constitution of Kansas, we know to be that of a small minority of her people, the great mass of whom most solemnly and earnestly protest against its imposition upon them. It recognizes the right of property in man—a principle which her people abhor.

Sir, you may disregard their remonstrances, you may treat them with scorn, you may trample upon their rights, you may attempt to force upon them this government; but, sir, you cannot subdue them, you can never conquer them. You have driven them into rebellion, but you can never drive them into subjection. They have been taught in the school of revolutionary heroes, and have not yet forgotten their lessons. Remember, sir, that they are American citizens. Indorse that constitution; decree the admission of Kansas under it, and you will then be called upon to enforce that decree at the point of the bayonet. Sir, her people, true to the principles of the American Revolution will never submit. My prayer to God is that they never will! Nor will they be left alone in their holy struggle. There lives not a man in this broad land, whose heart pulsates with liberty and a love of justice, who would not obey with alacrity her call for help. In such a contest she would command the sympathies of the civilized world. From such a struggle I would not shrink, nor would I hesitate to pour out my blood upon her soil in defense of her rights and her liberties. And when, sir, this nation engages in such a contest, on the side of despotism, against her own people, history, in recording the infamous fact, will with the same pen record her epitaph—such will be the righteous retribution of our nation's crime.

[APPENDIX.]

Extracts from the speech of Mr. Secretary Stanton, in Philadelphia, February 8, 1858.

"The substance of the complaints made by the people of the Territory, when I arrived in Kansas, was that they had had no fair participation—indeed, no participation whatever—in the government of the Territory which was established over them. I found there intelligent men from almost every State in the Union—men from your own great conservative State. I found them settled upon their farms—intelligent, industrious, sober, good citizens, desirous of peace and order. Yet I found them denouncing the territorial organization, many of them declaring that they would never yield obedience to it. And why? The simple reason offered was, as I have already stated, that they had been by violence and fraud excluded from any fair participation in the election of the officers of the Territory—in other words, that the Legislature of the Territory had not been elected by the people of the Territory, but that the House of Representatives and the Council had been elected by the population of a neighboring State, or by fraud and outrage—which left to the people of the Territory no possible opportunity of conducting their own affairs in their own way, under the territorial organization.

"Such was their complaint. I did not know certainly how much truth there might be in these complaints. But it was certainly an astonishing thing—a fact calculated to arrest the attention of any man, or any public officer who desired to do his duty to the whole country—to see the great mass of the population of the Territory resisting the laws, refusing obedience to them upon the ground (which doubtless they sincerely believed) that these laws had been unjustly imposed upon them.

"Under these circumstances, Governor Walker and myself—he as Governor, and I, in his absence from the Territory, as acting Governor, with the same power and authority—had the unlimited control of that portion of the Army of the United States which was within the Territory. When I say 'the unlimited control,' I mean unlimited so far as the law allowed the use of the forces for the purpose for which they were required; that is to say, the officers of the Army were left no discretion, but were bound to obey the command of the Governor, the whole responsibility resting upon him, and not upon the military officer. We did not doubt—we knew, as any man having the same opportunity would necessarily have known, that a vast majority of the people entertained these sentiments in reference to the territorial government. Of this fact there was not the slightest question. Three or four or five to one of the people told us to our face that they would not obey the laws, because, as they said, those laws were imposed upon them by illegitimate authority; they had been defrauded and cheated, and they would not submit.

"In this state of things, Governor Walker and myself, generally in company, went among the people for the purpose of listening to their complaints, of ascertaining their sentiments, their wants; and we endeavored to persuade them as peaceable American citizens, to submit to the laws until they could right themselves at the ballot-box. I was astounded when they laughed in my face with scorn and mockery at the very mention of the ballot-box. They said that the local officers were the merest and most unscrupulous partisans, utterly dishonest in these matters of public elections; and that if their neighbors of Missouri did not come into the Territory for the purpose of outvoting them, these officers would cheat and defraud them by forged votes made for that purpose. I confess that I could not believe these things. I did not know certainly whether such things had transpired before in the history of that Territory."

"It was not in the power of Governor Walker, with all his persuasive eloquence, to inspire the people of Kansas with confidence sufficient to go into the election, on the 15th day of June, for delegates to the convention. I believe that if, prior to that time, a fair registration had been made of the voters of the Territory, that Governor Walker would have induced the people to go into that election. But it was not made—the people said that the great mass of their number had no power or right to vote, because their names had not been registered, and the comparatively few who had been registered refused to separate from the members of their own party who had been excluded. They did not go into the election on the 15th of June, and the consequence was, that out of the nine thousand two hundred and fifty voters, whose names had been registered, the sixty delegates who framed the Lecompton constitution received and were elected by less than two thousand votes. [Laughter.] There were in all about two thousand two hundred votes cast, and of these the successful candidates received one thousand eight hundred, which, upon an average, was about thirty votes apiece. [Laughter.] I confess to you that it never occurred to me as a thing probable, or even possible, that these sixty men, thus having placed in their hands the interests of a people of that character, could have dreamed of refusing to submit their work to the great masses who had no participation, or opportunity to participate, in their election. I did not dream of that contingency, much less did I ever suppose that any respectable authority outside of Kansas, or even in Kansas, would seriously have contended for such a proposition; least of all could I have supposed that, with the instructions of the President before me, he could have been found at this time proclaiming to the Congress of the United States, and to the world, that this constitution ought to be adopted by Congress, and fastened upon the people against their express and unequivocal protest."

"It is true that up to the time of the October election, I could not believe—I did not altogether believe—that the complaints of the people of Kansas were just, were true. No man could have credited the outrages which they asserted had been perpetrated upon them. But, immediately after the October election had transpired, when the minority, which had had entire control of the Government from its inception, saw that the power was about to depart from them, I was astounded—my eyes were opened—when I received at the executive office in Lecompton the celebrated returns from Oxford and McGee."

"They based the apportionment to the county of Johnson upon the fraudulent returns given at Oxford at the October election. To that almost uninhabited county they gave two Senators out of thirteen, and four Representatives out of thirty-nine. The great preponderance of Representatives was given to the border counties of Missouri. And in providing for the vote upon the constitution, they required no qualification for voters except the fact of inhabitation on the day of the election.

"I conscientiously believed that the great mass of the people of Missouri had nothing to do with these shameless violations of law and right in the Territory of Kansas. Those who did participate in them were comparatively few, and were the worst part of the border population—politicians of the lowest, most unscrupulous character.

"I had opposed the Lecompton constitution, not only because I maintained the right of the people to vote upon their fundamental law, but because I saw in that instrument itself the most unjust, the most unfair of all possible provisions. In this schedule to the constitution, they profess, in a certain way, to submit to the adoption or rejection of the people; yet they afterwards qualify the matter in such a manner as to give them only the power to vote upon a single feature of the instrument—for the constitution with slavery, or for the constitution with no slavery; but for the constitution at all events, and under all circumstances.

"The President of the United States, in his special message, had declared that the people of the Territory had a fair opportunity to decide whether the State should be a slave State or a free State. Without intending to impugn the motives of the President, far less to question his veracity, I feel bound to say that the statement was, in my judgment, utterly incorrect."

"I now discovered, for the first time to my entire satisfaction, why it was that the great mass of the people of the Territory had been dissatisfied with their government and were ready to rebel and to throw it off. There never was a moment during my residence in the Territory of Kansas that the people would not have rejected their government—utterly overthrown it, destroyed it, but for the power of the United States army within the Territory.

"The convention met in October to prosecute its work. The members of this convention were elected by, and represented a small minority of pro-slavery men—they represented scarcely anybody else.

"Mr. President, I had confidently expected that the convention would have framed that constitution fairly and properly, that they would have submitted it to the people entire, and that they would have permitted them, by a separate and distinct vote, to determine whether or not they would have slavery within the State. But to my great regret and mortification, when they concluded their work, I saw upon the face of the instrument prepared by them, the plainest indications of predetermination and preconcertance for continuing the control of the minority by the same means by which it had been maintained from the beginning."

"I do not believe it ever was the intention of Governor Walker—it certainly never was mine—to occupy a place in the territorial government of Kansas, and see frauds, wrongs, and outrages perpetrated upon the ballot-box, or elsewhere, and continue to enforce upon the people the laws thus maintained. I say here, to night, that I would have resigned my commission—I would have thrown it in the face of the authorities at Washington, [applause]—if I had understood, or thought, that I should be required to continue the same state of things in Kansas which had existed there previous to my arrival.

"I would never have consented to become the instrument of oppressing the people, Black Republicans, or anything else which they might be, [cheers,] by maintaining a Government of the minority, by force and by means of the Army of the United States. One fact is beyond all dispute—that since I have been in Kansas, and so far as I have known anything of her history, the government there has been the government of the minority. [Applause.] It is true that the vast majority of the people, upon several occasions, have refused to participate in elections. They have stood off, and said: 'We have no lot or part in this proceeding; we have no confidence in them; we know we cannot get justice, and therefore we turn away from them, and will have nothing to do with them.' Whatever may be the truth in regard to the complaints of the people of Kansas, it certainly was a lamentable state of affairs, which must have been the consequence of some great wrong, real or imaginary, inducing the people thus to refuse to participate in their own government, at the very time when they were clamoring for the opportunity to govern themselves.

"The people of that Territory had provided for a convention, but they had not clothed them with power to put the constitution they agreed upon in operation without submitting it to the people. But the convention attempted to assume the power, and after the Legislature had been called together for the purpose of preventing it, and had authorized an election on the 4th of January, at which more than ten thousand votes were cast against it, the President tells us that he has no official information of that vote. I doubt not that the President's statement is correct; but I tell you that I was present on the 13th or 14th of January, when Governor Denver, my successor, formally, in the presence of the Speaker of the House and the President of the Council opened the votes and counted ten thousand of them, and it was then well understood that a considerable number of precincts had not yet sent in returns. Since that time I have seen by the newspapers that the vote had reached twelve thousand. The whole vote of the election of the 21st of December, held by the authority of the convention, both for and against the slavery clause in the constitution, was six thousand seven hundred, and at least one half of that was utterly fraudulent, as is known and will be acknowledged by every fair, intelligent, and candid man in the Territory and on the borders of Missouri, whilst it is evident that on the 4th of January there were from ten to twelve thousand votes cast against the constitution.

"I have heard no charge of fraud against the party who polled this large vote against the constitution. Even if these gentlemen had been as ready to commit fraud as the other party, there was no necessity for it, and certainly they showed a disposition not to do it, because they threw around the law every possible guard which was necessary to secure honesty.

"The real vote of the whole pro-slavery party could not be, Mr. S. thought, more than three thousand or three thousand five hundred; that of the free-State men was from twelve to fifteen thousand."

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, then obtained the floor; but yielded it to

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, who moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, having taken the chair, Mr. BOCKOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

And then, on motion of Mr. BOCKOCK, (at seven o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. Mr. Brown.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, communicating in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement of allowances made to distributing and separating offices by order of the Postmaster General, under an act approved June 22, 1854, to regulate the pay of deputy postmasters; which, on motion of Mr. GWIN, was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

NEW YORK ON KANSAS.

Mr. SEWARD. I present joint resolutions of the Legislature of New York concerning the bill for the admission of the State of Kansas into the Union, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read them, as follows:

Resolved, That the State of New York is opposed to the admission of Kansas into the Union as a State with the constitution commonly known as the Lecompton constitution or any other constitution which shall not have been in all its parts fairly submitted to the legal voters of the Territory, and received their sanction and approval.

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be transmitted to the Senators and Representatives from this State in Congress.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, I wish to make a statement, in a few words, concerning the attitude of the State of New York on the great subject which has been so long under debate in Congress. In reply to the position which I have assumed here, it has been intimated that the action of the Representatives of New York in opposing the extension of slavery, is of recent origin, and of a partisan character; that the operation of the substitution of free labor for slave labor in the States which tolerated slavery at the beginning of our constitutional existence, is a state of turbulence; and that the progress of that reformation of our social system must necessarily be attended with conflicts and disasters. I have to state, sir, that when the State of New York came into the Union, every sixteenth inhabitant of the State was a slave; that in the year 1799, under the auspices of John Jay, and nine years before the prohibition of the foreign slave trade, the system for the gradual emancipation of slaves was begun in New York; that in the year 1817 it was completed by an act which abolished slavery at the expiration of ten years from that time; that it was not attended by injustice or fraud; but the same act which abolished slavery prohibited both the exportation and importation of slaves—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. I understand the Senator from New York to be making a speech on the presentation of this petition. The rule of the Senate, as I understand it, is that on the presentation of it, the Senator may state its contents, but cannot make a speech on it.

Mr. SEWARD. I think the honorable Senator has misapprehended the nature of the business before the Senate. I am submitting the resolutions of the Legislature of New York, and I believe that it has always been allowed that an explanation or statement might be made accompanying such resolutions. I intend to make a motion in relation to them.

Mr. IVERSON. The rule, I think, simply is that an explanation stating the contents of the paper may be made, but not a speech on the merits of the general proposition contained in it. I should have no objection to hear the Senator at another time, but there is important business that I desire to get up this morning in reference to the public interests, which I think of more consequence than any speech the Senator can make on the subject of slavery. Therefore I raise the point of order, and desire a decision as to whether he is permitted to go on and make a speech on the merits of the proposition, or to go further than merely state the contents of the paper.

Mr. SEWARD. I will submit a motion in regard to the resolutions, which is, that they be printed; and upon that motion, with the leave of the Senate, and I am sure I shall have the consent of the honorable Senator from Georgia, I wish to add a few words to the explanation which I had almost concluded.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair sees that the Senator from Georgia insists upon the point of order. The rules of the Senate require that after the Journal is read the Chair shall call for petitions, and then for reports of standing committees. If the rules are strictly enforced, that would be the order of business. After that, would come resolutions from the Legislatures of States, and any other motions; but it has been usual, without objection, to offer resolutions, petitions, and reports together during the first hour of the meeting of the Senate. The Chair, therefore, did not interrupt the Senator from New York, although, if any Senator had risen and insisted on the presentation of a petition or a report, the Chair would have felt bound to receive it.

Mr. IVERSON. I beg leave to ask the Senator from New York how long he is going to speak.

Mr. SEWARD. Not five minutes.

Mr. IVERSON. If he will confine himself to five minutes, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. SEWARD. I had only to add, on the branch of the subject I was considering, that thirty years from the time when the first measure for emancipation was instituted, there was not left, within the borders of the State of New York, a single slave; that the result of the replacing of slave labor with free labor is seen in the position, character, power, wealth, peace, and prosperity of the State of New York; that I know no community of three million men at this time, and know of none that ever existed, whose situation was more enviable and more prosperous.

Mr. President, in a conversation which occurred between the honorable Senator from Virginia, who is the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and myself, on a kindred subject, that honorable Senator was understood to say that he thought there were indications that the British nation were changing their opinions on the subject of slavery and the slave trade. I, in reply to him, stated that, while I thought I had discovered indications of a change of sentiment on the part of the Government, it did not reach, as I thought, to the British nation. That debate seems to have elicited the attention of the British Cabinet, and they have caused an explanation to be made, which it is due to the interests of society that I should read:

"In a brief debate which occurred in the Senate of the United States in the early part of the present session, Mr. MASON, of Virginia, expressed his gratification at what he understood to be the change now going on in England on the subject of slavery; and even Mr. SEWARD, while denying that there was any change in the English people, was disposed to admit such a change in the Government. This admission has drawn forth an express contradiction from a distinguished and most intelligent member of the late British Cabinet, speaking in behalf of the late Government. At the farewell dinner to Dr. Livingstone, in London, before his departure for Africa, the Duke of Argyle spoke as follows:

"But the main interest was to be found in the deep and abiding feeling cherished by Englishmen on the subject of the extinction of slavery and the improvement of the native tribes of Africa. It had been stated—he was surprised to learn—even by Mr. SEWARD in the Senate of the United States, that a change had come over the opinions of the British Government respecting this question. On the part of her Majesty's Government he was authorized to state that there was no ground for any such assertion, and there was no object on which the noble lord at the head of the Government had shown more consistent steadfastness of purpose than the abolition of the slave trade. Among the motives which had induced her Majesty's Government to assist in fitting out this expedition, the first and foremost was a desire to assist in putting an end to the slave trade, and improving the state of the native tribes of Africa."

I move that the resolutions of the Legislature of the State of New York be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. MASON. The Senator from New York having brought this matter before the Senate, I wish to say a word. I remember perfectly the semi-official conversation which took place between us, across the floor, on a suggestion which I made, and which is the opinion I still entertain, the Duke of Argyle to the contrary notwithstanding. Certainly he knows the purposes of his Government better than any interpretation I could place upon them; but yet the fact remains that the Emperor of France has legalized the slave-trade from Africa, under the guise of importing wild barbarian Africans on an indenture of apprenticeship for a given time; and it is historically true that the attention of the British Government having been called to it, some attempts, whether authorized by the Government or not I do not know, were made on the part of the British Government, either to induce France to abandon that policy or to contravene it, and that the result has been that the Emperor of France has persevered in it, and the Government of England has yielded. My impressions, in which I may be right or may be wrong, were that when France perseveres in that policy of repopulating her now abandoned West Indian possessions with African labor, the Government of England will find itself in a necessary condition to follow it.

Mr. BIGGS. I avail myself of this, the most favorable opportunity I have, for the purpose of making a remark in regard to my colleague, [Mr. REID.] I desire to repeat what I said to the Senate last Monday night a week ago; but which, in consequence of the accumulated debate, has not yet been published. My colleague has been confined by severe indisposition at Richmond for the last two months and a half, and he desired me to say (I ought to have taken occasion to say it yesterday, when the vote was being taken, but I did not then do so,) that if he were here when the bill was pending for the admission of Kansas into the Union, he would have voted with great pleasure for the bill, and his absence has been prevented by indisposition over which he had no control; but I am pleased to state to the Senate that he is now improving.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to print the resolutions of the Legislature of New York.

Mr. KING. I have listened to the allusions of my colleague, and the honorable Senator from Virginia, as to the opinions which the Government of Great Britain may entertain on this subject. It is well known that slavery was introduced into these colonies by the Government of Great Britain; and when originally introduced into Virginia, it was remonstrated against by the people of that colony. I do not, myself, think, whatever respect we may entertain for the intelligence or for the power of that kingdom or its Government, that its opinions should be cited as entitled to influence upon the acts of this country. We are a people who have a Government different from theirs—one in which the sovereignty is with the people. We desire to make labor honorable; and we do not desire to have privileged classes here. Now whatever respect I may entertain for that Government, I would not allow their opinions upon a matter of this kind to have any influence whatever with me, and especially if they were going in such direction as the Senator from Virginia supposes they may now be going. It is a mere return to their first policy, if it be so; but I am happy to hear that there is doubt about that fact, for I should be glad to find all the nations of Christendom disposed to ameliorate and abolish slavery.

The motion to print the resolutions was agreed to; and they were ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. SEWARD presented the petition of P. O. Beebe, praying for the aid of Congress in publishing an analysis of American law, of which he is the author; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Minden, New York, for the enactment of a law granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812, and the widows of such as have died; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Albany, New York, praying that a quarter section of land in the proposed Territory of Arizona may be granted to each actual settler, including the right to the minerals in the soil; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

He also presented the petition of John J. Rink, praying Congress to purchase the right to use certain improvements made by him in the construction of submarine masonry and in shipbuilding; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of a general mercantile relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of William B. Whiting, of the United States Navy, praying for an amendment of the pension and bounty land laws; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. SLIDELL presented a memorial of merchants of New Orleans remonstrating against the repeal of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Findley Patterson, praying to be allowed payment for work done in the erection of the Capitol building at Leocompton, in Kansas, under a contract with the Governor of the Territory, and indemnity for losses sustained in consequence of the suspension of the work; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CHANDLER presented three petitions of citizens of Michigan, praying for the enactment of a general mercantile relief law; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DURKEE presented a memorial of the Legislature of Wisconsin, praying for the enactment of a law which will secure the payment of the amount due to that State arising from the sale of the public lands therein; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. KENNEDY presented a memorial of the Numismatic Society of Philadelphia praying the establishment of a medal department at the Mint of the United States; which was referred to the Committee on the Library.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. HARLAN, it was Ordered, That Benjamin Arnold have leave to withdraw his petition and papers.

Mr. GWIN. I have received a letter from a member of the other House, asking me to have the papers in the case of Joseph J. Petrie withdrawn from the files, and transmitted to him as a member of the House of Representatives for the purpose of presenting them to that body. I find there has been an adverse report made on the claim in the Senate. I state that fact, and ask the privilege of the Senate to withdraw the papers, in order that they may be presented in the House of Representatives.

Mr. STUART. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator if he has any information from that member as to whether there is any additional testimony in the case?

Mr. GWIN. All the information I have is contained in the letter, in which the writer says: "I desire, if nothing definite has been done, that you withdraw all the papers, that I may get them acted on in some way"—I presume, before the House. This gentleman, when the papers were presented some years since, was a citizen of California. He is now a citizen of Illinois. He wishes the papers to go into the hands of his Representative. I was called upon this morning to have the papers transferred to him.

Mr. STUART. I understand the Senator to say that there was an adverse report.

Mr. GWIN. Yes; I make that statement to the Senate in order that they may judge whether they will permit the papers to be withdrawn. It was proper that I should make such a statement.

Mr. STUART. I shall not object under the circumstances; but as a general thing, I think it is bad policy to allow papers to be transferred from one House to the other in this way. I shall make no objection here.

Leave to withdraw the papers was granted.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of J. W. Brown, submitted an adverse report, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the case; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of William F. Russell, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the papers relating to the claim of Captain George E. McClelland's company of Florida volunteers, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Robert A. Wainwright, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMMOND, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Martin Hubbard, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Mary B. Renner, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BROWN, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom were referred the petition of citizens of Washington, District of Columbia, and the resolution of the corporation of Washington, in relation to lighting certain streets in that city with gas; joint resolution of the corporation in relation to opening and grading of Massachusetts avenue; and a memorial of a committee of the levy court for the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, asking for an appropriation for certain roads in said county on certain conditions, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 197) providing for the arrest and return of fugitives from justice in the District of Columbia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph C. G. Kennedy, relative to the salary of the secretary of the census board, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 212) for the relief of Joseph C. G. Kennedy. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the memorial of H. O'Reilly, J. J. Speed, and T. P. Shaffner, have authorized me to submit a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 211) to facilitate communication with the army in Utah. I ought to state that the committee were equally divided in regard to it, and the bill is reported by the courtesy of the members of the committee opposed to the object of it. The bill authorizes the Secretary of War to make a contract for laying down a telegraph line from the frontiers of the State of Missouri to the Territory of Utah. I ask that it be read and the report printed.

The bill was read a first time, and ordered to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

BURLINGTON CUSTOM-HOUSE.

Mr. FOOT submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making an appropriation of the sum of $7,000, to fence, and grade the grounds, and to furnish the buildings erected at Burlington, Vermont, for a custom-house and post office.

Mr. FOOT also submitted a paper on the subject; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

SEIZURE OF BRIG MACEDONIA.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested, if it be in his judgment not incompatible with the public interest, to communicate to the Senate the correspondence between the Government of Chili and that of the United States, and other documents on file in the Department of State, in relation to the seizure by the authorities of Chili, at Litana, in Peru, of the proceeds of the cargo of the brig Macedonia, the property of citizens of the United States.

DIFFICULTIES IN UTAH.

Mr. FITCH submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of suspending the territorial laws of Utah, during the present difficulties in that Territory, and reporting, in lieu of the laws thus suspended, such temporary laws as the present exigency of the Territory requires.

Mr. FITCH. I present a volume of the revised laws of the Territory of Utah, with some manuscript comments showing the difficulty, if not impossibility, of enforcing these laws. I move to refer this to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PUGH. Would it not be better to refer the whole subject to the Committee on Territories? I am apprehensive that that committee may suppose their province has been interfered with.

Mr. FITCH. I do not see how. I think this is strictly a judicial matter.

The papers were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

EXPLANATION.

Mr. HALE. I want the indulgence of the Senate for a moment to make an explanation merely to do justice to the President of the United States. I made this remark in Congress, the other day, on the presentation of a resolution in regard to the Military Asylum:

"The case would be bad enough if it were the public money and the public funds that were thus used; but these men are not dependent on the charities of the Government, for it is their own money of which they are robbed to feast and entertain military officers, the President of the United States, and the Secretary of War."

Everything I said about that Military Asylum is true, and I did not say more than half the truth, but so far as relates to the President of the United States, I want to do him this justice. The President went out there by invitation of the board of officers, and roomed there, but he neither eat salt nor broke bread at the expense of the institution. Every dollar of the expense he was at while he was there, was paid from his own funds. There was not a dollar of the funds of the institution taken for his entertainment. It gives me great pleasure to do this act of justice to the President.

OBITUARY ADDRESSES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred a resolution introduced by the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALLEN] to print and bind the addresses made by members of the Senate and House of Representatives on the occasion of the death of the Honorable James Bell, A. P. Butler, and Thomas J. Rusk, late members of the Senate; to report adversely. It is the belief of the committee that a practice is growing up which, if it has not already gone to an extent that is vicious, certainly will do so. The expense of this printing would be considerable. The fame of these gentlemen will depend upon their acts; any books we may print will not add to it. It is in the adoption of a general rule on this subject, which the committee hope may be adhered to by the Senate, that they report adversely on the proposition to print these obituary addresses. I report the resolution back adversely, and ask that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

Mr. HOUSTON. I regret exceedingly to be compelled to make any remarks on this, or on any subject; but it does seem to me that when it has been the custom heretofore up to this time to notice, in a particular way, events connected with the death of members of this body, it would be as well to continue the practice, and if it is proper that it should cease, a resolution of this body expressive of its purpose to end them should operate prospectively and not retroactively. From various quarters of the country—not confined to my own State, but from other States—I have received applications for the obituary notices of the decease of my late estimable and valued colleague, and I should be extremely gratified if it were in my power to respond pleasantly to those applications by furnishing them with the obituaries requested.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator allow the Chair to interrupt him for a moment? The question is not on adopting the report of the committee. It is now before the Senate, and goes on the Calendar. The question merely is on discharging the committee from the further consideration of the subject, and the report will lie over. The Chair ventures to make the suggestion because he sees other Senators desiring to make reports.

Mr. HOUSTON. I had just stepped into the Chamber. I was not aware that the question was not on the adoption of the report.

Mr. STUART. I suppose the whole report goes over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The whole report goes over; but by general consent, the Chair has been putting the question on discharging committees, at the request of Senators making reports.

Mr. STUART. I think it better that all should go over together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That would be more regular; and if the Senator objects, it will all go over.

Mr. STUART. Yes, sir.

The report lies over.

COMMITTEE SERVICE.

Mr. CLAY. Some weeks since, on the motion of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] my colleague [Mr. FITZPATRICK] was discharged from service upon the Committee on Territories, in consequence of his illness, and I was appointed in his stead. I am glad to see that my colleague has returned to his seat; and I now move that the Senate excuse me from further service on that committee, and that he be reinstated as a member of it.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESENTATION OF A SWORD.

Mr. MASON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 24) authorizing Lieutenant William N. Jeffers to accept a sword of honor from her Majesty the Queen of Spain; which was read twice.

Mr. MASON. This joint resolution is offered in pursuance of a letter from the Secretary of State, in which he informs me that this sword has been for some time at the Department, having been sent by the Queen of Spain, through the minister in London, to the minister here, with a request that it might be accepted. The reason of it is expressed in a letter from the Spanish minister to the Secretary of State.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, MARCH 25, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 82.

"As a due acknowledgment of the very efficient assistance which he gave with the vessel under his command, to the Spanish schooner Cartagena, in the waters of the Parana, on the 26th, 27th, and 28th of October, 1855.

"The undersigned is in like manner ordered by her Majesty to return thanks in her royal name to Messrs. W. L. Powell and E. W. Henry, lieutenants of said steamer, for their coöperation in extending said assistance."

It is a very honorable tribute to this young officer, and I hope the resolution will pass.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded, as in Committee of the Whole, to consider the joint resolution. It was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ADDITIONAL VOLUNTEER REGIMENTS.

Mr. IVERSON. The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 313) to provide for the organization of a regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and to authorize the President to call into the service of the United States four additional regiments of volunteers, have instructed me to report the bill back with sundry amendments. I move to take up the bill now; and I will state the reasons why I make this motion.

I had a conversation with the Secretary of War this morning on this subject, and he desired me to say to the Senate that it was very important to the Government that the question of granting an additional military force should be decided as soon as possible. Every day now is important, and the Administration ought to know what they are to depend upon. This bill, as it came to us from the House of Representatives, proposes to give the Government the right to raise one regiment of Texas rangers for the defense of the frontier of Texas, and four regiments of volunteers to be used in the suppression of the rebellion in Utah, or in guarding the emigrant route, or on the frontiers of the United States, at the discretion of the President. The Administration desire to know what is the disposition of Congress on this subject, in order to take their measures for the exigencies of the service. If volunteer troops are to be allowed, as provided for by this bill, it is important that that power should be granted to the Government as soon as possible, in order that they may proceed to the organization of the regiments, if they shall determine to use in the Utah expedition these four regiments, or any portion of them. It is important, even if they do not intend to use them for the Utah expedition, but intend to use them upon the frontier, because then they can organize them immediately, put them upon the frontier for its protection, and at distant posts, and take the regular troops which are now stationed there, and send them to Utah. It is important, in every point of view, that the Administration should be informed what is the determination of Congress on this question: whether they intend to give any additional troops either in the shape of regulars or volunteers. If Congress deny the Government any power to raise additional troops of any character, then they want to understand that determination, so that they may make such disposition of the present regular Army as the exigencies of the service require. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will take up this bill, and consider the amendments which the Committee on Military Affairs have proposed, which are not very important, and determine the question whether this bill shall be adopted or not in the form in which it came from the House of Representatives, or with these amendments, or any other amendments the Senate may adopt. The amendments of the committee do not change the main features of the bill. All the amendments proposed are in relation to the appointment of quartermasters, commissaries, and surgeons; but that is not a very important matter. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. This being the report of a committee, the Senator from Georgia asks for its present consideration. If there be no objection, it will be taken up.

Mr. HALE. Does it require unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It does.

Mr. HALE. I do not want to delay the Military Committee; but I should really like to have the bill printed, so that we may see what it is. Let it lie over until to-morrow, and let the bill be printed.

Mr. IVERSON. If it be made, the special order for some hour to-morrow, I have no objection; and let the bill be printed, with the amendments.

Mr. HALE. Let the bill be printed, with the amendments.

Mr. GWIN. I shall give way to this bill; but I am very anxious to have the Pacific railroad bill taken up.

Mr. IVERSON. I am happy to hear the Senator from California make that statement. I do not wish to press the consideration of the bill to-day. If Senators desire to read the bill, the original bill is in printed form, and the amendments are not essential. Anybody can understand them in a moment. It is not important, I think, to have the amendments printed, because they are of such character as anybody can understand.

Mr. HALE. Let it lie over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report, at the suggestion of the Senator from New Hampshire, must lie over until to-morrow.

Mr. IVERSON. Cannot the Senate take it up on a motion?

Mr. HALE. Not if there be objection.

Mr. IVERSON. I move that the bill be printed, with the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

KANSAS AFFAIRS.

Mr. GWIN. I call for the special order, being the Pacific railroad bill, which is the first special order on the Calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour having arrived for the consideration of the special orders, the Chair will inform the Senate that the first special order is the motion of the Senator from Illinois to refer so much of the President's annual message as relates to Kansas, to the Committee on Territories; which, I suppose, the Senate may dispose of now, and get it off the Calendar.

Mr. STUART. I suggest to the Senate to vote on that motion now. It is no longer of any importance. Let us get rid of it.

The motion to refer was agreed to.

COMMODORE PAULDING.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next special order is the joint resolution directing the presentation of a medal to Commodore Hiram Paulding.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I move that be continued over until the time when the bill reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations shall come up for consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be postponed by general consent.

Mr. SLIDELL. I ask whether both were not made the special order for the same time?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I had that impression myself.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to address the Senate on that subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is under the impression that the Senator from Louisiana is right, although the Journal does not show it.

PACIFIC RAILROAD—ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The next special order is Senate bill No. 65, being the Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Just before the adjournment of the Senate last evening, the question arose whether the Senate would take up the Pacific railroad bill or the bill for the admission of Minnesota into the Union. The question arose at a late hour, and while the contest between the two bills was pending, the Senate, on motion of the Senator from Maine, adjourned. For myself, while I have no objection to the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill, I am of opinion, that it is but just that the bill for the admission of Minnesota should be first considered. I think it was, in effect, agreed; such has been my understanding, that that question would come up, if not with the bill for the admission of Kansas into the Union, immediately after it. Minnesota has an interest in this very question of the Pacific railroad, and I do not know that there is to be any objection to her admission into the Union now that the Kansas question has been disposed of by the Senate. Perhaps it will occupy very little time; it may lead to no discussion. The bill may pass by unanimous consent. I think it is but just that it should be first considered. I move that the Minnesota bill be taken up, and that the special order be postponed for that purpose.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senate will proceed to consider the business which is now before it in regular order. The Pacific railroad bill has been a special order now for nearly two months. I am in favor of the admission of Minnesota; and whenever that question comes up, I shall vote for it. But I do not think so important a measure as the Pacific railroad bill should be postponed for any other. It has at this session heretofore been postponed for the Army bill, and for the Kansas bill, and now being the first special order regularly reached, I hope it will be considered. The Senate can, by a majority, at any time lay it aside if they choose to take up any other questions. The gentleman who has charge of the Minnesota bill [Mr. DOUGLAS] is not in his seat; and I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will permit the Pacific railroad bill to be acted upon now. Before it is disposed of the Senate can, by a majority, at any time lay it aside and take up the Minnesota bill. My only object is to proceed with the consideration of the railroad bill as soon as possible. It is my duty to insist upon it, as it is a question of vast importance to my State; and I am also charged with this duty as chairman of the select committee that reported the bill. I hope the Senator from Wisconsin will not insist on his motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I ask for the yeas and nays on my motion, in order that we may find out who is for the admission of Minnesota, and who against it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BIGLER. I have said to the Senator from California that I should vote to take up his bill, and I mean to do so, but I am not willing that the Senator from Wisconsin shall lay this vote down as a test, and assume that Senators who vote to take up the bill for the construction of the Pacific railroad are, therefore, against the admission of Minnesota. He has said that he insists on the call for the yeas and nays, in order that he may see on this vote who is for, and who is against, the admission of Minnesota. Now, sir, I am for the admission of Minnesota, and I shall vote for it, and I know of no disposition here to delay it. The Senator from California has endeavored to get his bill considered day after day. His proposition is a reasonable one; and he says, that if the Senate hereafter desires to postpone his bill it will have the power to do so. I shall sustain him in his proposition.

Mr. BRODERICK. I desire to explain the vote which I shall give on this motion. I have been of the opinion all along that it would be an advantage to my colleague and myself to admit Minnesota into the Union before the vote was taken upon the Pacific railroad bill. But, sir, my colleague is the senior Senator from California, and I shall follow him in his vote. My mind has undergone a great change since this question came up some two or three weeks since. I understand that the Representatives from Minnesota, and one of her Senators, since their arrival in Washington, have become converts to Leecompton. They were bitter opponents of that measure when they arrived in Washington, as I understand, but this atmosphere has caused them to change their minds in regard to the admission of Kansas into the Union. As I stated a moment since, I believe both the Senators from Minnesota will vote for a Pacific railroad bill, but I shall follow my colleague, if he insists that the railroad bill shall be first considered, and vote to take it up.

Mr. WADE. As a member of the Committee on Territories, I feel bound to urge upon the Senate the propriety of taking up and passing the Minnesota bill. It received the unanimous approval of the Committee on Territories. There was no member of that committee who could see any objection to the admission of Minnesota into the Union, and, by a unanimous report, we agreed that it ought to be admitted. That report was made some time ago. The Senators and Representatives of Minnesota have been here for a long time. They feel aggrieved; they feel that they have been kept out unreasonably, when there was no one to say that they were not entitled to come here and take their seats. When there is no objection to the admission of a State; when she has complied with the law, and has received the approval of those charged with the investigation of the question as to her right to admission, I think our first act should be to admit her, for it seems to me to be one of the first duties that we owe to ourselves to admit to seats in this body all those who are entitled to them, and to oust all those who are not entitled to seats. That seems to me to be preliminary to all other business. Inasmuch as there was no objection to the admission of this State urged in the committee, and I do not know that there is any reason which can be presented in the Senate against it, I hope the bill will be taken up, and that we shall promptly admit Minnesota into the Union.

Mr. STUART. I have a very strong desire that the Senate should proceed this morning in regard to the consideration of this question, as free as possible from any feelings that may have originated upon questions heretofore. It will be admitted, I think, that the question of admitting a State into the Union is one of the very first character in importance—a subject that is entitled to the earliest consideration of Congress. I think it will also be conceded that in this case the State having organized itself under an act of Congress and come into complete organization, having elected Senators and Representatives, who have been here, as it is known, for some time, the case presents itself in the strongest form, and it may be said fairly to be but an act of common justice to the State of Minnesota to receive her into the Union as early as may be. I hope I am justified, also, in believing that it can be done now without controversy, without any unnecessary consumption of time; and with a view to this I beg to suggest to the honorable Senator from California whether he will not facilitate his bill by allowing this question to come up and be acted upon, as I hope and believe it will be, without any unnecessary consumption of time. I think that he will. Of course I have no desire to intrude my opinions upon him at all. I acknowledge that the bill of which he has charge is an important one; and I think as important to the country as it is to the State of California. It will, however, involve more or less of discussion, as such a subject always has and always will. Without assuming that a vote upon this proposition now would be a test of any Senator's opinions, and without seeing the necessity for any such test, I think we may fairly, deliberately, with pretty much common consent, agree to take up the Minnesota bill and dispose of it. It is with that feeling, and that alone, that I shall vote to postpone the Pacific railroad bill and take up the Minnesota bill, in the belief that it is an act of paramount importance to dispose of it. I hope the Minnesota bill will be taken up.

Mr. GWIN. I have not a particle of objection to the admission of Minnesota. I am in favor of it, and have been in favor of it from the beginning. I believe her Senators are entitled to their seats on this floor now. I have entertained that opinion from the day of the presentation of the credentials of one of them by the Senator from Kentucky, and I endeavored to get the floor on that occasion to say so. I do not wish to damage the measure which I have in charge here, by being pertinacious before the Senate. I know that I occupy a position of very considerable responsibility. The Senator from Georgia has given notice that the necessity for the Army bill is pressing, and I do not wish the measure which I have in charge to be in the way of passing that bill through the Senate, as it is so necessary to the wants of the Government; nor do I wish to put it in the way of another measure that I am entirely in favor of. Now, if the Minnesota bill can be taken up and acted upon forthwith, without unnecessary delay, I shall certainly be disposed to give way for it. If that be the case, I shall not interpose any objection in taking up that bill.

Mr. SEWARD. Let us take it up and try it.

Mr. GWIN. I understand, from Senators around me, that there will be objection to the Minnesota bill. My position is a peculiar one. I am in favor of the admission of Minnesota as a State. I am in favor of passing the Army bill as it has come to us from the House of Representatives, with the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs. Both of those measures require early action, and it seems to me will not occupy much time. At the same time, I am in charge of this other measure, and I shall be held responsible for any mistake on my part by which it may be put in jeopardy. It is now ahead of the Minnesota bill, and the Army bill, and everything else, but I do not desire any pertinacity of mine to damage it.

Mr. PUGH. I promise the Senator from California that he will assist his bill forward, if he will allow us to take up the Minnesota bill. He cannot expect a vote on his bill at once.

Mr. MASON. If the Senator from California is under the impression that by taking up the Minnesota bill, the bill which he has in charge for making the Pacific railroad may be advanced, he may probably find himself mistaken. As I said on a former occasion, I entertain no opposition to the admission of Minnesota into the Union, provided it appears that she is in a condition to be admitted, as far as all the proper requisites of State government are concerned. I shall probably make no opposition to the bill, certainly none because of the fact that she has prohibited slavery or will prohibit slavery within her limits; but we all know that on a late occasion the bill for the admission of Kansas was carried only after a most contested opposition in this Chamber, and conducted almost exclusively upon the ground that African slavery was tolerated within her limits. Now, in that state of things, the question of the admission or rejection of a State being a question of policy, proper policy, by which all Senators are to be governed, they having no right to demand it as a matter of right, I shall not only feel myself at liberty, but called upon, to look into the measure for the admission of Minnesota, as a question of policy purely; and, therefore, I am disinclined to take up this bill, or to act upon it until we see what course may be taken in the other branch of the Legislature on the bill that we have sent to them. I mean to disclaim, in the opposition I shall make to taking up the bill for the admission of Minnesota, any purpose, when it can come before us under other auspices, to resist its admission on any ground now known to me; but if it shall be found to be the will of the majority to take up this bill, I think it will not be so easily passed as the Senator from California anticipates on the suggestion that has just been made.

Mr. SEWARD. I think it will turn out, when we come to vote on this question, that the friends of the Minnesota bill, and the friends of the Pacific railroad bill, are the same persons, or very nearly so. At all events, that is my condition. I am very much in the condition of the captain in the play; I should be very happy with either of these bills, "were t'other dear charmer away." I have got to choose between the two which should come first. I think the interest of the Pacific railroad would be advanced by the passage of the Minnesota bill first. I think it is due to that measure to give the Minnesota bill a hearing, and, if there is to be a question of policy about it, there can be no better time for its consideration than now. But, independent of all these questions, I think, when a State has been invited into the Union, and has matured and completed her proceedings for that purpose and appears at the bar of the Senate, and has been kept in waiting three months, it is time her application should be received, heard, and decided. For these reasons, I shall vote for the motion to take up the Minnesota bill.

There is another consideration; and that is, that, contrary to my opinions and wishes, the Pacific railroad bill was made to yield to the Kansas question, and Minnesota was delayed for the same reason, against my wishes. I think, therefore, that I do but an act of duty in giving my support to the taking up of the Minnesota bill; although, if I shall be overruled, I shall cheerfully go on, and support the Senator from California in his Pacific railroad bill.

Mr. GWIN. I will suggest to the honorable Senator from New York whether he thinks, after the notice I have received that this question is to be discussed for days—I have heard it said for ten days—I shall be justified in agreeing to the railroad bill being set aside to take up another question, which may delay it that length of time? I am in favor of the admission of Minnesota, and have always been in favor of it. I have not a word, by way of debate, to say in regard to it, and I am ready to vote for it; but we have been distinctly notified by Senators that it will be many days before that question can be disposed of; and, under the circumstances, I shall feel bound to insist that the special order be taken up.

Mr. BRODERICK. From the desire of my colleague to take up the Pacific railroad bill, I suppose he is satisfied that there is a majority of the Senate in favor of it. If that is the case, I suppose the sooner we proceed to discuss the measure, and take a vote upon it, the better. But it is well known to my colleague that the two gentlemen claiming seats on this floor from Minnesota are in favor of the Pacific railroad bill. If there is no opposition to the Pacific railroad on the other side of the Chamber, and if all the gentlemen on this side of the Chamber favor it, we can take it up and dispose of it to-day. The only question is, whether there is a majority of the Senate in favor of it. If not, I think that my colleague should allow the two Senators from Minnesota to take their seats on this floor before the vote is taken on the Pacific railroad bill; but, as I said a short time since, I am willing to follow his lead. On him rests the responsibility of the Pacific railroad bill; because, when I, and several other Senators on this floor, attempted to get it up before the Kansas bill was taken from the table, but a feeble opposition was made to the taking up of the Kansas bill. That effort was disposed in three or four minutes, and Kansas was taken from the table and considered, in preference to the Pacific railroad. That measure has been in the Chamber for the last four weeks. I am willing, as I said, to follow the lead of my colleague, for on him rests the responsibility of this act.

Mr. GWIN. I am willing to take it. I have never been afraid of responsibility.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am glad to hear it.

Mr. GWIN. I never will be. As to how the question is going, I do not know more than any other member of the Senate. I do not go around and poll the Senate on this or any other question. The bill is before the country as a great national measure. In favor of it were the three candidates for the Presidency during the last canvass; and their friends and partisans are on this floor. I take it for granted that they represent the public sentiment of the country, which was so unequivocally declared in favor of this measure. I have no objection to the Senators from Minnesota coming here. I do not know that they are in favor of this bill. It is the first time I ever heard they were. I take it for granted they are. Being western Senators, and deeply interested in this measure, I take it for granted they are in favor of it. I shall be glad to see them here. I have no objection to their coming here unless, by giving preference to the bill to admit Minnesota over the one I have in charge, I may put that in a position which will do it harm instead of advancing it. How do we know that these Senators will be here when we pass the railroad bill? There is another tribunal which has to act on the admission of Minnesota as a State—the other House of Congress. From the peculiar nature of their rules they may postpone it for weeks and weeks. I should be very willing to have those Senators here, and I am anxious to have them here. I think they are entitled to their seats now, but I am not disposed to give place to any other measure that will lead to discussion, and delay the consideration of the Pacific railroad bill. I have very little to say in regard to the measure. I propose merely to state its details. I do not want any obstacles thrown in its way. I should prefer to have the vote taken at once, but a question of such vast magnitude we know will be debated, and I do not want it put backwards more than it has been. The delay that has already occurred certainly has not been by any act of mine. I had the bill reported as soon as possible, and made the special order for an early day, and from the first I have opposed its being set aside for any bill except the Army bill. As I have said, I am in favor of the admission of Minnesota. I should like to have her Senators here. But I will take the responsibility of voting not to set aside this bill for any other that will lead to discussion.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It seems to me that this is the very first business which we ought to do. We ought to see that our body is perfectly constituted, so far as we can do so, before we proceed to any action. Now it seems that the trial is to be pressed on, and the judge kept out of doors. These gentlemen are attending here for their seats. They must have felt it something like a wrong, and considered it as a grievance, that they should have gone through all the usual and preparatory forms for admission, and should be kept out merely because the Senate refuses to consider their case. I do hope that we shall proceed at once, and give them a hearing, as a matter of primary consequence. I think the Senator from California will not delay his measure by allowing this bill to proceed. I think there is no disposition to debate it. I have none, and we should act upon it immediately. I hope so.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am sorry to differ with my friend from California on what I know is a very favorite measure of his; but he must allow me to say that I think he is prejudicing the case by insisting that we shall now take up the Pacific railroad bill. I supposed there would be no objection to taking up the bill admitting Minnesota as a State, after we had disposed of the Kansas bill. Until yesterday morning they were together, and my impression was, that so far as the Senate was concerned, they were to come in together; but, for reasons that I thought entirely proper, it was decided to separate them. Now, I hope those who voted to admit Kansas will vote with the like freedom to admit Minnesota. With the Senator from Kentucky, I see no objection to considering this subject, and considering it at once. I want, so far as I am concerned, to silence what I regard as a factious feeling in this country, by dealing justly and alike towards extremes; and, now that we have admitted Kansas, I think there is a great propriety in admitting Minnesota, unless some good, valid, and sufficient reason can be assigned against doing so. At least, I think the admission of Minnesota a matter of more moment than the Pacific railroad bill or any other bill that is now pending before the Senate; and I shall not, by my vote, consent to interpose any measure to the prejudice of the admission of Minnesota. I hope that bill will be taken up. I think it is due to Minnesota; I think it is due to those of us who were, under embarrassing circumstances, friendly to the admission of Kansas, that the Minnesota bill should be taken up and acted on. I hope the Senator from California will not press his motion.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator from Indiana has a very peculiar position in connection with this question, for he happens to be a very important member of the committee who reported the Pacific railroad bill to the Senate; and I believe it was by his casting vote that it came to the Senate. I will not assume the responsibility, when that Senator informs me that I am damaging this bill by pressing it, and therefore I withdraw all objection to taking up the Minnesota bill.

Mr. BRIGHT. Allow me to say that I was not present when it was decided to report the bill referred to by the Senator from California. I am friendly to a bill; whether the bill that has now been reported, I reserve for future consideration; but I am friendly to the general proposition to make a railroad to the Pacific. I consider that, however, under the peculiar circumstances of the case, secondary to admitting Minnesota.

Mr. GWIN. I must correct the Senator. It was his casting vote that brought the bill to the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. The Senator is mistaken.

Mr. GWIN. I am not mistaken. I recollect very distinctly that the bill was ordered to be reported by a vote of five to four in the committee, and it was the Senator himself that gave the casting vote in favor of it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I am quite sure the Senator believes his statement to be correct.

Mr. GWIN. There is a member of the committee sitting by me [Mr. IVERSON] who knows all about it.

Mr. IVERSON. My recollection is—

Mr. KING. I rise to a question of order. I think it is not in order in the Senate to allude to what takes place in committee, or to the action of members of committees. The deliberations of committees are not to be alluded to in this body. I raise this point, not because I have any objection in this case.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is not in order to refer to what takes place in caucus, I will inform the Senator; but it is in order to refer to what takes place in a committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from New York is addressing the Chair. While the Senator from New York is doing so, the voices of Senators on the right of the Chair are quite as audible as that of the Senator from New York. It is very reluctantly that the Chair has to remind the Senate so often of the disturbance of proceedings here; but he feels required to do so as the organ of the body, and it is but respectful to the Senator on the floor. Half a dozen Senators on the right of the Chair were all talking at once, and in audible tones. The Senator from New York will please restate his point of order.

Mr. KING. I make the point that it is not in order in the Senate to allude to doings in committee and to the action of individual members of a committee. I make the point simply that I may understand what are the rules of the Senate upon this subject. I know the point I make is good under the general parliamentary law. I do not raise the point because I have any objection to knowing the opinions of individuals in reference to this measure, or have any feeling on this particular question; but I have noticed some allusions of this sort before in the Senate, and I desire that we may have some understanding as to the rule on the subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Since the present occupant has been in the Chair, he has heard so many allusions in the Senate to what has taken place in committee, that he supposed it to be a usage of the Senate that such references might be made.

Mr. KING. If it is so, very well.

The VICE PRESIDENT. I did not think proper to check it.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is in order to refer to what a committee has done, when the person referred to does not object. I am the only person who can take exception, as I am the one referred to in this case.

Mr. IVERSON. I will state my recollection of what occurred on this particular question in committee. The committee, I think, was composed of nine members. The Senator from California presented his bill, which is now before the Senate. The committee were equally divided—four for the bill, and four against the bill. I think the Senator from Indiana was in favor of the bill, and the chairman gave the casting vote in favor of it. That is my recollection of it. There were four of us against the bill and four in favor of it, including the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Indiana; and the chairman, the Senator from California, then decided the question by voting in favor of the bill. It was brought in in that way.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not like to say anything on this point; but I confess my recollection is clearly with the Senator from Indiana. I think he was not there, and I gave the casting vote myself. That is my recollection; but, with the counter-recollection of other Senators, I will only say, in deference to theirs, that this is my impression.

Mr. HUNTER. This shows the propriety of the point of order raised by the Senator from New York. He is undoubtedly right. Gentlemen have no right to refer in the Senate to what has taken place in committee. The committee have no journal, and their proceedings are not published.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is very clear on another point of order: that all these remarks are entirely apart from the question before the Senate—which is the motion to postpone.

Mr. BRIGHT. It is a matter of very little consequence; indeed, of no consequence so far as regards the point under consideration. The Senator from California may be correct. My recollection is, that I was not present at the time the committee met to give the final vote on reporting the bill; but let that pass. The question is, whether we shall now take up the Minnesota bill? I hope the Senator from California will, and I understand he does, withdraw his objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The immediate question before the Senate is on the motion to postpone the Pacific railroad bill with a view to take up the Minnesota bill. On that the yeas and nays have been ordered. By unanimous consent the call may be withdrawn.

Mr. MASON. I object to the call of the yeas and nays being withdrawn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I wish to make a single statement in explanation of the vote I shall give on this occasion. I understand that the Minnesota bill was reported to this body before the bill admitting Kansas into the Union, and an effort was made to take it up. The President then sent the Kansas constitution, with an accompanying message, and that was referred to the Committee on Territories. The committee reported in a short time the bill for the admission of Kansas, which was taken up by the Senate, and it was agreed that Minnesota and Kansas should come into the Union together. That was the understanding up to the last moment of action upon the Kansas bill. They were then separated, no doubt for good and substantial reasons. Minnesota was left on the table, and Kansas was brought into the Union, so far as the action of this body was concerned. Both are States applying for admission into the Union, and it was intended to bring them in together. I acted with that understanding. One has been brought in, so far as the action of the Senate is concerned, and the other has been left out. I intend to act in good faith; and I mean to vote for the admission of Minnesota. At the same time, I say to the Senator from California that I will give him all proper facilities for getting his railroad bill before the Senate at a proper time. I have said this much merely to explain the reason why I shall vote now for taking up the Minnesota bill.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Bright, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Evans, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, and Wade—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Polk, Sebastian, Sillid, Wright, and Yulee—16.

ADMISSION OF MINNESOTA.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. 86) for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is as follows:

Whereas, an act of Congress was passed February 26, 1857, entitled "An act to authorize the people of the Territory of Minnesota to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" and whereas, the people of said Territory did, on the 29th day of August, 1857, by delegates elected for that purpose, form for themselves a constitution and State government, which is republican in form, and was ratified and adopted by the people, at an election held on the 13th day of October, 1857, for that purpose, in pursuance of said act of Congress: Therefore, Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the State of Minnesota shall be one, and is hereby declared to be one, of the United States of America, and admitted into the Union on an equal footing with the original States in all respects whatever.

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives, in Congress, as the population of said State, according to the census authorized by the act approved February 26, 1856, shall show it to be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation, and no more.

Mr. PUGH. I wish to offer to the bill an amendment similar to the one I proposed to the Kansas bill yesterday:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the admission of the State of Minnesota, as hereinbefore provided, all the laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same power and effect within that State as in other States of the Union; and the said State is hereby constituted a judicial district of the United States, within which a district court, with like powers and jurisdiction as the district court of the United States for the district of Iowa, shall be established. The judge, attorney, and marshal of the United States for the said district of Minnesota, shall reside within the same, and shall be entitled to the same compensation as the judge, attorney, and marshal of the district of Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the second section of this bill fixing the representation of the new State of Minnesota in the House of Representatives. I agreed to that section as it is presented in this bill, in order to get a majority of the committee to concur in the bill. That section allows to Minnesota one Representative, and as many more as the census shall show her to be entitled to. The census was not fully returned at the time the bill was reported, and I am not aware that the full returns have yet been received; but I have such evidence, unofficial, informal, as satisfies me that the census of Minnesota was not fairly taken. At the time the committee reported the bill, the returns showed about one hundred and forty thousand people, with seven or eight counties more to be heard from; yet I believe Minnesota had a much larger population than that. She has elected three members of Congress, and if I could, I should have allowed her the three. I had, however, to concur in the section as it is, in order to obtain the assent of a majority of the committee to the bill. I would now prefer to strike out that section entirely, and leave the House of Representatives to determine the number of Representatives to which she is entitled. I move to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. GREEN. I shall vote against striking out this section for one single reason. I regard it as the duty of Congress to fix the representation to which a State may be entitled; not the House of Representatives, but Congress. I am willing that a definite number be fixed; but to strike out the section entirely, and leave it to the mere option of one branch of Congress, does not, in my opinion, come up to the discharge of the constitutional duty which imposes it upon Congress to fix the number to which the State may be entitled. The census returns show about one hundred and forty-six thousand inhabitants. I have the evidence in my drawer, and it can be presented at any time. It is very clear to me that the State ought to have at least two Representatives. If from the returns subsequently received the State is entitled to three, I am perfectly willing she should have three; but I do not think we ought to leave it a blank for the House of Representatives to fix just as they please. Congress may fix the representation to which a State is entitled, except so far as the Constitution fixes it. The Constitution says they shall have at least one. That is fixed. Whenever they are to have more than one, Congress must say what the number shall be, either by establishing a rule, or naming the number.

Mr. BIGGS. I desire to ask the Senator from Illinois, if he has obtained information in regard to the census, what, in his opinion, is the probable amount of the population of Minnesota at this time?

Mr. DOUGLAS. If I take the census as a guide, my recollection is that it shows about one hundred and thirty-six thousand returned, and seven or eight counties to hear from. I think the committee came to the conclusion that, if the remaining counties contained the same proportion of people to voters, there would be between one hundred and forty-five and one hundred and fifty thousand, according to the census.

Mr. GREEN. Yes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I am under the impression, from unofficial, verbal information, that the census was not fairly taken, but to what extent I cannot say.

Mr. SEWARD. Unfair which way?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I understand that the census-takers did not take the names of all the population, and the population is much larger than the census would indicate. That is my impression.

If the Senator from North Carolina will pardon me, I will make a remark here on another branch of the subject. One motive I have in moving to strike out the section is this: Minnesota has elected three members. If we admit the State without fixing any number, the question is how to determine who was elected, and whether it does not exclude the entire representation of the State? Three have certificates. If Minnesota be admitted with one or with two, the question is whether any one or any two of the three already elected can take their seats; and if so, which one or two? The point is, therefore, whether we are not bound either to take the three or to leave them all out under the circumstances. I hardly see how the House of Representatives is to determine which of the three to admit; and seeing that difficulty to arise on the point, I move to strike out the whole section, and leave the House to determine the question for itself. The population, as far as returned, as furnished to me by the Senator from Missouri, is one hundred and forty-two thousand, with six counties wanting, which would bring it up probably to about one hundred and fifty thousand people.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Illinois be good enough to inform me whether there was any provision in the enabling statute authorizing the election of members of the House of Representatives?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I do not distinctly recollect. My impression is that the provision in the enabling statute was the same as in this bill; that she should have one representative, and such additional ones as the census ordered by that statute should show that she was entitled to. That census shows that she is entitled to one and a fraction; and the question is, how can you give one for the fraction, if you construe that statute literally? That is my impression of the enabling act, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. MASON. It seems to me that the act of the Territory of Minnesota, in electing Senators and Representatives to Congress before they could do so—and they could not do so until they were a State of this Union—was a great irregularity. It was done in the instance of the Territory of California, and Congress, as I thought very improvidently, sanctioned it, by admitting those who had been thus elected. But if the people of the Territory of Minnesota have placed themselves in that position, electing three Representatives, without knowing, or without inquiring, even, from the census, what number they were entitled to, it is an embarrassment from which I do not see that Congress can relieve them. These three gentlemen have an equal right, if they have any right at all. I do not know how the question of selection between them could be determined. I have no idea that Congress could determine it. Minnesota is entitled to but one Representative; for whatever the fraction may be, it is not large enough to entitle her, under the existing apportionment, to another Representative.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will state, on refreshing my memory by talking with the Senator from Missouri, that the enabling act did not provide a Representative for any fraction. It provided that she should be entitled to one member, and such additional ones as the population returned, in the census should show her to be entitled to under the existing apportionment, not giving any for a fraction.

Mr. MASON. Then, under the existing apportionment, she would be entitled to but one Representative.

Mr. GREEN. The constitution of Minnesota has this provision, section nine, article sixteen:

"For the purposes of the first election, the State shall constitute one district, and shall elect three members to the House of Representatives of the United States."

They fix the number by their own law; and if we say nothing on the subject they are entitled to them under their constitution.

Mr. MASON. I think we should restrict them to one Representative; because, under the existing apportionment, their fraction is not large enough to entitle them to more than one; but which Representative that should be is a matter that I think the Senate ought not to undertake to determine. It is a matter that seems to me belongs properly either to the House of Representatives, or to the State of Minnesota when it shall be admitted, to determine which of the three shall be that one.

Mr. BIGGS. The object of my inquiry of the honorable Senator from Illinois was, to determine as to the motion I should make for the amendment of this section before it is proposed to be stricken out, as I suppose it will be proper to amend the section before the question is taken upon striking it out. I concur with the Senator from Missouri, that we ought to determine in this bill the number of Representatives to which the State is entitled in the House of Representatives, and I am disposed to be liberal to this new State. If you take her population now, to determine the number of Representatives to which she is entitled, of course she has an advantage over the States whose apportionment was made on the basis of the last census; but I am willing to give her that advantage, and also to give her the additional advantage of a liberal apportionment of Representatives, in admitting her into the Union. I will, therefore, move that the second section be amended by striking out the word "one," in the second line, and inserting "two;" and by striking out the rest of the section, after the words "House of Representatives of the United States," which provides for such additional Representatives as the population of the State may entitle her to. We then settle the matter; and by a liberal application of the facts, as we understand them, give her two Representatives in the House of Representatives. I move this amendment to the section, before the question is taken on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike it out.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will state the facts of this case as I understand them. By the enabling act it was provided that if Minnesota decided to form a constitution and State government, a census should then be taken; and she should be entitled to such number of Representatives, upon her admission, as that census should show her to be entitled to according to the present rule of apportionment. When the convention met and decided to go on and make a constitution, the Secretary of the Interior, being informed that that contingency had happened, issued his orders for taking the census; and the proper officers, the marshals and the deputy marshals, went on taking it. In the mean time the convention proceeded to make the constitution; and in that constitution, without waiting for the result of the census to transpire, they provided that the people should elect three Representatives to Congress, and declared the whole Territory to be one district for that purpose, and they went on and made the election before the taking of the census was completed. They also proceeded to submit the constitution to the people, who ratified it, and held on the same day an election for members of the State Legislature. The Legislature met, and chose Senators to Congress.

When I examined this subject in the committee, it appeared to me at the first blush that if Minnesota were admitted under her constitution, without saying anything in regard to the number of her Representatives, it would be a mere question for the House of Representatives to settle the number, and to decide which of the persons already elected should be Representatives in that House by virtue of the enabling act, which declared that she should be entitled to the number which the present apportionment would give her on the taking of the census. On more full reflection, however, I came to the conclusion, and I believe the committee agree with me in this opinion, that inasmuch as they have put into their constitution a provision for three Representatives to Congress for the time being, they will be entitled to have those three Representatives if we admit them under that constitution without any qualification. It was to exclude any such conclusion that the second section was inserted in the bill. It was ingrafted into it with the view of carrying out the provision of the enabling act, and give them the number of Representatives to which their census may entitle them, and no more, and to rebut the presumption which might arise that we agreed to let them have three members, which presumption probably would arise if it was not rebutted by some such provision as this.

The census returns have fully come in, except for seven or eight counties, and in regard to those the committee made an estimate, by taking the number of votes in those counties and estimating the same proportion of people to each voter as in the rest of the Territory; and on this basis we came to the conclusion that Minnesota has between one hundred and forty-five thousand and one hundred and fifty thousand people. The present ratio of representation is ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty; Minnesota, therefore, has sufficient population for one Representative, and she has a fraction larger than half the ratio required for another. Now, it is suggested as the ground of the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, that that census was perhaps short of the truth. I think the fair presumption from the facts within my knowledge is rather the other way. I believe they counted many men in that census as inhabitants of Minnesota, whose families remain in New England to this day. Those persons have gone there with a view to settle—they are making arrangements to settle—but that is not taking up a residence. I take it that a man's residence is where his family resides, whatever his ultimate purposes may be. The fact is, I believe, that that census in all probability is larger than the true number of residents in Minnesota. At any rate, I do not know how we can obtain by mere suggestion, estimation, or guess, as a Yankee would call it, what should be the rule of our duty, when we have official information before us. When we take the returns before us and make a liberal allowance for the seven or eight remaining counties, by estimating their population according to the number of votes they cast, I think we do all that we can as a basis for our action; and on that basis they are entitled to one Representative, and go half way towards another.

The question pending now I understand is on the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to the second section. I have no very great objection to the amendment, though I think two Representatives are more than Minnesota is entitled to; but I do not see that the amendment will help the matter at all. As truly stated by the Senator from Illinois, and the Senator from Missouri, the trouble is, that if Minnesota cannot have three members she cannot have any at the present time, but there must be a new election.

Mr. PUGH. Why cannot the House of Representatives take the highest?

Mr. COLLAMER. The people have voted for three men. The people have never decided which two or which one of the three they would have, if they had to select only one or two. The House of Representatives, in admitting any of them, will have to make an election for them. They will have to select from the three who have been elected by the people; and I think they have no power to make any such election as that, any more of two members than of one. I do not know which of these men had the highest number of votes, or whether there was any difference between them in that respect, nor do I think that any criterion at all. That might depend on a man's location. If the people were to elect two members, they might locate them in different sections of the State. I do not see how it is possible to determine anything any more with two members than with one. If we strike out this section, I presume the whole three must be admitted, because the constitution of Minnesota provides for three members of Congress; and if we admit them with that constitution, and exclude no conclusion to the contrary, we provide for admitting the three members. That is evidently improper, and I do not know but that it is unconstitutional; for we have no power to give Representatives disproportioned to the different States. I think, therefore, the section should not be stricken out. As to the amendment, I do not think it will help the matter at all; but it will still require a new election, as much so as if only one Representative were provided for. Whether you allow one Representative or two Representatives, the matter will have to be sent back to the people for them to make an election of the true number to which they are entitled.

Mr. PUGH. I ask for a division of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I believe the State of Minnesota is entitled to three Representatives. I think so from information I have. I shall vote for the first part of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, striking out "one" and inserting "two," and then I shall vote against the second part of his amendment, so as to leave the House of Representatives, on such testimony as they may receive, to decide whether or not Minnesota shall be entitled to one, two, or three Representatives.

Mr. BAYARD. I believe the pending motion is to strike out the second section of the bill reported by the committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that the pending question is on the motion of the Senator from North Carolina, to amend the second section by striking out the word "one" and inserting "two;"

and by striking out the residue of the section after the word "Representatives," so that the clause shall read "that said State shall be entitled to two Representatives in the Congress of the United States."

Mr. BAYARD. My objection will be precisely the same to that amendment as it would be to striking out the whole section. The enabling act for Minnesota made the proper provision under the laws of the United States. Every State is entitled, in the House of Representatives, to a proportionate representation, according to the principles of the Constitution, not to an arbitrary number; and therefore, when a new State is coming in, as her population could not be known at the time of the preceding general decennial enumeration, it is always proper to provide for ascertaining her population. Congress made that provision in the Minnesota enabling act. Section four of that act provided that, in the event of the convention adopting a constitution, the Secretary of the Interior was to cause a census of the inhabitants to be taken; and that the State should be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives as the population should, according to the census, show her to be entitled to upon the present ratio of representation. That is just and fair. Whatever the State is entitled to on that basis, of course she ought to have, and no more. The whole difficulty has arisen from a perhaps not unnatural eagerness on the part of the new State to act before she was in a condition to act, and to act beyond her power. In the schedule to her constitution, Minnesota has undertaken, in violation of the very law under which she organized her constitution, to claim representation in Congress on a different basis from what the law allows her. It is for Congress, not for a State, to prescribe the basis under the Constitution of the United States. Not only has she done that, but she has, in article sixteen of her constitution, violated the existing law of the United States, which requires elections for members of Congress to be by single districts. She has provided that, "for the purposes of the first election the State shall constitute one district, and shall elect three members to the House of Representatives of the United States."

The general law requires that the elections of members of Congress shall be by single districts. Minnesota has chosen as her first act to annex to her constitution a provision making the State into one district instead of three, if she is entitled to three members. This clause is wrong in all respects. In truth, it ought to form no part of the constitution. I agree with the honorable Senator from Vermont, that this clause being there, if we admit the State under this constitution, it will be considered as an assent to the clause, unless we insert some provision excluding that conclusion. As I do not think Minnesota had a right to exercise any such power, I cannot vote for striking out or amending this section of the bill, as now proposed. She is no more entitled to two Representatives than to three, on any evidence we have. The bill reported by the committee gives her fairly all that she is entitled to; that is, one Representative certainly, to which every State is always entitled, and any additional number that, by the ratio of representation, she is entitled to for her population. That leaves the rest legitimately to the House of Representatives. It belongs to them, after we have declared what number of members the State is entitled to under the ratio, to determine as to the election of their own members, and whom they will admit. Whether they will admit the persons already elected or not, is a question for them, and not for us. Congress is to prescribe what the representation shall be in the admission of a new State, not the State herself, neither House of Congress alone. Then, as to who has been elected, and whether the election has been in accordance with the right to which the State is entitled after her admission is a question for the House in which the case arises to determine for itself.

I submit then that the section, as reported by the committee, ought to stand, and that the objection to fixing two Representatives is just as strong as to fixing three. According to the enabling act, Congress is to give to Minnesota the number of Representatives to which her population entitles her. There is no evidence before us under the law, there is no census which shows that she is entiled, according to the ratio, to more than one Representative. If she is entitled to more than one and has elected them under the terms of the law, it will be a simple matter of calculation when they go to the House of Representatives whether that House will admit one or two, and the right will be fixed properly by the terms of the law itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio has asked for a division of the question upon the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. The Chair thinks it is susceptible of division. The first question, therefore, will be on striking out "one" and inserting "two" before the word "Representative."

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. FITCH. The question, as stated by the Chair, is on striking out "one" and inserting "two." Cannot that be divided so as to let us vote simply on striking out?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not in order, according to the rules of this body, to divide a motion to strike out and insert.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 33; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Biggs, Bright, Brown, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Jones, Pugh, Sebastian, Stuart, and Wright—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Evans, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—33.

So the first branch of Mr. Biggs's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BIGGS. The Senate having rejected the first part of the amendment, my object cannot be attained by the rest of the proposition; and therefore I withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Illinois to strike out the second section of the bill.

Mr. BIGGS. I suppose the object of that motion is to allow the State of Minnesota three Representatives in the other House, under her constitution. That will be the effect of striking out that section, and I am therefore opposed to it.

Mr. MASON. I propose, if it be in order, to amend the section by striking out all after the word "Representative," the effect of which will be to entitle the State to one Representative only. I may be wrong, because I have not had sufficient time to reflect on it; but I do not see how the problem can be worked out to entitle this State to more than one Representative under what is contained in the second section. The provision is, that "the said State shall be entitled to one Representative, and such additional Representatives in Congress as the population of said State, according to the census authorized by the act approved February 26, 1857, shall show it to be entitled to according to the present ratio of representation." The present ratio of representation does not assign any number to any fraction of the unit prescribed by the law. The mode of ascertaining the apportionment in the law to which I have just adverted, is by first determining what shall be the whole number of Representatives, which was fixed at two hundred and thirty-three, and then it was required that the Secretary of the Interior, after ascertaining the entire population to be represented, should divide that by the number of Representatives. The law declares—

"That the product of such division, rejecting any fraction of a unit, if any shall remain, shall be the ratio or rule of apportionment."

And then it provides further that—

"The Secretary of the Interior shall ascertain the representative population of each State, and divide the whole number of representative population of each State by the ratio already determined by him as above directed, and the product of this last division shall be the number of Representatives apportioned to such State under the then last enumeration: Provided, That the loss in the number of members, caused by the fractions remaining in the several States on the division of the population thereof, shall be compensated for by assigning to so many States having the largest fractions one additional member each for its fraction as may be necessary to make the whole number of Representatives two hundred and thirty-three."

I do not see, therefore, how the rule provided for in the second section of this bill can be worked out, or how it can be competent for the House of Representatives, to whom it would be left, to allow, according to the rule prescribed by the existing law, to this State more than one Rep-representative. There is none assigned to any particular fraction. This condition of things is brought about by the necessities, I suppose, that are imposed on a new State where it has not a population which will assign to it under the existing law a certain number of Representatives, equal to what may have been assigned to the States in the Union at the time the apportionment was made proportionate to its population; and that we can only get at the result legitimately and constitutionally, by assigning to this State for the present but one Representative. I move, therefore, to strike out the residue of the section.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I concur with the Senator from Virginia that under the bill as it now stands the House of Representatives would assign but one Representative to Minnesota. As I stated before, I agreed to that section in committee as a matter of necessity, in order to get permission to report the bill at all. I desired to give Minnesota the whole three members she has elected. If I could not get that, I desired to give her two, and therefore voted for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. My object, in moving to strike out the entire section, is to give her three. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia will certainly fix it at one. It is unnecessary to argue it. The Senate understands the question.

Mr. MASON. I do not exactly understand the Senator from Illinois. As I am informed, the population of this Territory, ascertained under the census directed by the law of 1857, so far as it has been ascertained, would not entitle her to two Representatives, unless she should have a fractional part of a unit represented. Do I understand the Senator from Illinois to say that his purpose is to give to that State a larger number of Representatives in proportion to its population than is assigned to the other States under the Constitution; or that he would fix it at three, regardless of whether, under the apportionment which is fixed by the Constitution, she would be entitled to only two, and thus make a distinction in favor of this State?

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will answer the Senator very frankly. When I reported the bill some years ago to admit Texas into the Union, we had no official evidence which warranted the belief that she had population enough for more than one member of Congress; yet there was unofficial evidence such as left the impression on our minds that she had more than that, and her population was increasing very rapidly, and Congress concluded to act on the best information they had, which was satisfactory to each member, though not official, and we allowed Texas two members of Congress. So in the case of California, the official returns would not have justified the allowance of more than one member, but we had unofficial verbal information such as to satisfy members that probably she was entitled to two. It was a very large new State, and we thought we should be liberal towards her, and we allowed her two members. I would act on the same rule with Minnesota. While technically, under the law, she would be entitled to only one member, yet the official evidence shows that she has sufficient population for one, and more than a moiety of the number required for another. For this reason I voted to allow her two members. I have had evidence which satisfies me that the census was not fairly taken, and that a large part of the population were excluded. Under that state of the case, I believe there is in Minnesota population more than enough for two members of Congress, and therefore I am in favor of allowing three. I do not think she has quite enough population for three, but she certainly has more than enough for two. I have voted for two; I shall vote for three; in other words, I shall vote for the highest number, not exceeding three, that I can get. I act on that principle.

Mr. MASON. The actual number provided for in the apportionment as the ratio of representation is ninety-three thousand four hundred and twenty. Then to entitle a State to two Representatives, if we are to be governed by the rule, she must have one hundred and eighty-six thousand eight hundred and forty inhabitants. The census, as far as taken, shows, I understand, one hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. BENJAMIN. One hundred and thirty-six thousand.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The subsequent returns show one hundred and forty-two thousand, with six counties to be heard from; and estimating the population in those counties according to the vote given, we should have the whole number one hundred and forty-nine or one hundred and fifty thousand, according to the census.

Mr. MASON. That is in the whole Territory.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes, according to the census.

Mr. MASON. Then one hundred and fifty thousand is the maximum population of Minnesota, according to the actual returns, and from a computation or estimate that, I suppose, has been liberally made. I understand the Senator from Illinois, in providing for the admission of this northwestern State, to say that because, in the case of Texas, Congress assigned two members, without having any official returns of what the population was, and allowing each Senator or member of the House of Representatives to determine for himself, by such estimate as he could form, what it was; and because, in the case of California, on conjectural estimate alone, two members were allowed to that State, he, in this case, with official information that there is not a population in Minnesota that will entitle this State to two Representatives, is prepared to give her three; and the reason for it, if I understand him correctly, is that he does not believe the census returns were accurately taken.

Well, now, Mr. President, we have a rule of the Constitution, one that is most important to preserve the equality of these States, and that is, that in the popular branch, political power shall be wielded in proportion to numbers, ascertained in the mode provided by the Constitution, and we have a law to carry that out. I would submit, then, with the great respect which I bear to the honorable Senator and his position here, whether it is not rather too liberal to say that in affecting political power in the popular branch, he will feel himself at liberty to repudiate and disclaim information provided by law, and given under the sanctions of law, in order to concede a large political weight in the popular branch to a State proposing to come in than would be conceded either by the laws or the Constitution? I cannot see, I confess, any manner by which we can, as at present informed, allow this new State more than one Representative, without doing it in flagrant disregard both of the Constitution and the laws of the land.

Mr. GREEN. I think the Senator from Virginia is a little mistaken, because the enabling act, as we call it, is not obligatory upon the present Congress. The enabling act made a certain provision. That enabling act said Minnesota should have one member, and such others as the census should show her to be entitled to; but that enabling act is not the law to govern this Congress. It was a promise and a pledge to the people of Minnesota, and they have a right to insist that we shall come up to it; but we have a right to go beyond it. The evidence before us is this: the census is imperfectly taken, and I have here letters, received by the Secretary of the Interior, showing that several of the marshals refused to take the census because the compensation was not enough to pay their expenses. I have evidence more than that: one of the marshals who had taken the census, when he ascertained what his compensation would be, threw the returns in the fire and burnt them up. We have census returns of one hundred and forty-six thousand, and other counties not heard from, that would swell the number up, according to the same rate, to more than one hundred and fifty thousand.

Mr. BAYARD. Is any return of this made to Congress?

Mr. GREEN. I have the evidences in my drawer. Part of them I presented to the Senator from Illinois. Now we know that the vote cast for the election of State officers was forty thousand four hundred and twenty-two. We have the census of certain counties, and the vote of certain counties. Strike the average to see how many inhabitants there are to the voter, and you will find it to be six inhabitants to a voter. Multiply the forty thousand four hundred and twenty-two by six, and you have got more than two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants. We know the census was taken imperfectly. The evidence is before us; the Secretary of the Interior has received letters showing that fact. As the census is imperfect, as we have other evidence bearing on the point, as it tends to prove, and, in the absence of anything conflicting with it, does prove, that Minnesota has two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants, to limit her simply to one member, as though she had but ninety-three thousand inhabitants would be unjust. I am not able to talk on this subject. My lungs are worn out; my system is exhausted; and all I can do is to present this simple point: first, that the census returns, the evidence shows, were imperfect, and the marshals were not able to take it; some of them, in consequence of the inadequacy of the pay, burnt up the census returns after they had taken them.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator will allow me to ask him a question? Does he know how these marshals were paid for taking the names? Were they paid per capita or by the day?

Mr. GREEN. They were paid according to the rate of proportion adopted, I think, on the motion of Senator Underwood, of Kentucky.

Mr. MASON, and others. "The square root." [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN. I know they all said it was so inadequate that they could not afford to travel over a large extent of country for the few cents of compensation provided. We do know, however, that a certain number of votes were cast, and we also know that the average of population to the votes returned is about six to one, and that will give us over two hundred and forty thousand inhabitants. On that I feel justified in acting inasmuch as I am not bound by the prior action.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is very evident that we cannot dispose of this bill to-day. There are various executive messages that ought to be considered, and I move now that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, March 24, 1858.

The House met at twelve o'clock, m.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boccock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 306, to supply deficiencies in the appropriation for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858; upon which Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, was entitled to the floor.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been my disposition heretofore not to engage in this debate, I feel constrained at this time, in view of the speech of my honorable colleague [Mr. BLAIR] yesterday, to depart from that rule. He has attempted, by his speech here yesterday, as well as heretofore, to inaugurate a new policy in the State which he and I in part represent. When I entered the Congress of the United States as a Representative from Missouri, I expected to meet opposition to our policy from Representatives of the northern States. I expected to hear, and came prepared to hear, such arguments from gentlemen whose education and whose bias, from being reared up under different institutions, would naturally lead them to oppose the institution of slavery. But I did not expect ever to hear any gentleman from a southern State, raised and educated and living under our institutions, assuming a position of antagonism to the interests of the South, throwing the weight of his voice and influence against them, and endeavoring to shed a blight over the country.

Mr. Chairman, that gentleman indicated, in his speech yesterday, his purpose to effect one of two objects, either of which would bring direct destruction on the State he in part represents. One of those purposes is to establish the principle of emancipation in the State of Missouri, and in the South. Now, by the constitution of the State of Missouri, its Legislature is prohibited from passing any law emancipating slaves until they first pay the owners, or get the consent of the owners. The provision is as follows:

"The General Assembly shall not have power to pass laws:

"1. For the emancipation of slaves without the consent of the owners; or without paying them, before such emancipation, a full equivalent for such slaves so emancipated."

Sir, as I remarked, the gentleman's policy tends to one of two things: either to emancipate slaves in the State of Missouri by first obtaining the consent of the slaveowners, or providing means to pay the slaveowners the equivalent for the slaves; or else to override the constitution and act the agrarian in full, by striking down the liberties of the people whom he in part represents—

Mr. BLAIR. Will my colleague allow me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. No, sir; I do not yield the floor. It is not the usage here to do so.

Sir, as I have said, the constitution of Missouri provides that no slave shall be emancipated by the Legislature unless a just equivalent be paid to the owner. How many slaves are there in Missouri? I assert that there are now over one hundred thousand. The national census shows that, from 1810 up to 1850, there has been a gradual increase of slaves, in proportion to the increase of the white population, and as great as that of any other State. We now have over one hundred thousand slaves. These slaves, at a fair average valuation, are worth $500 a head. What does he propose to do? To emancipate them, in the face of that provision in the constitution that slaves shall not be emancipated without the consent of their owners, or without first paying for them a fair valuation? Is he proposing to afflict his constituents and mine with a debt? Is he attempting to ingraft upon that State a policy that shall bring her into debt between fifty and sixty million dollars? Where is he to get the money? Or, is he attempting to carry out an agrarian policy that shall strike down private and vested rights, irrespective of constitutional law? In examining the census returns of that State, I find these statistics:

In 1810 Missouri contained.....	3,010 slaves.
1820.....	10,222 "
1830.....	55,081 "
1840.....	58,240 "
1850.....	87,422 "

Now, by the laws of Missouri, we take the census every four years for State purposes; and I assert that there are, according to those census returns, at this time from one hundred thousand to one hundred and ten thousand slaves in the State of Missouri.

And now I propose to show what will be the consequence of inaugurating the policy in that State which my colleague from St. Louis proposes to enforce. By the estimate I have stated, these one hundred thousand slaves, at an average value of $500 a head, are worth to-day $50,000,000. The State could only raise the money to pay for them by the issue of State bonds. The bonds of the State are now worth 87½ cents on the dollar. In order to pay the $50,000,000, bonds to the amount of $56,500,000 will have to be issued. The interest on these bonds would amount to $3,390,000. Suppose these bonds are issued for twenty-five years, to be paid off in that time, making the average annual payments of $2,260,000 principal, which must be paid by the people of Missouri, and in addition thereto $3,390,000 of interest, which makes a total of $5,650,000 annually.

But, sir, that gentleman set out in his argument by saying that there was a slave oligarchy in this country, and that that slave oligarchy had entered into a conspiracy, in the North and in the South, for the purpose of striking down free labor, and by this power ruling the country. I ask that gentleman if he does not form a part of that slave oligarchy? Is he not a slaveholder in the State of Missouri? Does not he derive his subsistence, in part, from the toil and labor of those slaves? Why, then, is he here to perform the ungrateful duty to his constituents of striking down, by his voice and his power, the peace and prosperity of the people of the State which he in part represents? Why did he not put himself into the breach, and show his own philanthropy by liberating his own slaves, before he undertook to charge his constituents and mine with forming a part of a slave oligarchy? Mr. Chairman, it is humiliating to me to see a Representative in this House from the State of Missouri, representing slaveholding constituents, who can find no other employment in the councils of the nation than to defame his constituents. It is humiliating to me to find a colleague on this floor, representing in part the State from which I hail—a State whose prosperity has been unequalled, whose resources are inexhaustible, whose population is increasing as rapidly as that of any State in this Union—I say it is humiliating to me to see a Representative of that gallant and glorious State come here to strike down her energies, and casting a blight upon her prosperity.

My constituents are deeply interested in this question. I represent a proud and gallant constituency; it is a rural district; they have their farms and their cottages; they have their slaves and their domestic circles, where peace and prosperity reign; and when I see a policy attempted to be ingrafted, by a representative of a slave State, the tendency of which is to place daggers in the hands of our slaves, as well as torches to burn down our dwellings, power to insult our wives and children, and to break down the prosperity of my State, I should be recreant to the duties I owe to my constituents if I were to remain silent.

But, sir, that gentleman was not content with assailing the institutions of his own State, of his own constituents, and of mine, which I have the right to protect, but he charges that there is a combination between the Executive and the Supreme Court of the United States. Sir, that court is so high in the affections of the people, its character is so well established in the records of the country, that I apprehend no assault of my colleague will affect it. Mr. Chairman, I was educated in a school of politics which teaches that this is a Government of checks and balances; that we have an executive, legislative, and judicial department; that these three departments are co-ordinate and distinct; that one is not to encroach on another. That court was established by the constitutional power of our country; and it is one, the chief justice of which, and the associate justices of which, have placed themselves too high for any man on this floor successfully to assail. I consider it to be the duty of every good citizen to obey the laws of the land; and I consider the decisions of the Supreme Court upon these laws, and the maintenance of those decisions, as the most perfect guarantees of civil and political liberty.

My colleague, in the conclusion of his remarks, stated that if this discussion did no other good, it would awaken the attention of the southern poor man; and that it was his pride to believe that the State which he in part represented would lead the column of emancipation. In my judgment, this statement will not be verified. For the evidence that this doctrine does not obtain in Missouri, I turn the gentleman's attention to the census tables.

How long have you been engaged in this unholy work? How long has the party with which my colleague acts been striking at our institutions? Yet how much have they effected? The slave population of our State has gone on increasing in numbers and prosperity, just as though he were not there, and these efforts of his party were not made. Her march has not been delayed by the machinations of those who have been recreant to her interests.

Our policy is fixed in the affections of the people. It is now as it was at the beginning. At the inauguration of our State government, we had great men at the helm. We had Benton, Barton, Cook, Green, Finley, and others. They were statesmen of no ordinary stature; they were patriots and men of learning; they planted slavery as one of our domestic institutions, and those who came there to settle did so with the knowledge that they were settling in a slave State. Our people have lived and grown up with that institution; and they have prospered under it. These latter day saints, however, these young sprouts who have grown upon the body politic, undertake to undermine and destroy the State's prosperity.

Just here, Mr. Chairman, I will state, in order that Colonel Benton may have the benefit of it, that he has claimed that the provision in the constitution of Missouri which I read was the work of his hands; and this claim is generally admitted to be just. He it was who ingrafted upon our State government the guards for securing the property of slaveholders against just such men as my colleague. He it was who provided that this property should not be taken without due compensation to its owners. And this was the sentiment of the people at the time of the formation of our State government, as will appear by the following extract from the St. Louis Enquirer, edited at the time by Colonel Benton: The date of the paper from which it is taken is October 28, 1819:

"Notwithstanding the great number of persons who are held in check by the agitation of the slave question in Congress, the emigration to Missouri is astonishingly great. Probably from thirty to fifty wagons daily cross the Mississippi at the different ferries, and bring in an average of four to five hundred souls a day. The emigrants are principally from Kentucky, Tennessee, Virginia, and the States further south. They bring with them great numbers of slaves, knowing that Congress has no power to impose the agitated restriction, and that the people of Missouri will never adopt it."

That was the sentiment of the people at the beginning, and we have lived up to it in Missouri ever since. And I turn the attention of my colleague to these words of Colonel Benton, whom he is endeavoring to imitate so far as his capacity will permit. I refer him to the opinions of the same distinguished statesman in the Panama-mission discussion. Colonel Benton stated in that controversy, that the man who would undertake to agitate the slave question in these Halls—any one who would undertake to inaugurate the policy of emancipation in a slaveholding State, was attempting to reenact the scenes of San Domingo; that such men come here with daggers in their hands and hell in their hearts. These were the sentiments of Colonel Benton, and they are the sentiments of the people of our State.

I make these remarks, Mr. Chairman, because I represent a people who are jealous of their rights and who are loyal to this Union. The people of Missouri have, indeed, upon every battle-field where we have contended, upheld the flag of our Union with all their might. The armies of the United States have always had her full quota. The people of my State are a law-abiding and Union-loving people. They are educated and intelligent, and are not ignorant of their true interests. Therefore, I supposed my colleagues from Missouri, my colleague from St. Louis included, would come here with the determination of standing fair before Congress, and ingratiating ourselves with our fellow-members, so that we might assist to secure the growing development of the great resources of our State; that we would encourage the people in their agricultural and mechanical pursuits to strengthen the arm of defense, without attempting, on the contrary, to strike at the vitals of the State, and to undermine her institutions. The people of Missouri cherish the Union; and they cherish, and will maintain with equal energy, their own rights of property. They will never tamely surrender to any fanaticism, nor will they permit any one to undermine and to destroy their institutions.

My colleague's policy, in my judgment, strikes at every institution of Missouri. He said, too, in his speech, yesterday, that he would as soon attempt to educate a negro slave for the St. Louis bar as to educate one for any of the mechanical pursuits to sit side by side to work with the white mechanic. He said that he represented a constituency who would spurn such an attempt. It is well known that in the city of St. Louis, which forms part of my colleague's congressional district, numerous negro mechanics work side by side with white mechanics. I could almost name shop after shop where this is done. And I am not sure that some of his own slaves are not mechanics, and receiving hire in the shops of the State of Missouri. I have been told by gentlemen living in the city of St. Louis, (I do not speak of the fact from personal knowledge,) that there are many negro mechanics now working in that city, and that is the case in other parts of the State as well as in the city of St. Louis.

Gentlemen speak about this being a question between free labor and slave labor. That is not the question. Whenever you free the negroes, then it is that our fellow-citizens raise objection to being put upon a level with free negroes. While the labor is performed by slaves, our sons, our brothers, and all our fellow-citizens, work in the same field and in the same shop with slaves. They are slaves, and their labor is considered inferior; but the moment you free the slave, you raise the dignity of his labor, and bring down that of the white man, and they are put on a level; and that is the reason why the two races cannot work together. That is a well-known fact in other States, and everywhere.

But suppose the gentleman's doctrine were to obtain: he would bring his State into a debt of some sixty million dollars, the interest of which we could not pay. And then his policy is to free the slaves. He says they must not be educated, that they must not be held in bondage. I ask that gentleman, where are they to go? Are they to be turned loose in our community—a degraded, unlettered, and uneducated population? When you do that, you destroy both races, because they cannot live together. I suppose, however, from the speech made by the gentleman on another occasion, that he is looking to Central America, and expects to transport them there.

I now proceed to make a few remarks in relation to the Kansas question. In this question the State which I, in part, represent is deeply interested. Here is the naked question, as admitted on all hands, of a State claiming admission into the Union. The constitution of Kansas tolerates slavery. For that reason it is objected to by the more ultra of our Republican friends. They acknowledge that is their objection, and their main objection. Other arguments, however, are used, and other objections are seriously entertained and honestly, I have no doubt, by gentlemen upon this floor. They are objections and doctrines which have been discussed over and over again, so much so that I may seem to be imposing upon the patience of the House to discuss them further. But, sir, these are questions which will bear argument and which affect the permanency of our institutions for all coming time, and for that reason they cannot be too well understood and too elaborately argued before the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the objections to the admission of Kansas seem to me, principally, twofold. In the first place, it is denied upon the one hand by the Abolitionists upon this floor, by the Republican party in mass, that Kansas ought not to be admitted; and the main reason for it is, that its constitution acknowledges slavery. These men also oppose the admission of any other slave State. These gentlemen deserve credit for their candor, and more credit than others who object to the admission of Kansas, but do not give their true reasons for that objection.

It is said that this constitution has no verity, because the Legislature which provided for the convention had no authority in law; that it was not a legal Legislature. Now, sir, in regard to its being a legal Legislature, what authority have we in regard to its legality or non-legality? Where ought we to go in a government of written law, or in a government which has legal functionaries clothed with the authority of the people under the constitution, to ascertain the legality of any measure? We must go to the law of the land; we must go to the organs of the people to look into the authority with which they are clothed, and the extent of that authority. Then, sir, was this Legislature an illegal Legislature? Has not the Executive of the United States acknowledged its legality? Has not the Executive of the Territory acknowledged it? Have not the people acknowledged it? Have they not acknowledged that it was a legal Legislature, entitled to be respected by the people? and are not those who do not submit to be governed by the laws of that Legislature rebels against their country, and call for the exertion of the strength of the Government to force them to submission? This acknowledgment has been the avowed policy of the Government. It has been the avowed declaration of Walker, Stanton, and the President. It has been the doctrine of all good citizens in Kansas, as well as out of it. Secretary Stanton, in his inaugural address to the people of that Territory, used the following language:

"The Government especially recognizes the territorial act which provides for assembling a convention to form a constitution with a view to making application to Congress for admission as a State into the Union. That act is regarded as presenting the only test of the qualification of voters for delegates to the convention, and all preceding repugnant restrictions are thereby repealed. In this light the act must be allowed to have provided for a full and fair expression of the will of the people through the delegates who may be chosen to represent them in the constitutional convention. I do not doubt, however, that, in order to avoid all pretext for resistance to the peaceful operation of this law, the convention itself will, in some form, provide for submitting the great distracting question regarding their social institution, which has so long agitated the people of Kansas, to a fair vote of all the actual bona fide residents of the Territory, with every possible security against fraud and violence. If the constitution be thus framed, and the question of difference thus submitted to the decision of the people, I believe that Kansas will be admitted by Congress without delay, as one of the sovereign States of the American Union, and the territorial authorities will be immediately withdrawn."

Governor Walker, in his inaugural, also uses the following language:

"Under our practice, the preliminary act of framing a State constitution is uniformly performed through the instrumentality of a convention of delegates chosen by the people themselves. That convention is now about to be elected by you under the call of the Territorial Legislature, created and still recognized by the authority of Congress, and clothed by it, in the comprehensive language of the organic law, with full power to make such an enactment. The Territorial Legislature, then, in assembling this convention, were fully sustained by the act of Congress, and the authority of the convention is distinctly recognized in my instructions from the President of the United States. Those who oppose this course cannot aver the alleged irregularity of the Territorial Legislature, whose laws in town and city elections, in corporate franchises, and on all other subjects but slavery, they acknowledge by their votes and acquiescence. If that Legislature was invalid, then are we without law or order in Kansas; without town, city, or county organization; all legal and judicial transactions are void; all titles null, and anarchy reigns throughout our borders.

"The people of Kansas, then, are invited by the highest authority known to the Constitution to participate freely and fairly in the election of delegates to frame a constitution and State government. The law has performed its entire appropriate function when it extends to the people the right of suffrage, but it cannot compel the performance of that duty. Throughout our whole Union, however, and where ever free government prevails, those who abstain from the exercise of the right of suffrage authorize those who do vote to act for them in that contingency, and the absentees are as much bound under the law and constitution, where there is no fraud or violence, by the act of the majority of those who do vote, as if all had participated in the election. Otherwise, as voting must be voluntary, self-government would be impracticable, and monarchy or despotism would remain as the only alternative.

"But it is said that the convention is not legally called, and that the election will not be freely and fairly conducted. The Territorial Legislature is the power ordained for this purpose by the Congress of the United States; and in opposing it, you resist the authority of the Federal Government. That Legislature was called into being by the Congress of 1854, and is recognized in the very latest congressional legislation.

"It is recognized by the present Chief Magistrate of the Union just chosen by the American people, and many of its acts are now in operation here by universal assent. As the Governor of the Territory of Kansas, I must support the laws and the Constitution; and I have no other alternative under my oath but to see that all constitutional laws are fully and fairly executed.

"I see in this act calling the convention no improper or unconstitutional restrictions upon the right of suffrage. I see in it no test oath or other similar provisions objected to in relation to previous laws, but clearly repealed as repugnant to the provisions of this act, so far as regards the election of delegates to this convention. It is said that a fair and full vote will not be taken. Who can safely predict such a result?"

Well, sir, this is an after-thought, that it was not a legal Legislature. The convention being elected according to the enactment of that Legislature, they assembled as any other convention. But gentlemen speak of counties being disfranchised. When did we hear of that? We never heard of it from Stanton or from Walker, but on the contrary, up to the very time of the meeting of that convention, those two functionaries were urging the people to vote, saying that it was a legal body, a legal statute, acknowledged by the Executive of the United States, by every department of the Government; but when they turned against the Administration, when they threw themselves into the arms of those who are endeavoring to crush out slavery, as does my colleague; when they concluded to give them their aid and strength in that quarter, then for the first time we hear of these proclamations, that counties were disfranchised, and frauds practiced in this election. I say that that declaration, made under such circumstances, is entitled to no weight and ought not to be heeded.

The next objection is, that the constitution framed by this convention was not an embodiment of the will of the people. I ask gentlemen, how are we to ascertain the will of the people? We ascertain it according to the laws of the land. We have laws providing for the expression of the popular will, and when these laws are complied with, we presume that the results indicate fairly the popular will. But when we travel out of these legal channels to ascertain the popular will, we are at sea. We resolve ourselves into a mob. Whenever that policy obtains, the Government cannot survive a day. The members of the convention were elected by the sovereign people of Kansas. Did Missourians elect them? Governor Walker says not. He says that Missouri cannot justly be charged with interfering in that election. This, then, was a fair election, so far as was known—at least on the pro-slavery side of the question. The delegates to that convention are therefore to be presumed to have embodied the will of the people just as much as we are presumed to embody the will of our constituents. Gentlemen from New York, and from every other State, are to be presumed, prima facie, to represent fairly the will of their constituents; and no one has a right to step between these members and their constituents. Such an act would be at war with the representative principles of our Government.

Mr. STANTON. Does the gentleman admit that the Delegate from Kansas represents the will of the people?

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. The gentleman asks me if I would recognize the right of the Delegate from Kansas to represent the will of the people of that Territory? I do; and it would be a very curious thing if I, a Representative in Congress, did not. But I do not know what that has to do with the question.

Now, I was proceeding to show that the delegates to that convention embodied, presumptively, the will of the people, and are therefore to be presumed to have acted honestly and fairly. No one has a right to question their action in that regard. It is a matter between the delegates and their constituents. If the delegates misrepresented their constituents, let them settle that between themselves—we have nothing to do with it; and whenever we undertake to control the matter and ascertain by other means the popular will, we bring about the scenes that we have had on this floor—scenes of crimination and recrimination—and we strike down the strongest pillar of our Government.

But, sir, it is said that some counties were disfranchised, and were not represented in the convention at all. Walker and Stanton say so now; and yet if it is true, they were the cause of it. Stanton made the apportionment himself, disfranchising these counties, if they were disfranchised; but yet he and Walker, when the constitution did not precisely meet their views, turned round and proved recreant to their duty. They then found out, for the first time, that the delegates did not represent the will of the people, and that they had no power to represent those counties to which no representation was given.

I make these remarks, Mr. Chairman, in order to relieve that part of the subject of the charge of non-representation in the convention. The charge is untrue.

Again, sir, it is said that the constitution should have been submitted to the people, and that no constitution ought to be enforced unless first submitted to the people. Will gentlemen recollect how many constitutions of States have never been submitted to the people? The original constitutions of fourteen States were not submitted to the people. Let me enumerate them. The constitutions, now in force, of the following-named States, were not submitted for ratification to the people, but adopted in convention:

Vermont adopted her constitution July 4, 1793, in convention at Windsor. (Compiled Statutes of Vermont, page 15.)

Connecticut, by convention, in 1818. (See Compilation of Statutes of Connecticut, 1854, pages 29 and 45.)

Delaware, by convention, in 1831. (See Acts of 1831, page 49; and Revised Code, page 43.)

Pennsylvania, by convention, in 1838, with a provision for future amendments to be ratified by the people. (See Purdon's Digest, page 17, section 10.)

North Carolina adopted her present constitution in 1776, by convention; amendments in 1835.

South Carolina, in 1790, by convention.

Georgia, by convention, on the 23d of May, 1798.

Alabama, in 1819, by convention, under enabling act. (See Code of Alabama, page 26, section 5, page 28.)

Mississippi, by convention, in 1817; and revised in like manner in 1832.

Tennessee, by convention, in 1836.

Kentucky, by convention, in 1799.
Arkansas, by convention, without enabling act.
(See Revised Statutes of Arkansas, pages 17-48.)
Missouri, by convention, in 1820, and not submitted to the people.

Illinois, by convention, in 1818; also appears not to have been submitted to the people.

Many gentlemen on this floor who now complain that this constitution of Kansas was not submitted to the people, represent States whose first constitutions were not so submitted. There is a great difference between submitting a second constitution made by a State, and the original constitution. There is a much greater necessity for submitting a new constitution, made in an old State, than there is for submitting the original constitution. If, in Missouri or New York, where the people have lived under established forms of government, they undertake to change those forms, it is an additional reason why the people should have an opportunity of passing upon their constitution.

But, sir, in this case, the submission of the constitution to the people is an after thought. I ask gentlemen who voted for the admission of Kansas under the Topeka constitution, why they did so?

Mr. STANTON. That was submitted to a vote of the people, as I understand.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Submitted after it was sent here.

Mr. STANTON. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask the attention of gentlemen here who urge that Kansas ought not to be admitted because the constitution was not submitted to the people, and particularly my Democratic friends who oppose the admission of Kansas, to the position taken two years ago, nay, one year ago, by the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] who now heads the opposition to the admission of Kansas. The committee will remember—it has been heard here over and over again—that the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] introduced a bill to enable the people of Kansas to form a constitution and State government preparatory to their admission into the Union, which contained a provision that the constitution, so to be formed, was to be submitted to the people. That bill, coming from a committee of which Senator DOUGLAS was chairman, did not, however, become a law. But to prove that it was not the intention of that Senator to have that constitution submitted, that provision requiring submission was stricken out in the committee. I now come to the action of the Legislature of the Territory of Kansas. That body provided for the holding of a convention to form a constitution and State government. Governor GEARY vetoed that law, and it was passed by a constitutional majority over his head. He gave as a reason for not signing the bill, that there was no provision in it for submitting the constitution to be formed to the people. But, sir, the act was passed, and became a law in spite of the veto of Governor GEARY, thus declaring in the most authoritative form that it was not the intention of the people that the constitution to be formed should be submitted to them for their ratification. It is the right of the people to declare for themselves in what form this constitution shall be ratified. Congress can only admit States. They have no right to attach anything to or to take anything from it. The sovereign people have the absolute right to form their own government in their own way, and when so formed, all Congress can do is to determine whether that constitution is republican in form, and admit or reject. That is my duty as a Representative on this floor, and it is a duty I intend to perform.

But we are told that the people of Kansas have been oppressed; that they have been annoyed; that they have been defrauded; that the people from slave States have crowded in upon them; that they have prevented the rightful citizens of that Territory from voting. Yet, sir, that is the argument which comes from a side of the House which claims, according to some of them, four to one, and by others ten to one, in that Territory of free-State men. Could not that large majority protect themselves against the small minority which they say only exists in that Territory in opposition to them? Will they submit tamely to be overpowered by a small minority? But, say these gentlemen, they never did commit any frauds. Oh, no; no frauds were ever committed by them.

I ask the gentlemen on the other side of the House to say who the free-State party ran for Delegate to this House, from that Territory, at the time Whitfield was first elected? Where did he live? Who was he? How long had he resided in the Territory? He came up on one boat. He went back by the first boat after the election; and has never been seen in the Territory since. He came to the Territory for a specific purpose, as did many who voted for him; and when that purpose failed in being accomplished, they left the Territory in disgust, and never entered it again. They remind me a good deal of an old lady who went to consult a lawyer upon the complaint that the whole town had been slandering her. When the lawyer told her that there was no cause of action, the old lady wept bitterly; but before she left the office the lawyer asked her what she had been saying about other people. "Why," said she, "I have been so busy in finding out what other people said, that I have never thought of what I was doing myself." Now, sir, these free-State men are in precisely the same condition of the old lady.

Sir, let Senator DOUGLAS speak what these free-State men did and how they acted. In his report to the Senate, upon this subject, that honorable Senator said:

"In order to give consistency and efficiency to this movement, and surround it with the color of legal authority, an act of incorporation was procured from the Legislature of Massachusetts, in which it was provided, in the first section, that twenty persons therein named, and their associates, successors, and assigns, are hereby made a corporation, by the name of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the purpose of assisting emigrants to settle in the West; and for this purpose they shall have all the powers and privileges, and be subject to all the duties, restrictions, and liabilities set forth in the 38th and 44th chapters of the revised statutes of Massachusetts."

"The second section limited the capital stock of the company to five millions of dollars, and authorized the whole to be invested in real and personal estate, with the proviso that 'the said corporation shall not hold real estate in this Commonwealth (Massachusetts) to an amount exceeding twenty thousand dollars.'"

"The third section provided for dividing the stock of the corporation into shares of one hundred dollars each, and prescribed the mode, time, and amounts in which assessments might be made on each share."

"The fourth and last section was in these words:

"At all meetings of the stockholders, each stockholder shall be entitled to cast one vote for each share held by him: Provided, That no stockholder shall be entitled to cast more than fifty votes on shares held by himself, nor more than fifty votes by proxy."

"Organization, objects, and plan of operations of the Emigrant Aid Company; also, a description of Kansas, for the information of emigrants."

"Trustees—Amos A. Lawrence, Boston; J. M. S. Williams, Cambridge; Eli Thayer, Worcester."

"Treasurer—Amos A. Lawrence."

"Secretary—Thomas H. Webb, Boston."

"For the purpose of answering numerous communications concerning the plan of operations of the Emigrant Aid Company, and the resources of Kansas Territory, which it is proposed now to settle, the secretary of the company has deemed it expedient to publish the following definite information in regard to this particular:

"For these purposes it is recommended, 1st. That the trustees contract immediately with some one of the competing lines of travel for the conveyance of twenty thousand persons from Massachusetts to that place in the West which the trustees shall select for their first settlement."

"It is recommended that the company's agents locate and take up, for the company's benefit, the sections of land in which the boarding-houses and mills are located, and no others. And further, whenever the Territory shall be organized as a free State, the trustees shall dispose of their interests there, replace by the sales the money laid out, declare a dividend to the stockholders, and that they then select a new field, and make similar arrangements for the settlement and organization of another free State of this Union."

"With the advantages attained by such a system of effort, the Territory selected as the scene of operations would, it is believed, be filled up with free inhabitants."

"There is reason to suppose several thousand men of New England origin propose to emigrate under the auspices of some such arrangement, this very summer. Of the whole emigration from Europe, amounting to some four hundred thousand persons, there can be no difficulty in inducing some thirty or forty thousand to take the same direction."

"When the emigrants sent out by the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, and their affiliated societies, passed through the State of Missouri in large numbers on their way to Kansas, the violence of their language, and the unmistakable indications of their determined hostility to the domestic institutions of that State, created apprehensions that the object of the company was to abolitionize Kansas as a means of prosecuting a relentless warfare upon the institutions of slavery within the limits of Missouri. These apprehensions increased and spread with the progress of events, until they became the settled convictions of the people of that portion of the State most exposed to the danger by their proximity to the Kansas border. The natural consequence was, that immediate steps were taken by the people of the western counties of Missouri to stimulate, organize, and carry into effect a system of emigration similar to that of the Massachusetts Emigrant Aid Company, for the avowed purpose of counteracting the effects, and protecting themselves and their domestic institutions from the consequences, of that company's operations."

"The material difference in the character of the two rival and conflicting movements consists in the fact that the one had its origin in an aggressive, and the other in a defensive policy. The one was organized in pursuance of the provisions and claiming to act under the authority of a legislative enactment of a distant State, whose internal prosperity and domestic security did not depend upon the success of the movement; while the other was the spontaneous action of the people living in the immediate vicinity of the theater of operations, excited, by a sense of common danger, to the necessity of protecting their own firesides from the apprehended horrors of servile insurrection and intestine war."

They came under the auspices of a great emigrant aid society, formed, as I understand, in the State of Massachusetts, and chartered by the Legislature of Massachusetts, with a capital of millions of dollars. They went there with secret oaths, and, as they went up the Missouri river, openly boasted that they would first make Kansas a free State, and then drive the slaves out of Missouri or free them. These men were sent there with cannon, with small arms, and munitions of war. Well, sir, the people of Missouri on the borders of Kansas, who had an interest in slave property, naturally became a little excited, and as the free-State men had announced their purpose to go over into Missouri when they had made Kansas a free State, it was but natural that they should feel some interest in thwarting their purpose. They succeeded to some extent; and then the free-State men, like the gambler who commenced the game with the intention of cheating, when he found himself out-cheated, cried out, "There's cheating round the board!"

But, sir, that has nothing to do with the subject before us. Kansas comes here with a constitution that is republican in form; with a constitution that, prima facie, reflects the will of the people. That constitution is now here; and Kansas claims admission as a State. Is she to be admitted? Are we to give heed to the complaints, because the sovereign people in Kansas have chosen to form a constitution which recognizes slavery? If they establish a rule of action for themselves which does not coincide with the views of other States of this Union, it is none of their concern; it is a matter over which they themselves have the control.

But, sir, it is said that since the adoption of the constitution, other elections have taken place. Those elections are void and of no effect, as they were in direct opposition to law. Suppose my colleague is declared elected by the people at the polls, and that the next day or the next week people were to rise up in their power and hold another election; suppose, then, that the Legislature, before he took his seat, declared that the will of the people should be taken as to whether he was elected or not, and the majority of the people should declare that he was not elected, would he consider that he was the Representative of that district here or not? Would he consider that second election had any power to control his action? Sir, it was the fundamental law that the constitution should be submitted in a particular form, and at a particular time, and after that action, after that was done, any other action taken by the people, through the Legislature, was void. The second trial was unauthorized, and it was as if done by a mob; and should the prescribed form of law in these cases be disregarded here or elsewhere, there would never be an end to any election.

Mr. GRANGER obtained the floor; but yielded to

Mr. BLAIR. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state to the committee that I cannot hope for any indulgence at this time, after having been indulged so often during this session; but that I shall seize the first opportunity, when I can obtain the floor, to reply to the assault of my colleague upon me; and I shall undertake to show him and this House that there are other interests in Missouri besides those of the slaveholder, and that I represent interests as large—

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman has already spoken once, and the gentleman from New York is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. BLAIR. I have said all I desired to say.
Mr. GRANGER. Sir, passing by the all-disturbing subject of slavery, for the present, I arrive at objections to the passage of this Lecompton constitution, that, with any candid mind, ought to outweigh every consideration that can be offered in its favor.

First, that the people of Kansas have, by the Kansas-Nebraska act, a clear and undoubted right, and they alone, to form their constitution as they, in their judgment, may think best.

This, I conclude, no one will deny, and therefore I deem it not debatable.

Secondly, that the people of Kansas are, by a very decided majority, opposed to that constitution, and have so declared at a full and fair election—an election held pursuant to an act of the Territorial Legislature, assembled by order of a Governor who was appointed by the President, and that the said election was the only one ever held in the Territory of Kansas to decide for or against that constitution.

Sir, is not this also true? I believe it is, and I trust no member on this floor will attempt to controvert it. Thus far, then, we agree.

If I am not mistaken in these two facts, to wit: that the people of Kansas have the right to decide on their own constitution, and that they have fairly and solemnly passed upon this Lecompton constitution, and rejected it; I ask, then, is there a member present who will vote to compel the people of Kansas to accept that constitution, and forego the exercise of the great fundamental right of self-government—a right on which our whole republican edifice is erected?

If, then, these two facts are true—and I do not expect to see the first member who will call in question the truth of either—I say to the Democrats, Americans, and Republicans, are not these objections paramount and conclusive against the passage of this Lecompton constitution?

Here I might rest and submit the cause, and, with a fair and candid trial on its merits, with full confidence await the issue.

Sir, it would be a curiosity to see a northern Representative vote direct to make a slave State north of 36° 30', and particularly one professing to be a Democratic Representative from the State of New York.

The members from that State must know—and you do know—first, that a vast majority of your constituents, of all parties, loathe and detest that nefarious swindle called the Lecompton constitution; and that there is not one congressional district of the thirty-four where a majority of the voters are in favor of its passage.

And secondly, you also know that if that constitution is forced on Kansas, at the dictum of the Executive, by an arbitrary vote of Congress, it is done against the will of an overwhelming majority of the people of Kansas.

Here I desire to present for the inspection and review of northern members, and their constituents in particular, one leading principle of the Lecompton constitution, which is in the words following, to wit:

Article 7—Slavery.

"Sec. 1. The right of property is before and higher than any constitutional sanction, and the right of the owner of a slave to such slave, and its increase, is the same and as inviolable as the right of the owner of any property whatever."

Now, then, to pass the Lecompton constitution and make it the constitution for the State of Kansas, by the aid of Democratic votes from the State of New York, with New York and Kansas both opposed, would be interesting entirely. If what I have said be true, I have said enough already to bar the door against it.

If the people of the State of New York, with great unanimity, desire their Representatives to vote against it, and if at the same time, their Representatives know that the people of Kansas, with singular unanimity reject it, and will not accept it, and that their Legislature by a unanimous vote protest against it, and officially declare they never will submit to it on any terms whatever; in all conscience, I ask is not that enough—I say is not that enough to warrant, nay command, its rejection by every vote from the Empire State?

But more than that; you know that the repeal of the Missouri compromise was a scandalous violation of plighted faith, dishonest and dishonorable in its character, a costly sacrifice of southern honor, and the most dangerous move that slavery ever made. It was aggressive. It was agitation of the worst sort. It was an unexpected declaration of war—slavery against freedom, and slavery the invader; and it may prove to be a war of extermination.

Sir, it was done to steal the march and crowd slavery where it had never been before and where it was not welcome. It absolves all northern men from delicacy towards the so-called institution of slavery, and leaves them free to speak of it and treat it as it deserves, a loathsome, lawless invader of the rights of man, in direct violation of the Declaration of American Independence, at variance with the Articles of Confederation, and openly at war with the Constitution of the United States, the President to the contrary, notwithstanding.

That southern men, brought up from infancy to prize and respect it, and educated, from generation to generation, to think it right and lawful, that they be prejudiced in its favor is not a mystery.

The same relations and circumstances might produce the same results in us.

For them to seek to extend slavery is not so strange; but for northern members, brought up at Gamaliel's feet, inhaling from early life the healthful sentiments of northern freemen, and taught to believe slavery unlawful and wrong—that such a member should be found to part with the approbation of his constituents, if not of his conscience, and, in the time of trial, to desert the cause of freedom, his country, and his friends, and be himself the unlucky instrument by which the blight of chattel-slavery shall curse the soil and blast the future of a young, rising empire, is painful to anticipate.

You do know that when Kansas came to elect her first Legislature, to make her first laws, a band of ruffians, near five thousand strong, armed to the teeth, came from Missouri, took the polls by storm, and drove the honest voters away; elected their Legislature, many of whom lived then and now in Missouri, and returned back in triumph; and all to make Kansas a slave State.

You do know that for objecting to this outrage a Democratic Governor of Kansas (Reeder) was removed by the President, and lost caste with the friends of slavery.

Why, there have been about as many Democratic Governors of Kansas as there were "sons of one Skeva, a Jew," unceremoniously removed from office and turned adrift, one after another, because they refused to go all lengths to crush out freedom and drive out freemen, to make Kansas a slave State.

You do know that the free-State men of Kansas were persecuted and hunted and robbed and murdered, and that an alien ruffian Legislature would give them no protection; and all to extirpate free principles and free men; and that it was an offense against the tyrannic laws of that Legislature to even say that man cannot hold property in man. An offense, nay a felony, punishable with the State's prison.

Is that liberty of speech?—not allowed so much as to speak against slavery—and that a law the President sent his troops to execute!

Is that not despotism? For far less than that our fathers declared King George "unfit to be the ruler of a free people."

They took up arms to defend their rights. He sent Gage to Boston with three thousand men to overawe the people.

And we have twenty-five hundred sent to Kansas on exactly the same errand.

You know the city of Lawrence was burned at noonday, by border-ruffian officers, while United States troops were near at hand, anxious for orders (which they never got) to interfere and save the town.

Lawrence was the quiet home of free-State men.

You know the government of Kansas was a foul usurpation, countenanced by the President of the United States, and upheld by his troops, with a design to make Kansas a slave State.

You know that cruel and corrupt judges have been kept in office there, "to clear the guilty and varnish crimes," and all to advance the cause of slavery and make Kansas a slave State.

You know that the worst of border-ruffians have enjoyed the smiles and patronage of Federal favor in the Territory of Kansas, with a design to make Kansas a slave State.

You know that, at subsequent elections, the vilest frauds have been acted over and over again, to prevent a fair election, and to make Kansas a slave State.

You know the Lecompton constitution is to be put through, if possible, by executive power and patronage, covered all over as it is with fraud, and spotted with corruption, and thus rivet on Kansas the detested curse of chattel-slavery, and that against the faithful, persevering, manly opposition of her people, as expressed at a fair and legal election, by a majority of more than five to one.

Will you, Representatives of the free and free-labor-loving North, will you indorse this catalogue of cruelty and crimes and give your votes for the notorious Lecompton constitution, and place your names on everlasting record as the aiders and abettors of an Executive who perverts and falsifies the constitution and daily and audaciously connives at all the matchless border-ruffian villainies of Kansas, with a single eye to compel Kansas to submit to a constitution not her own, and become a slave State against her will?

And now, to cap the climax of absurdity and wrong, you are to be disciplined, and, if possible, reduced; and seduced to do an act that you could never justify, the memory of which would haunt you while you live.

Let it be known in all the North, nay, through all the land, South and North, that not one Republican member was found to falter, not one was doubtful or missing, that every one was at his post, by night or day, and stood by his integrity to the last.

If a President with his Haynaus can be upheld in this attempt to stifle liberty in Kansas, I trust it will be done, if done it must be, by Democratic votes, and none other.

Sir, if to fill the contract, and make the tally, the President can find cringing doughfaces from the North, though they hail from Democratic ranks, may the Empire State be spared the sacrifice.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Chairman, the theme of Kansas, and her proposed admission into the Union as a sovereign State, is well-nigh exhausted. But so important is the subject to the future of that infant community, and to the harmony of the Republic of which she is destined at no distant day to become a part, and to such a degree does it seem to occupy the public mind, that I deem it my duty to inform this House and the country of the reasons which force me to vote as I must upon the distracting, and as some say vital, questions involved.

No Representative upon this floor can disregard the fact, that from the furthest North to the remotest South, from our homes upon the Atlantic to the shores of the Pacific, an intelligent people, for the most part, as I believe, loyal to the Constitution, and sincerely attached to the institutions which have, during the brief period of our national existence, elevated us to our place among the nations of the earth, are themselves considering the question which is soon to be presented for our determination. They watch our proceedings with a well-directed eye; and they listen to our debates with an interest not unmingled with alarm. And well they may; for it has been more than once asserted upon this floor, with a solemnity which betokens determination, that this Union can no longer exist if Kansas is denied admission under the constitution which has been presented in her behalf. We are informed, sir, by the resolutions of sovereign and independent States, that the announcement of the result of our deliberations may be the signal for the initiation of measures having in view the establishment of a new and independent governmental organization within the borders of the Federal Union.

Representatives of constituencies in those sovereign States—men of education and of patriotism—have spoken in the language of unquestioned sincerity, and have warned us of the dangers which may flow from our unjust decision of a question which it is alleged concerns the honor of their people and the security of the institutions upon which their prosperity rests.

If, sir, this be true; if the decision to which we may arrive upon this, in my judgment, comparatively unimportant question, is to determine the fate of the wonderful experiment of constitutional government which for the past half century has been written down in the world's history as successful, well may that people, whose fathers acquired their liberties amid the dangers of a revolution, contemplate with unusual anxiety the hazards to be incurred in the new one which thus threatens to break upon their repose.

I have not time, sir, to speak of the Union as I would like to speak, nor will I attempt to rehearse the unwelcome but familiar story of the causes which have led to an estrangement which satisfies my mind that this gloomy foreboding may, perhaps, be no idle dream. I shall not endeavor to point out, as I think I might, where this fearful alienation of national affection began, or speculate where it may end. I shall make no charges of wrong or injustice; answer no threats; nor, if I can avoid it, utter a word to awaken one single sentiment of unkindness; but shall hasten to place upon record the views which I entertain upon the question to which I have proposed to address myself, with that frankness which should characterize a Representative of the people in his place upon this floor.

Mr. Chairman, I am a northern man, and do not feel that I have a right to boast of exemption from the influence of those prejudices which spring to the human heart from the scenes by which infancy was surrounded. I disclaim the power to discard from memory the teachings of youth, or to repel the impressions made by the experience of a life not eventful, but which has, nevertheless, afforded no inconsiderable opportunity for reflection. I love and revere my native North; and when I hear her assailed, when I hear her institutions and her people brought in ungrateful contrast with those of the South, my heart would leap to her defense. I review her history; and remembering nothing upon a single page which brings dishonor upon her fame, I am at loss to account for the spirit of those who accuse her. I reflect with natural pride upon her institutions, and the wealth and the power which they have created; and rejoice, rather than deplore, that prosperity has resulted to the people of the South from other institutions specially adapted to their more genial clime; and believing, as I ever have believed, that the immense development of material wealth, and the vast sum of individual happiness of which, as a nation, we can boast, have resulted from our national Union, I have assumed that North and South would remain forever combined, for the preservation of that common Government which furnished its just and equal protection to the whole.

Mr. Chairman, as it seems to be not unusual for gentlemen upon this floor to acquaint each other with their political views preliminarily to the discussion of this controverted question, I may be permitted to state, that I am one of that Democratic party of the North which has been often beaten and torn in its struggles for the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the South, until we have been, as it were, driven to take refuge within the walls of our northern cities. The district which I have the honor to represent embraces a population as great as, if not greater than, any other constituency in the Union, and perhaps contains more of the product of our prosperous foreign and domestic commerce. It is the site of palaces of almost imperial wealth, as well as the abode of unambitious poverty. And I venture to assert that no man in this House is responsible for his public acts to a constituency embracing a larger amount of educated, intelligent, right-minded men. The political condition of the country is a matter of their daily observation; and as connected with the protection of the vast capital and industry which they employ, and its results, they exact from their Representative upon this, as well as upon every other question of national concernment, the most careful, fearless, and conscientious discharge of duty. In respect to our national Union, and the importance of its preservation in unbroken integrity, but one sentiment pervades her people. Upon that subject, reference to which seems inevitable in every discussion connected with the formation of territorial government, the admission of a new State, or the extension of our dominions; and no section of the Union has a more direct and material interest in every new annexation of territory, they are eminently national and just.

While common candor compels me to say that the teachings of my youth left no impressions favorable to the institution of slavery, and instilled no learning to justify the opinion frequently asserted upon this floor, that its influences upon the civilization of a people are compensatory for those repelling features which are said to be inseparable from its existence, I can, nevertheless, with equal candor, assert, that in respect to that institution wherever it exists, and in respect to the rights of the owners of slaves to an equal and just participation in all the advantages of our territorial acquisitions, I have never, since the hour of earliest manhood, entertained but one sentiment; and that sentiment was and is, that interference with it where it exists would be an outrage; and that to deny to the slaveholding States equal privileges of emigration with slaves to our territorial possessions, would be a wrong, to which a people conscious of their rights and capable of asserting them could not be expected to submit. Such I believe to be the universal sentiment of the northern Democracy upon this subject—a sentiment which no northern or southern fanaticism can weaken or destroy.

The northern Democracy occupy a middle ground between two parties which appear to have taken form—the one regarding the extension of slavery, and the other the prohibition of such extension, as the object of their political organization. While they stand pledged to the maintenance of the constitutional rights of the South in respect to territory already acquired, or hereafter to be acquired, they are not committed, nor are they to be committed, to measures having solely in view the extension of the institution of slavery.

While they are favorably inclined to the acquisition of Cuba and such other southern territory as can be acquired without violence to the principles of international law, they would not regard the existence of slavery in Cuba or in such other southern territory, or the liability to its extension and continued existence, which may result from the special adaptedness of soil and climate to that particular species of agricultural labor, a barrier to such acquisition.

I may also be permitted to say that, in conjunction with vast numbers of men at the North who gave their adherence to the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, when, by the votes of southern men, it became incorporated, so to speak, in our system of territorial law, I was distrustful of its practical working. Not intending to assert the power of prophecy, I thought I foresaw that it threw open our Territories to just such a struggle as has been witnessed in Kansas. No man who had observed the character of the emigration, whose tide, setting in from the Old World, seems resistless as the flow of the ocean, or who had contemplated the repugnance to the institution of slavery, which, it is not to be denied, pervades to a great extent the hills and valleys of the North—an antipathy which, in very many instances, results from a moral conviction which no argument can reach, and in many more from a thirst for the acquisition of political power which the spirit of patriotism is unable to subdue—could have failed to reflect that this subjection of common territory to an unequal struggle for its occupation might work injustice to the South. It surrendered the power which Congress might have exercised to secure the territorial rights of both the North and the South by positive law, to the uncertain and dangerous issue of a race of emigration between the North and the South, while, from the peculiar character of our people, and the difference in their dispositions to abandon an old and seek a new home, and the difference in their facilities for the conversion of property into money, the North, in my judgment, had unquestionably the advantage. The more adventurous spirit of the North breaks away easily from the home of childhood. It cheerfully encounters greater risks; while, on the other hand, the proprietor of slaves, with attachments to the scenes of his youth less readily sundered, more deliberately contemplates the greater change to his social and domestic relations which must follow the establishment of a new home in a wilderness or among strangers.

The passion for land speculation which pervades our people—well illustrated in Kansas, whose Territorial Legislature have just removed their seat of government from the place where it had been located by law, and where Congress had recently expended a considerable sum of money in appropriate improvements, to a spot remote from its settlements, and capable of being ascertained only by the aid of natural landmarks and the theodolite—leads to the temporary occupation of our Territories by men who never contemplate remaining longer than to invigorate themselves for a new chase after the site of some future city. The waste and squander of our public lands, and the facilities which the manufacture of new States, and our liberal and reckless grants of the national domain to encourage every scheme which promises to rise to the dignity of a successful speculation, furnish aliment to this love of adventure, and swell the flow of emigration. These, and other circumstances which I would state if I had the time, have, in my judgment, conspired to verify the prediction of thousands of intelligent men at the North, who feared that the final adjustment of the slavery question upon the principles of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, like every other adjustment of that question which we have yet made, would inevitably lead to newer difficulties and still more serious complications. Notwithstanding these just apprehensions, the Democratic party of the North united with the Democratic party of the South in giving in their adherence to this new and untried doctrine. Sir, I gave my individual adherence, not without reluctance, and solely for the reason that it seemed apparent that the growing sentiment of our northern people in favor of the exclusion of slave emigration, and the predominance in the popular branch of Congress of Representatives from non-slaveholding States, required some new, even if experimental, mode of stilling the clamors which then, as now, were supposed to endanger the harmony of our people.

Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as the Democratic party has thus solemnly adopted this principle and avowed it to the country; having declared it upon the records of the convention at Cincinnati; having conducted the late presidential campaign upon it; and having brought into power an Administration who recognize it as a binding and valid principle of Democratic faith—speaking for myself alone, and not assuming to give advice to others—I will say that I regard my personal honor and political integrity as pledged to my constituency to carry it out in the most perfect good faith. It is due to the distinguished authors of that measure, be they northern men or southern men; it is due to the Congress of 1854, who recorded that principle in the organic law of Kansas, that, in this instance, at least, it shall, at all events, have a fair test and an impartial trial.

But, Mr. Chairman, I must hasten to present my views in respect to the proposed admission of Kansas with the Leecompton constitution. In doing so, I shall, I fear, disappoint those of my constituents who had hoped that I would, in no event, give my vote for her admission. I shall also, I apprehend, disappoint any who may have expected that I would give my assent to her unqualified admission, right or wrong, without regard to the circumstances surrounding the case, to which I shall now proceed to advert.

The substitution of the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill for the doctrine of the right and power of Congress to enforce the claims of the respective sections of the Union to territorial privileges, constituted a new era in our national politics, and ex proprio vigore enacted a new set of rules applicable to the subject of the admission of new States formed out of such Territories. It cannot be controverted that the Constitution of the United States is silent as to the mode by which, the time at which, and the circumstances under which, new States may be admitted, with the limited exception prohibiting their erection within the jurisdiction of any other State, or their formation by the junction of two or more States without the consent of their respective Legislatures, and of Congress. The case at hand was evidently unforeseen. It is clear to my mind that the framers of the Constitution had not in view our subsequent vast acquisition of foreign territory, or their wisdom would have provided some mode by which we should have been spared the terrible convulsions to which the subject gives rise. I cannot conceive that it could then have been expected that the institution of domestic slavery should be driven from the confines of the Republic. The prohibition of the power to prevent the importation for a term of years, the clause providing for the restoration of fugitives, and the previous adjustment of the question of slavery, as to the territory northwest of the Ohio, satisfy my mind that it was contemplated that slavery should continue to exist within the Union; but it seems to have been impossible that it could have been foreseen that new and foreign territory should be acquired by purchase out of the common Treasury, for the occupancy of which proprietors and non-proprietors of slaves might be brought in conflict, nor was there any ground for the apprehension that any new Territory would be the scene of a contest for political power.

This silence of the Constitution as to the terms upon which new States may be admitted into the Union, and the language in which the power to admit them is contained, in my judgment, from the necessity of the case leaves the whole subject to the discretion of Congress, subject to no restraints, beyond those which it may self-impose, for the accomplishment of the great purposes for which the Constitution was formed. Congress having never by general law attempted to regulate the subject, and its usage, in respect of the circumstances of admission, not having been uniform, it is obvious that the whole question remains open for adjustment from time to time, as may be required by the exigencies of each particular case. There is, in my opinion, not one single word in the Constitution giving countenance to the suggestion that any new State can claim admission as matter of right, or that the largest liberty should not be exercised by Congress in its decision of all such applications for admission. And here permit me to advert to the assertion so frequently made, and as constantly assumed to be incontrovertible, that Congress is prohibited by the terms of the Federal compact from looking at the constitution of a new State applying for admission beyond the point essential to determine whether the form of government it prescribes is or is not republican. I can find no such prohibition in the constitution; nor can I discover any principle from which such prohibition can be inferred. The clause which declares that the United States shall guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government is evidently applicable to the case of domestic revolution occurring after admission, and to the contingency of invasion or domestic violence. It is manifest that it could not have been contemplated that any State in the Union should have a form of government otherwise than republican; but there is no limitation, express or implied, upon the power and the duty of Congress, when introducing a new State to share the privileges and enjoy the protection of the Constitution, to look to the substance and far beyond the form.

To illustrate my meaning—suppose that a State should apply for admission into the Union with a republican form of government, and with a constitution establishing some mode of administering justice at variance with any now recognized by the civilized world: would it be seriously contended that, notwithstanding this, the United States were bound to accede to such application, while by an express provision of the Constitution of the United States full faith and credit is required to be given to the judicial proceedings of such new State? Would this Congress regard itself as obligated, by such act of admission, to compel the thirty-one States of the Union to enforce in their own tribunals, and without review, and that, too, against their own citizens and their property, decrees and judgments rendered not in accordance with the forms of law, nor in consonance with our commonly received notions of natural justice?

But the Kansas-Nebraska bill has, in the most explicit terms, provided that any State or States formed out of the Territory embraced in the act, shall be received into the Union with or without slavery, as their constitution may prescribe. It has become, therefore, the law of the Federal Union, in respect of that Territory, that the existence or non-existence of the institution of slavery, cannot be the subject of inquiry or objection on an application of any State for admission. Hence the arguments which have been presented on this floor, for and against the institution of slavery, although eloquent and instructive, appear to me to be altogether aside from the issue.

Upon the application made in behalf of Kansas for admission into the Union, under the Le-compton constitution, several inquiries naturally present themselves, each of which should, in my judgment, be answered. They all arise upon every application for the admission of a new State, and I do not recognize any existing pressure which, in this particular instance, should relieve from the scrutiny. These inquiries are the following:

1. Have her proceedings been sufficiently regular to authorize her admission without a violation of principles already established, or which should be applied in case of every application of a new State for admission?
2. Has she the requisite population; and have that population the requisite degree of stability and order to justify her admission?
3. Is the application for her admission that of the people of Kansas or of individuals who, against the remonstrance of her people, have presented it in her name?
4. Has a constitution been made by that people; and are there State officers in existence, elected by that people, entitled and competent to assume the discharge of their executive duties upon the supercession of the territorial government, which must instantly result from the act of admission?

Mr. Chairman, I shall proceed to consider the subject-matter of these several inquiries, and because of the limitation of my time, without strict reference to the order in which I have stated them.

It must be conceded that, as I have before stated, there is no prescribed rule as to the proceedings initiatory to the formation of a new State. They have been admitted where the preliminary steps have been regular and where they have been confessedly irregular; with and without enabling acts; and with and without what, in my judgment, is a requisite population. While there can be no doubt of the very great propriety of requiring an enabling act, and a strict compliance with its provisions, as preliminary to the formation of a State government; it nevertheless has impressed me that, in view of the recent admission of California with a constitution formed by a drum-head convention, it would be ungracious to insist that in this, the first application since that event for the admission of a State with a constitution containing a slavery clause, there should, of necessity, have been an enabling act, and a rigid adherence to its provisions. I cannot conceive that the Kansas-Nebraska bill itself can properly be regarded as an enabling act. It contains no semblance of authority for the formation of a State government. It simply created a temporary government for a district of territory, reserving the power of the subsequent division of it into two or more Territories, and of attaching any portion of it to any other State or Territory at such time as Congress should deem expedient. It is, therefore, entirely competent for Congress, at any time prior to its absorption into a sovereign State, to divide it into two or more Territories, which would subsequently be entitled to admission into the Union as two or more States. How can this power of division exist in conjunction with the stipulation to admit the whole into the Union as a single State upon compliance with its provisions as an enabling act? And if the act is an enabling act, such a stipulation is to be implied. If it was an enabling act, the few hundred people scattered over her plains were authorized at once to form a constitution and State government; and although hardly sufficient in number to fill the executive and legislative offices, to prescribe for all time to come the character of the institutions of that vast region of territory. No such design could have been intended, and none such is fairly inferable from the provisions of the act. But this result is by no means fatal to her application for admission, for it is wholly within the discretion of Congress to reduce the dimensions of the proposed State, and to give consent to the application for admission, notwithstanding the absence of an enabling act.

It appears that the Territorial Legislature created by her organic law, of their own motion, and without the consent of Congress, submitted to the people, at popular elections, the determination of the question whether a State government should be formed; and an affirmative vote having been given, subsequently enacted a law for a convention to frame a constitution; and the constitution alleged to have been formed at such convention is submitted to Congress as the constitution of Kansas.

It is suggested, among other things, that the Territorial Legislature by which these proceedings were initiated were not the fairly-chosen representatives of the people of Kansas; that gross irregularities took place in the apportionment for members of the convention; and that multiplied frauds characterized each and every of the elections occurring prior to the consummation of the work of the convention. It seems to me that these several allegations, if true, are nevertheless not decisive of the question before us.

When Congress constituted the territorial government of Kansas, it declared, or must be held to have ascertained and declared, that there was a sufficiency of population, and of order, and of the means of securing order, in Kansas, to justify the creation of a Territorial Legislature, and the holding of the popular elections required by the act of organization. If the population of Kansas were savages, and unfit to be trusted with the powers of self-government permitted by the organic act, the territorial government should not have been created. If there was not sufficient physical force to prevent a hostile invasion from foreign territory to override her elections, and a sufficient degree of integrity among her people, and among the officers charged with the control of her elections, to secure an honest result, these powers should not have been bestowed. I think it must be assumed that the Territorial Legislature was competent to determine all questions touching the eligibility and the elections of its members; that the Governor of the Territory made a sufficiently just and fair apportionment, the legal presumption being in favor of the correct performance of official duty; that the convention likewise was competent to determine all questions touching the membership of the persons composing it, and that all wrongs of the description referred to had their appropriate legal redress. I am not without suspicions that such is not the case; but cannot satisfy myself that, under all the circumstances, it is expedient for Congress to review those several transactions, and attempt to apply remedies at this late hour.

The question of a submission of the constitution framed by the convention to the people for their direct ratification has been the subject of much discussion. As I do not find in the organic act any authority to the people of Kansas to frame a State government, and as I cannot infer that there was any power vested in the Territorial Legislature to authorize a convention which should form a constitution, which should of necessity be binding upon Congress, it seems to me to be quite immaterial in its legal aspect whether that constitution was or was not submitted to the people for their ratification. No requisition for any submission appears in the organic act; none such is to be found in the territorial law creating the convention; and I have been at a loss to discover upon what foundation the opinion of the President, that the slavery clause must of necessity have been submitted, is predicated. He has demonstrated that there was very great propriety in such submission, and I conceive that there would have been equal propriety in the submission of the whole constitution; but I am unable to regard its non-submission as a vital defect. In view of the conflict of opinions existing in the Territory, of the notorious popular prejudice against the first Territorial Legislature, and of the complaints which were rife in respect to the organization of the constitutional convention, and especially in view of the declarations acknowledged to have been made by Governor Walker, upon real or supposed authority from the President, that the whole constitution, when made, should be submitted to the people for ratification, I think that a submission would have been most timely and most appropriate, provided the elections could have been held without fraud and without violence. But I am one of those who do not regard the popular elections of a turbulent people as the occasion for the calm and deliberate examination of the complicated details of a written State constitution; nor would their results, as declared by partisan judges, be conclusive evidence to my mind that they indicated the will of the people. I have no doubt whatever of the right of the people to delegate to their representatives authority to enact laws, organic or otherwise, with or without subsequent submission. And I regard all the proceedings preliminary to the final consummation of the work of the convention as evidence, not conclusive, but nevertheless evidence, bearing upon the great question, is that constitution the act of the people?

The convention complete their labors and dissolve. They have formed a constitution. The people of the Territory are to be presumed to have at one time desired admission into the Union as a State. Does it necessarily follow from these facts that Congress is bound to assume peremptorily that they still seek such admission, and that such admission must be accorded? At this point, in my mind, serious difficulties arise. I have not yet heard the argument that can solve them. After the dissolution of that convention, it remained to elect executive officers and a constitutional Legislature; and, in the opinion of the President, it further remained to take a vote at a popular election, upon the so-called submission of the slavery provision. The election of the State officers and of the Legislature were necessary to provide the machinery to set the new government in operation when the territorial government should be superseded by the act of admission; and the vote upon the submission of the slavery clause was, according to the opinion of the President, essential to give vitality to the work of the convention. These elections and their attending circumstances are, in my judgment, proper and necessary subjects of inquiry by this Congress. It is asserted upon most respectable authority, that remedies in respect to wrongs at these elections can be afforded elsewhere. I cannot find the place. Where, I ask, can a false return of the vote upon the submission of the slavery clause be corrected but here? Upon the act of admission the transaction is instantly complete; and that constitution is, without amendment, the fundamental law of Kansas. Where, I ask again, but here, can a false and fraudulent return of the election of State officers be corrected? At the moment of admission they are installed in the actual possession of the government of Kansas; they become entitled to be maintained in that possession by the power of the Federal Government; and, for aught I know, a usurpation may be instantly set up, which would work an outrage upon the people of Kansas, which the Government of the United States is powerless to counteract or remove.

Now, what are the facts? The president of the constitutional convention, in pursuance of the provisions of the schedule of the constitution, appointed commissioners, who appointed judges, who held the elections and returned the results to him, and to him alone. Admit that the officers holding these elections were sworn faithfully to perform their duties as required by the tenth section of the schedule: what security have we for an honest return as to either of the elections prescribed by the schedule? What security, I ask, but the personal integrity of Calhoun? While I know nothing of this gentleman which will justify me in saying a single word in his defamation, I have not learned enough of him to satisfy my mind that we can safely sanction and give the force of precedent to the most unjustifiable measure to which that convention resorted, in violation of the usages of the country—a measure unknown to the history of any State in the Union, and, in my judgment, for every reason, altogether unwarrantable. I speak of the assumption by Mr. Calhoun, I care not whether at his own suggestion, or at that of the convention, of supreme, unlimited, uncontrolled, and unwatched guardianship of the elections which were to ensue. I speak of the entire exclusion of every territorial officer, of every grade, from the Governor down to the lowest of its officials; and I venture to assert that it is the first time in the history of constitutional conventions that any one man, however exalted his integrity or unsuspected his character, has been solely charged with the execution of trusts so important and so vast. When one of our older States changes its form of government, it invariably takes the care to entrust the elections which are to place the new machinery of State in motion in the hands of its own acknowledged and accredited officers; and in every other case than that of Kansas, which has fallen under my observation, our Territories, when about to abandon their territorial organization, and to assume the powers of State sovereignty, have, I believe without exception, resorted to the precaution of associating with the president of the convention one or more of the territorial officers, in order that a usurpation of power may not occur in the act of transfer.

I am not satisfied that the constitutional convention had any legislative powers of a general description. None were granted them by the law of its creation. No such powers can be implied. The legislative power of Kansas, to the very hour I speak, remains vested in her Territorial Legislature. It was not in their power to alienate it, nor did they attempt such alienation. They could not declare that fraudulent voting at elections, to be held in pursuance of their schedule, should be crimes, or that fraudulent returns of such elections should be punishable. They did not prescribe punishments, and could not enforce the punishments which they might have prescribed. If this be true, these elections were held without the semblance of public security. The President, in his message of February 2, 1858, remarks, in respect to the January election for executive officers, as follows:

"If frauds have been committed at this election, either by one or both parties, the Legislature and the people of Kansas, under their constitution, will know how to redress themselves, and punish these detestable but too common crimes, without any outside interference."

With the greatest respect for the distinguished source from which that expression emanates, and satisfied that the heart of no man in America beats less in sympathy with fraud, in any of its forms, than his, I should like to be informed how the people of Kansas can redress themselves, and punish those crimes, except in the mode in which the people of San Francisco some few years since punished the stuffers of their ballot-boxes? Can the State Legislature of Kansas, which is to come into being upon her admission to the Union, enact a law to punish crimes committed before their existence began, notwithstanding the inhibition against ex post facto laws, declared as well in the Constitution of the United States as in the constitution of Kansas? Upon this point I cannot accede to the opinion of the President.

We thus have presented to us the case of elections in Kansas conducted without any of the safeguards which in every portion of the civilized world, where popular elections are held, invariably attend them. We thus have the case of a convention authorized by the people of Kansas, speaking through their Territorial Legislature, to frame a State constitution, and to do nothing more, usurping the powers of that people, and committing her future executive and legislative offices to the uncontrolled will of a single individual, and that individual not the man of their choice. You find that convention employing its own delegated powers to grant new ones to commissioners, to be still further delegated to judges of election, and all, so far as I can see, without the shadow of reasonable security. You find, in short, a provisional government, erected by a constitutional convention with limited authority, subverting the Territorial Legislature. Now how can this be justified? Are we bound by any iron rule to confirm any usurpation which may have followed this transaction? Where is the government which is to supervise upon the act of admission? Will you leave Kansas without government? Will you admit her to the Union, thereby repealing her territorial organization, and deprive her people of every kind of legal protection? Will you leave her murders to go unrevenged, and her incendiaries to go unrestrained, and withdraw the army, which might, for the time being at least, give her people the protection of a military despotism, until this new State government can be hunted out from its lair? Where is this government? Who are its officers? Are they known to the President? Are they known and recognized by the people of Kansas? What are their names? Where do they live? Are they in Kansas, or are they in Washington? Will they go to Kansas? When will they go? Who is to provide the armed force to set the new government upon its feet? Where is the living man that can disclose the secret of the names of the officers of this proposed new State government? Is there more than one such man? Should he perish by one of the casualties of life, would the secret die with him, or would he leave the record behind? Why has not that important secret been revealed?

Can you find a precedent in the history of the country for the admission of a State where the act of admission may, and probably will, instantly consign her to anarchy and ruin? Is there anything in the history of Kansas, or in the character of her people, which renders such a policy wise or statesmanlike? The President has informed us that the Territory of Kansas has kept for years in a state of almost open rebellion against its government, and at this moment an Army preserves her peace. Will the people, whose turbulence and lawlessness have been kept in subjection only by military power, who have been in constant rebellion against their own territorial government, yield ready obedience to a State government, the very names and persons of whose officers are undisclosed secrets in the breast of a single man, whose lips no power on earth can unseal? Congress, the President, and the people of Kansas are each and all powerless to compel him to break his ominous silence!

Mr. Chairman, when an application is made to Congress by the people of a Territory for their admission into the Union as a State, the very act of application implies the assent of the people of the Territory. The act of admission is the consent of Congress to the application. The whole transaction is by consent. The admission is a great privilege. It entitles her to participation, through her Representatives, in the councils of the first nation upon the face of the globe. It makes her a partner in the glories of our Revolution. It makes our history hers. The faith of the Federal Union becomes pledged to her for protection against invasion and domestic violence. She is secured the advantages of a republican government, with its unnumbered blessings. Her citizens acquire the privileges and immunities of the citizens in the several States. She shares in our exhaustless wealth—receives more than an imperial dowry. It is the meeting of father and child, after the days of infancy have passed. Parental affection, if chilled by long absence, renews its care, and filial love commences a lifelong career. All this is too large a reward for turbulence and wrong. Review our history. No State has ever yet been admitted as a punishment for the crimes of her people. If Kansas is still rebellious, let us not, from any miserable spirit of economy, or mistaken notion of expediency, bring her now into the sisterhood of States. She may light among them the fires of civil discord. At any rate, do not drag her in as a convict in chains. Keep her from her father's house till, passion all subdued, the work of repentance done, with calm and stately steps she knocks at the portals of her future home.

Mr. Chairman, is the voice we hear applying for admission the voice of Kansas? What, sir, is the evidence? John Calhoun, the president of the constitutional convention, in a letter to the President, of January 14, 1858, says that Kansas asks for admission into the Union as a sovereign State. The President informs us in his message of February 2, 1858: "that he has received from J. Calhoun, Esq., president of the late constitutional convention, a copy, duly certified by himself, of the constitution framed by that body, with the expression of a hope that he would submit the same to the consideration of Congress, with the view of the admission of Kansas into the Union as an independent State." The President recommends her admission, "with a view to terminate the Kansas question." This, sir, is the evidence, and the whole evidence, in support of the application. John Calhoun indorsed and certified by himself, with the expression of his hope that the President would submit the same to Congress.

But, sir, is this the only voice we hear from Kansas or her people? No! We hear another voice from Kansas. Her people, through their Territorial Legislature, under date of December 23, 1857, remonstrate and protest against her admission. They speak in tones louder and clearer than those of John Calhoun. They say that they have been disfranchised and defrauded, and that they do not seek admission into the Union under the Lecompton constitution, and claim the right to form and adopt a constitution for themselves. No discord marked their deliberations. The voice of her people comes upon us in one unbroken column: "We protest against admission under the Lecompton constitution."

To which of these voices shall we hearken?

It is contended, Mr. Chairman, that the constitutional convention speak through their president; that the people of Kansas cannot recall the assent which it is alleged they technically gave when their Territorial Legislature authorized its assembling; that there is no locus penitentia; that they signed the bond and must pay the forfeit; that the usurpation of that convention must be perpetuated by the action of Congress; and that our eyes and ears are closed to any iniquities, no matter how gross, which may have followed in its train.

Sir, shall representatives of the people of America respond by such cold and cheerless logics to the remonstrances of ten thousand men? Sir, I regard the whole argument as fallacious. That convention derived its power through the Territorial Legislature, who prescribed the limitations of the power. That Legislature still lives, exercising the sovereignty of the people of Kansas, while the convention, to whom they delegated the work of forming a constitution, shorn of their power, have become mingled and lost among her people.

Is there a man upon this floor who will lay his hand upon his heart and say, that if the constitution proffered to us had been silent upon the subject of slavery any such argument would have been deemed unanswerable?

If it had happened that the so-called free-State men of Kansas had, by similar processes or omissions, acquired control of the organization of that convention, and sought, against the wishes of the people of Kansas, as evidenced by the action of her Territorial Legislature, to impose a constitution upon them, to last even for an hour, it is my sincere belief that the representatives of the Democracy of the North would have stood, as we now stand, in calm and firm resistance to the wrong.

Mr. Chairman, can the people of Kansas change that constitution immediately, if we should place it upon them by the act of admission? If they can; if it so be that its imposition—if obnoxious to her people—if violative of the principle of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, and subversive of the theory of self-government which forms the base of our American system—can work but temporary evil, and bring about the result sought by the President, and declared by him as the sequence of admission, so cordially do I sympathize with his noble and patriotic declaration "that the peace and quiet of the whole country are of far greater importance than the mere temporary triumph of either of the political parties in Kansas," that I should with less hesitation give my vote in accordance with his recommendation.

But in the exercise of that private judgment which I have no right to resign, and with the strongest desire to accede to the policy of an Administration which I sincerely believe have the good of the country at heart, I find it impossible fully to concur. I am so constituted that I have not the power to resist the conclusions to which I arrive, after the most deliberate survey that I am able to take of the facts before me; and if the declaration of my honorable colleague, [Mr. TAYLOR,] that to err against such an Administration as that which has our confidence is criminal, be true, I have only to say that I would at any time commit the crime he denounces, to avoid the greater one of giving a vote which I conceive to be antagonistic to the true interests of the country, and violative of the principles of justice and of truth.

Mr. Chairman, the principle which justifies the American Revolution, namely, the right of resistance to a government which has become intolerable, and the right of the people to change their form of government, is recognized in the bill of rights of the Lecompton constitution. It underlies every State constitution, and is imbedded deep in the hearts of our people. It is the law of America.

In the exercise of that enduring and irrevocable right, the people of Kansas can unquestionably throw off the tyranny of any constitution which can be imposed upon them. But I find myself unable to accord with those who hold, that notwithstanding the prohibitions of a constitution, and in defiance of a specific mode of amendment or change expressly provided, the people can, at any time, subvert their fundamental law; I am inclined to agree with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KERR,] and others, who regard a reasonable degree of permanence as a valuable feature in our American system. I have no doubt but that the Legislature of any State may initiate the proceedings for a convention to frame a new constitution; that such convention may ordain a new fundamental law; that the people may acquiesce in the change, and thus the work of revolution be accomplished without violence or bloodshed. This spectacle has often been exhibited. But the Legislature, which is the machinery to set this train in motion, must be in the control of those who would disorganize and organize anew, otherwise an effort on the part of the people to change their constitution is the wild frenzy of the howling mob. To that dread remedy I would not subject even the rebellious people of Kansas.

It follows, therefore, that the power to change their constitution or form of government depends wholly upon the control which they can obtain of the machinery of the State.

The President has said in his message transmitting the Lecompton constitution:

"The Legislature [of Kansas] already elected, may at its very first session submit the question to a vote of the people, whether they will or will not have a convention to amend their constitution, and adopt all necessary means for giving effect to the popular will."

Make this declaration true, and assure its fulfillment in respect to Kansas, and I will vote for her admission as a measure of peace, and not otherwise. But the President's assertion of the acknowledged right of revolution, or any abstract assertion of that right which Congress may make, is very far from establishing the proposition that the people of Kansas "can make and remake their constitution at pleasure." You must, in addition, provide the machinery which will permit this great change of fundamental law to be attempted, without treason to established government, and without subversion of social order. Can this be done? I have no doubt of the power of Congress to prescribe conditions for the admission of a new State, and that without doing violence to the acknowledged principle of non-intervention. Congress cannot make or alter their constitution; but it can compel them to make one for themselves, or in default, deny their application for admission.

Mr. Chairman, something is due to the opinions of the Executive. Much of individual opinion may be sacrificed to meet the demand which the country makes, that the peace and harmony of the Union be not endangered. Something is to be yielded to produce harmony in that great party which, when united and acting in adherence to its principles, can guide the destinies of the nation. Something may, perhaps, be accorded to allay the irritability of the people of the South, excited by an entire misapprehension of the real and substantial difficulties which lie in the way of the admission of Kansas—difficulties which they themselves would regard as insurmountable could they become assured, as they ought to be, by their public men that the question of slavery is in no manner material to the issue.

And when I can be satisfied that the admission of Kansas can accomplish the ends indicated in the President's message; if it will, to employ his language, "restore peace and quiet to the whole country," "localize the excitement," "cause it to perish for want of outside aliment," "enable the Executive to withdraw the troops from Kansas," "and dissipate the dark and ominous clouds which now impend over the Union," and at the same time do no violence to the rights of the people of Kansas, and give no success to the frauds which have dishonored her name, I will no longer oppose.

But all these results cannot be secured without a clear, distinct, and unequivocal declaration in a form of a condition of admission. I will not be critical as to form, provided it shall honestly and effectually and certainly secure the great work of justice and pacification,—provided the scheme of admission shall be such as shall exonerate the Democratic party of the Union, and the Administration of their choice, from the imputation unjustly made, of seeking to impose upon the people of Kansas a constitution, which, from the evidence before us, I cannot force myself to the belief, is in accordance with the wishes of her people.

Mr. Chairman, speaking for myself alone, I doubt all the claims of Kansas for present admission; I distrust her possession of a sufficient population, or of that degree of stability and order which should be deemed preliminarily requisite to the intrustment of her people, with the plenary powers of State sovereignty; I am not satisfied that her proceedings have been sufficiently regular; I am not entirely convinced that the application to which it is proposed to listen, is that of the people of Kansas, speaking through the form in which their voice can be unmistakably recognized. While I take no pride in her history, while I have no sympathy with the scenes of fraud and violence which have signalized her career, while I detest the invasions upon the great rights of honest suffrage which have stained her traditions, I will, nevertheless, yield my reluctant assent to her admission to the Union, provided the bill can be so framed that no permanent mischief can result to Kansas or the country; and the people, who, under the guidance of Providence, are to develop her destinies, shall have secured to them the right to form, without wrong and without violence, the institutions under which they and their children are to live.

At the expiration of Mr. CLARK's hour, the hammer fell.

Mr. KILGORE obtained the floor.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move that the gentleman from New York have leave to proceed. I want to know where he is upon this question.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. KILGORE. I have no objection, if it does not come out of my time.

There was no objection, and Mr. CLARK continued his speech for ten minutes.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that the unanimous consent of the committee was given to the gentleman from New York to proceed with his remarks for a few moments beyond his time, and not ad infinitum.

Several MEMBERS. It is too late to object now. The CHAIRMAN. If objection is made, the gentleman from New York cannot proceed further. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KILGORE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. GROW. Is it not too late to make objection now? I rise to a question of order. My point is this: when the unanimous consent of the committee has been given for the gentleman from New York to continue his remarks is it not too late to make objection after he has proceeded?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order. Unanimous consent was not given to the gentleman for any particular length of time, but he occupied the floor during the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. GROW. I understood the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee to be, that the gentleman should finish his speech.

Mr. BURNETT. I understand that the gentleman from New York will conclude his speech in five minutes—I do not object to that. I am willing to allow him to go on for that length of time further; but I am not willing to concede to the gentleman, or any gentleman, the right to go on for hour after hour, in violation of our rules.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the understanding, then, that the gentleman from New York shall have leave to proceed for five minutes further.

There was no objection; and Mr. CLARK concluded his speech as above reported.

Mr. KILGORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not expect, at this late period of the session, when the all-exciting topic of controversy has been discussed in every form, to be able to introduce a single new idea, nor would I, on this occasion, open my mouth, but that it will be expected, perhaps, by those whom I represent here, that I should say something. I regret extremely to see that bitterness of feeling which is evinced on the part of gentlemen upon this floor in the discussion of this subject. I represent a peaceable, orderly, law-abiding Quaker constituency. The angry feeling with which they are denounced upon this floor would be startling to them if they could witness it as I have witnessed it for the last few months. I have been astonished to find gentlemen representing the interests of the South denouncing men upon this side indiscriminately as a band of Abolitionists, and applying to them the general charge of negro stealing. Why, sir, just such denunciations have tended to rouse that excitement of party feeling which now rages all over the country. The people of the North are denounced, and charged with every crime in the whole catalogue of crimes. It was remarked the other day that speeches made by southern gentlemen were sent by northern men to their constituents. That is true; and, on the other hand, when we happen to have an imprudent speaker upon our side of the House, who denounces your institutions in terms of bitterness, you also flood your country with his speeches. They are sent there, if not to the mass of the people, at least to the political leaders, for the purpose of showing northern sentiment towards southern institutions. Human nature is the same, North and South. We read your speeches; and we do it for the purpose of showing the feelings you entertain towards us and our institutions; and you circulate speeches made by gentlemen of the North, and they have the same effect—to excite public indignation against us.

These things are done, too, when partisan strife is raging all over this country with unbounded licentiousness.

But, sir, we are called Abolitionists, and denounced as fanatics. Why is this? Cannot gentlemen distinguish between abolishing slavery in the States where it exists by virtue of local laws, and extending it into Territories that are free? The difference is to me so palpable that I think no man ought to confound them. I am an old-fashioned Whig; and I stand, upon this slavery question, where the old Whig party stood; where that distinguished leader of the Whig party, the statesman of the nation, Mr. Clay, stood. Where slavery exists in a State by legal sanction, there let it alone. Where slavery exists by virtue of law, there let it alone, until those having the legal authority determine to abolish it. But, sir, where slavery does not exist; where Territories are free; where there is no law creating the institution, I say what that eminent leader said among his last declarations: "I never can and never will vote, and no earthly power will ever make me vote, to spread slavery over territory where it does not exist." But, sir, I am not alone on this platform of principles. I would like to inquire of southern gentlemen upon the other side, if they have examined Mr. Buchanan's political record closely? I would like to know whether they have not taken into their bosoms an Abolitionist? If I am an Abolitionist upon this subject, on account of occupying the ground I do, James Buchanan is an Abolitionist also, and has been one for the last forty years. True, he may have been baptized since the Cincinnati convention into the true faith of the South. Gentlemen will pardon me for calling their attention to a resolution signed by the distinguished occupant of the White House, in his native State, Pennsylvania, in the year 1819, when the Missouri question agitated the whole country:

"Whereas, the people of this State, pursuing the maxims, and animated by the beneficence of the great founder of Pennsylvania, first gave effect to the gradual abolition of slavery by a national act, which has not only rescued the unhappy and helpless African within their territory from the demoralizing influence of slavery, but ameliorating his state and condition throughout Europe and America; and whereas it would illly comport with those humane and Christian efforts to be silent spectators when this great cause of humanity is about to be agitated in Congress, by fixing the destiny of the new domains of the United States: Therefore,

"Resolved, That the Representatives in Congress from this district be, and they are hereby, most earnestly requested to use their utmost endeavors, as members of the National Legislature, to prevent the existence of slavery in any of the new Territories and States which may be created by Congress.

"Resolved, As the opinion of this meeting, that as the Legislature of this State will shortly be in session, it will be highly deserving of their wisdom and patriotism to take into their early and most serious consideration the propriety of instructing our Representatives in the National Legislature to use the most zealous and strenuous exertions to inhibit the existence of slavery in any of the Territories or States which may hereafter be created by Congress; and that the members of Assembly from this county be requested to embrace the earliest opportunity of bringing this subject before both Houses of the Legislature.

"Resolved, That, in the opinion of this meeting, the members of Congress who, at the last session, sustained the cause of justice, humanity, and patriotism, in opposing the introduction of slavery into the State, then endeavored to be formed out of the Missouri Territory, are entitled to the warmest thanks of every friend of humanity.

"Resolved, That the proceedings of this meeting be published in the newspapers in this city.

"JAMES HOPKINS,
"WILLIAM JENKINS,
"JAMES BUCHANAN.

"The foregoing resolutions being read were unanimously adopted; after which the meeting adjourned.

"WALTER FRANKLIN, Chairman.

"Attest: WILLIAM JENKINS, Secretary."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand the gentleman to say that Mr. Buchanan drew up those resolutions?

Mr. KILGORE. No, sir; I do not know that he drew them up. I say he signed them.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand him to say that he signed them?

Mr. KILGORE. I understand from the report of the papers published at that time, that Mr. Buchanan was one of a committee of three men who reported these same resolutions.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish the gentleman would give us his authority.

Mr. KILGORE. You will find it in the Lancaster Intelligencer, volume 21, No. 21, published in 1819.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. With the permission of the gentleman I desire to say a word. I have had occasion more than once to repeat what I am now about to say upon this subject; and that is, that Mr. Buchanan never signed the resolutions, and that they never had his sanction in any shape or form. His name was attached to them without his authority—as frequently happens—without his knowledge or assent. That is the simple history of the matter.

Mr. KILGORE. It is too late to deny this record after a silence of forty years.

Mr. PURVIANCE. I desire to ask my colleague if Mr. Buchanan did ever in any shape or form disavow the resolutions at that time?

Mr. FLORENCE. No; nor at any other time that he was assailed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am not aware that he did.

Mr. KILGORE. I cannot admit this cross-firing.

Mr. GROW. I would like to ask my colleague if Mr. Buchanan was in favor of the Missouri compromise?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. He gave his assent to it as a peace measure when every leading patriot in the country, North and South, advocated its passage to save the Union.

Mr. KILGORE. I am informed that this resolution was published in the newspapers of his own town, at the time, and that no one assumed to contradict it. I have no doubt, Mr. Chairman, that Mr. Buchanan's friends would be very anxious to deny a great many things connected with his political history.

But, sir, I was remarking that I occupy the position occupied by Mr. Clay, and the position occupied—as I understand it—by Mr. Buchanan at that particular time. I will not pretend to say what Mr. Buchanan's opinions are now. I admit that this is an age of progression, and that he is remarkably progressive for an old gentleman. It perhaps would not be amiss for me to remark here, that instead of being an Abolitionist, as the persons with whom I act are charged with being, I am a free-State man.

I was born and reared in a slave State, and I am proud of the State of my nativity, for it is one of the noblest of the old slave States of this Union. She has furnished heroes to the field, and statesmen to the council of the nation. It is the land of the lamented Clay. But, as I said, I now represent here a free interest. The State of my adoption is surrounded with everything that is calculated to endear me to free institutions. When I contrast the state of things there with what I learn of the condition of the extreme southern States, I am proud of my position. How do we stand? We have our free schools; we have our churches; we have our academies; we have our charitable institutions for the benefit of the deaf and dumb, the blind, and the insane. We have our thousands of miles of railroads, our fields teeming with abundance, our thriving towns, our flourishing cities—everything to endear us to our home. Can those gentlemen who have denounced us on this floor as Abolitionists say as much for themselves? I refer, for the condition of the extreme southern States, to the declarations of men who know all about them; who are not speaking at random, but who have been living witnesses of what they have described. My friend from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] did not exhaust all the materials yesterday. Gentlemen have hunted up the records of pauperism and crime in some of the northern States, particularly in the State of New York. To that I have no objection. New York is represented here by gentlemen who are able to defend her and her institutions. But I would call the attention of gentlemen to a few facts connected with the history of South Carolina. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BLAIR] quoted from a speech made by Mr. Gregg, in 1851, before the South Carolina Institute: "There is a party, however, which he did not quote, and which I will read:

"From the best estimates (says Mr. Gregg) that I have been able to make, I put down the white people who ought to work, and who do not, or who are so employed as to be wholly unproductive to the State, at one hundred and twenty-five thousand."

Out of a population of three hundred thousand, at the outside, there are one hundred and twenty-five thousand who are not employed at all, or so employed as to be wholly useless. Mr. Gregg follows this up by stating that all the capital, enterprise, and intelligence of South Carolina, are employed in directing slave labor; and that, "the consequence is, that a large portion of our poor white people are wholly neglected, and are suffered to while away an existence in a state but one step in advance of the Indian of the forest." But I am not yet through my quotations from Mr. Gregg. He says again:

"Shall we pass unnoticed the thousands of poor, ignorant, degraded, white people among us, who, in this land of plenty, live in comparative nakedness and starvation? Many a one is reared in proud South Carolina, from birth to manhood, who has never passed a month in which he has not some part of the time been stinted for meat. Many a mother is there who will tell you that her children are but scantily provided with bread, and much more scantily with meat; and, if they be clad with comfortable raiment, it is at the expense of these scanty allowances of food. These may be startling statements, but they are nevertheless true; and, if not believed in Charleston, the members of our Legislature, who have traversed the State in electioneering campaigns, can attest the truth."

Attest the truth of what? That there are thousands of men, not in her crowded cities, but in her remote districts, who are suffering for food and suffering for raiment. When gentlemen talk of the poor of the North, let them remember that they have the poor with themselves. Let them remember what Mr. Gregg says, that their poor are not more than half civilized. Here is raw material for them to operate upon. They have been operating upon it for a hundred years; and when they have been operating on it for a hundred years more, I have no doubt they will find still a surplus of that raw material.

Our churches and school-houses are prized as we prize our household gods. It is with these and with our plows, our looms, and our anvils, we advance our civilization. Would it be believed that in proud South Carolina such misery exists? And yet it is lamentably true, as Mr. Gregg attests.

It could not be otherwise when the rich and productive land is all owned and used by the slave owner, while the unfortunate poor whites are left to the sand-hills and pine-swamps, upon which a church mouse would starve if allowed the range of a thousand acres.

A Senator from South Carolina asks, what should we think if they should send missionaries among our people? Why, sir, the people of Indiana would like to see such missionaries from the South among their poor people. They would take great pains to aid them in their benevolent purposes. They would exhibit to them a people enjoying all the comforts of life; where free labor not only receives its merited reward, but is counted honorable. They would point them to the thousand monuments of general prosperity to be found all over our State. They would learn them the true value of our free institutions. When thus shown the peace, happiness, and prosperity, that pervades every class of society there; finding instead of white slaves, as the Senator seemed to think them, a noble set of freemen, fully informed as to all their rights; blessing and adorning a country where free thought, free speech, and a free press, are enjoyed to their fullest extent, and properly appreciated, I fear these same missionaries would hardly return to the South. But should they do so, and give the poor white men of the South a true history of what their eyes had beheld, they would flee from that region like rats from a sinking ship, until there would not be enough of them left to patrol the streets and plantations, and watch the slaves while their masters sleep.

But, says my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] you are making war upon southern institutions; and when you make war upon their institutions, the South will visit you with fire and sword. Well, sir, let them come. Let the gentlemen bring an army of the unfortunate poor of the South with them, with fire and sword. We will be glad to see them. We will not meet them with soldiers. We will treat them well; and the soldiers, attracted by our free institutions, will leave their colors. We have riot acts and may, perhaps, indict the leaders for riot; but we will inflict no greater punishment upon them. We will vindicate our laws, but treat them with kindness and still be just to the South; and when they get there, they will find it so great a paradise that they will be glad to find an asylum among us; and we will receive them with open arms.

A gentleman the other day read an extract from a speech delivered by the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. FAULKNER,] in the Legislature of that State, in 1832. Sir, the page which records that speech of the gentleman will stand as the brightest page in his biography. His name will stand recorded side by side with the great names of Washington, Jefferson, and many of the most distinguished men of Virginia or of the country. I would not have that page blotted out, were it mine, for all the wealth that slavery can give.

But there is another extract which I wish to read, from a speech delivered in the same debate by another distinguished Virginian. Mr. Curtis, in the Virginia Legislature, in the year 1832, in speaking of this institution, said:

"See the wide-spreading ruin which the avarice of our ancestral government has produced in the South, as witnessed in a sparse population of freedmen, deserted habitations, and fields without culture. Strange to tell, even the wolf, driven back long since by the approach of man, now returns, after the lapse of a hundred years, to howl over the desolations of slavery."

After one hundred years, the wolf will come back to howl over the desolations of slavery in old Virginia, the mother of States and statesmen—the mother of Presidents. We have driven them back from the West; they have gone beyond the voice of civilization, and we expect to keep them there. We do not expect they will come back to howl over our fields.

But, sir, our opposition to slavery, the gentleman says, is fanaticism; and a distinguished Senator, in the other end of the Capitol, [Mr. TOOMBS,] has told us that that fanaticism must be crushed out. Crushed out, sir! Let me tell that Senator that the fanaticism of which he speaks, if he chooses to call it so, is almost universal in the North. There is no man there who is an advocate of slavery. There is no man from that section of the country who will go before his constituents and advocate the extension of slavery. My colleague [Mr. HUGHES] does not support the bill for the admission of Kansas because he is in favor of the extension of slavery. It is because he loves the Democratic party, and because it is a party measure; and so it is with every Democrat from the North on this floor who supports the bill.

But northern Democrats told the people, after the repeal of the Missouri compromise line, there was no danger of slavery going to the Territories; that there were but three hundred and fifty thousand slaveholders in the whole Union—hardly enough to people a single State; and it was said, such being the case, why raise the question of slavery at all? that freedom will always outrun slavery in a fair race? Sir, the Democrats of the North are not in favor of slavery; it is a slander upon the Democratic party; but they are in favor of allowing the people, in settling up a country, to regulate their institutions in their own way. It is the doctrine of squatter sovereignty. They will speak against slavery, and they will vote against it, but they will leave it in the Territories to the action of the people; they will not endanger the peace of our institutions by attempting to prescribe here what shall be done.

Now, sir, we have frequently heard of a class of men known as dough-faces, men for whom even the South has no respect, in whom the South has no confidence. I ask if the Richmond South is not good authority on this subject? I will read a short extract from that paper:

"So Mr. DOUGLAS has shown his cloven foot to the South at last. I never believed he was whole-footed. All that he has ever done has been to cajole the South to choose between evils, to take the best she can get, to sugar over nauseous pills and bribe the southern members to coax the South to swallow them. I never had confidence in him. I have no confidence in any man north of Mason and Dixon's line. They cannot be our friends and be honest. The interests of the two sections are antagonistic. The northern man who goes for our interest necessarily goes against the interest of the North, his country, and I can have no confidence in a traitor, no matter how high is his price."

Thus speaks an ultra pro-slavery paper of northern men who follow the lead of the South. It is true, it speaks particularly of those who believe with Mr. DOUGLAS; but we must remember the declaration, that no northern men can be their friends and be honest.

Northern Democrats are now asked to leave the principles of their party and to come to the rescue of the South in the present question. Do southern men want them to become traitors? Do they want to induce them to turn their backs upon the interests of the people they represent?

But, sir, we are told that, if Kansas is not admitted, it will be taken for granted that no more slave States can be admitted into the Union. If they always come in the manner in which Kansas presents herself hereto-day, I hope to God none ever will be admitted into the Union; but when a State comes here with a constitution formed by the people, and they ask for slave institutions, then, and not till then, if she be refused admission into the Union, will southern gentlemen have a right to take it for granted that we shall refuse admission to any more slave States. In the North the sentiment is universal, however, that no more slave States shall be formed out of the territory north of the Missouri compromise line, or any other free territory. Show us where a slave State, with a slave constitution, adopted by a fair vote of the people, is kept out of the Union, and then southern gentlemen will have some good reason to complain. But, they say that the North is disposed to encroach upon the rights of the South. Why, sir, there is no man in the North who will infringe upon a southern man's rights. Even the Abolitionists, some two thousand in number, would not interfere with your slaves in States where they are held by law. What is their position? They want to go out of the Union because they cannot separate themselves from slavery in the Union. So with some southern men; they want to go out of the Union because they cannot, by remaining in it, succeed in extending slavery as they would wish. I have about as much regard for the one as the other. I will tell you what I would do with these men. I would colonize them together upon the burning sands of the south or icy shores of the northern lakes; and there I would leave them to carry out their project of dissolution by dissolving themselves, until only a single man was left; and then I would not care if he, like the London juggler, would swallow himself. [Laughter.]

Why talk about dissolving this Union? Can that dissolution be a peaceable one? Can our honored flag be trailed in the dust without first being stained with the blood of our people? No, sir, it cannot be done peaceably, and you have no right to talk about a dissolution by force. The attempt would be treasonable. You may have the power to involve the people of the two sections of this nation in civil war; you may have the power, by force and violence, to destroy the beautiful system of government which we inherit from our fathers—to ruin everything dear to the lovers of our common country; but then, let me ask, what would the South gain by it? If the attempt should result, as it most assuredly would, in civil war, spreading all over this Union, laying waste our fruitful fields and destroying our homes, putting out the fires of our furnaces and forging, stopping the machinery of our manufactories, and silencing the hum of busy industry all over the free North, what would you of the South gain by all this? Your slaves would not be worth a dime to you, but instead of being a blessing, as you now consider them, they would prove your greatest curse; from being your submissive, obedient servants, they would become the instruments of mischief in the hands of your enemies, and the general desolation that would follow, might serve not only to remind us of the proud state from which we had fallen, but would allow the tyrants of the old world to point at us as another evidence of the incapacity of the people to govern themselves. Broken to pieces by our own madness, we would be fit objects of universal scorn.

Mr. Chairman, you say, in the South, that you have important interests. We raise cotton, say you—so you do. We raise sugar—so you do; and we rejoice in the North, when we hear that there are good crops of sugar and cotton; and we regret it, when there is a failure of either. We rejoice when you rejoice, and mourn when you mourn. Your cotton is useful to us. We receive the raw material of your producers, and by our skill and handywork, aided by our machinery, transform it into fabrics useful and ornamental. Your sugar we need. It is, if not a necessary, at least a luxury of life that we are not willing to dispense with. Sir, as an evidence of our liberality towards you, even while your men were denouncing the doctrine of protection, when we wished to aid and protect northern interests, and you refused it, we, by our votes, aided in giving your sugar protection by a tariff that caused the consumers of that article to pay, in the form of duties, during the last year, nearly thirteen million dollars. Thus, when called upon, we have ever been ready to protect your interests—even when you have refused to aid us in protecting northern manufacturers and northern interests. And now, simply because we refuse to join you in a crusade against the rights of the people of Kansas, we are pronounced sectional and unjust to the South. Sir, you ask too much at our hands. We have given you protection, and you offer to pay us by oppression.

Mr. Chairman, I believe that if we admit Kansas under the present circumstances, it will be a violation of the rights of the people. I do believe that if we protect the rights of the people they will always protect the rights of the States. There will be no danger if their rights be guarded and protected; but when you deny them the right to the enjoyment of life and property, and the right to self-government so far as concerns the institutions under which they live; when you attempt to force an organic act upon them against their will, simply because you have the power to do so, it is not to be expected that they will respect those who have done them this wrong. You may have the power, by executive influence and aid, to consummate this outrage. But what will it profit you? Nothing, absolutely nothing. The laurels will wither in their winning; the spoils will not be worth possessing, while you may set an example—not worthy indeed of imitation, or to be cited as a precedent—but which, at no distant day, may be thus cited and imitated to your serious harm.

But it comes in due form of law, say gentlemen; and, as a gentleman said the other day, that is all there is of it. It has the form without the substance. As good and as valid a constitution might have been gotten up by this John Calhoun, and Henderson, and these other fugitives from justice in this city, in some grocery in Missouri, which, so far as forms are concerned, would have been as correct an expression of the will of the people of Kansas as that contained in the constitution which they have already presented.

I speak of these gentlemen as fugitives from Kansas. I understand that they are officers of Kansas, and ought to be there; but I am inclined to think that they have been led to believe that this is the safest place for them; for there is a marine force here that was called upon to shoot down citizens in the streets, and which may be called out to protect them from the indignation of an outraged people.

But we have the forms of law, say they. Well, sir, there are some peculiar forms which have been required in reference to this constitution. My worthy friend from Oregon [Mr. LANE] rose in his place in this House, and said, "Mr. Speaker, I present to you the constitution of the people of Oregon." There was no excitement about it, no difficulty, and no one objected. Has there been three months' discussion over it? No. Kansas had her Delegate, too, upon this floor, on this side of the House. Why was it that that gentleman was not permitted to speak for Kansas? Why was he not permitted to get up and announce to this House that he presented to this House the constitution of Kansas? Who shall speak for the people of Kansas, when they do not speak for themselves, but their representative here? Oregon comes here of her own free will, with a constitution indorsed by her people, submitted to them in every form and shape for their determination. How comes Kansas? Kansas, covered all over with violence, is driven in here against her will. She comes here with her robes soiled; she comes by force and violence, and it becomes necessary

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, MARCH 26, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 83.

that the executive robes should be put upon her. The Executive sends in a long message, telling you that the people of Kansas have formed a constitution, and that he has received it from the hands of John Calhoun. Not content with that, he must read to you a history of the villainies and outrages that have been perpetrated by the majority upon the minority in Kansas.

"Well," say gentlemen, "we cannot go behind the record, where all looks right upon its face." It does look fair upon its face if you will shut your eyes to the truth, and close your ears to everything. But we tell you the whole matter is rotten, and ask you to investigate it. How are we met in that request? We have had to encounter executive influence, and an investigation is denied us. How, then, can gentlemen get up and say that this constitution expresses the true will of the people of Kansas, when they refuse to allow us to bring proof to establish beyond controversy that it is the consummation of the vilest frauds that have ever been perpetrated.

The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. Bishop] told you the other day what you would get by it—that slavery would get the shell and freedom the oyster. There is truth in that. How can you expect to maintain slavery in Kansas with three fourths of her people opposed to the constitution? What good will it do you unless you have laws to protect your slaves? Can you maintain it against the will of a community, even if you have laws to give sanction to holding slaves? I see gentlemen from the South here who know that it cannot be done.

But we are blamed for maintaining the position we do. Here let me say that there may be no misunderstanding, that I have a very high regard for the judicial tribunals of my country; but, sir, I have no regard for political decisions pronounced by a political court. I never had, and I never will have. Slavery, I assert, cannot exist in the absence of positive law in its favor. The doctrine established, as gentlemen say, by the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, is that slavery exists in all the Territories. Here, again, I follow my old political leader, Henry Clay. He said, in the debate on the compromise measures:

"Far different would, I fear, be our case, if, unhappily, we should be led into war, into civil war—if the two parts of this country should be placed in a hostile position towards each other, in order to carry slavery into new territories acquired from Mexico. Mr. President, we have heard—all of us have read—of the efforts of France to propagate—what, on the continent of Europe? Not slavery, sir, not slavery, but the rights of man; and we know the fate of her efforts at propagandism of that kind. But if, unhappily, we should be involved in war, in civil war, between the two parts of this Confederacy, in which the effort upon the one side should be to restrain the introduction of slavery into the new territories, and upon the other side to force its introduction there, what a spectacle should we present to the astonishment of mankind, in an effort, not to propagate rights, but—I must say it, though I trust it will be understood to be said with no design to excite feeling—a war to propagate wrongs in the territories thus acquired from Mexico. It would be a war in which we should have no sympathies, no good wishes; in which all mankind would be against us; in which our own history itself would be against us; for, from the commencement of the Revolution down to the present time, we have constantly reproached our British ancestors for the introduction of slavery into this country."

But it is said here that this was originally slave territory; that slavery existed there when we acquired it from France. Well, that was certainly so; but slavery was abolished there north of the line 36° 30', and the compromise by which it was abolished was assented to for the third of a century. But the very moment that this territory is open for settlement, it is seized upon and converted to slavery, not alone by fraud but by force and arms. An effort is made by the force of this Government to wrest it from freedom and to secure it to slavery forever. The North performed its share of the contract. The South said that we should have freedom north of that line, and we said that you might have slavery south of it; but the South now violates its compact, and insists on having slavery north of it.

But gentlemen say that this Lecompton constitution has all the forms of law in its favor. Well, let me ask these gentlemen this question: if the delegates to that convention had been elected by a full and fair vote of all the people of the Territory, and had ingrafted on that constitution certain provisions odious to all the people, and that people, before the act was consummated, came to Congress and protested against it, is there a man in this House—if the negro question was not involved in it—who would stand up and disregard that protest? If Oregon had come here with a constitution, and if her Delegate on this floor protested against it, and her Territorial Legislature protested against it, and ten thousand of her citizens were found protesting against it; and if the North, in spite of all that, attempted to force that constitution upon them, denunciations loud and long would have come from the South. There is not a southern man that would not have been loud in his defense of the right of the people to form their own constitution. But, because there is a negro in this question, there is no such denunciation.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to put a question to my colleague.

Mr. KILGORE. I have not time to be interrogated.

Mr. HUGHES. The question is very short. It is this—

Mr. KILGORE. I would cheerfully yield to my colleague, if I could; but I have only a few minutes left. Then, sir, we have this case presented to us: We have the protest of the people of Kansas, we have the protest of their Territorial Legislature, we have the protest of their representative on this floor. And what excuse, let me ask southern gentlemen, will you take home to your people, who love liberty, in justification of your effort to force on the people of Kansas institutions which they abhor? You may say that you wanted to test the question of the admission of slave States; but the intelligent portion of your constituents will tell you that you might have had a better ground than Kansas to test it in.

And now, let me say to southern gentlemen that I am the last man who would justify the slightest encroachment upon them. I would not tolerate it in word or deed. I hope that these gentlemen will at least acquit me of a desire to steal their negroes. I will let them alone; but let me ask gentlemen of the South to keep the negroes to themselves, and not thrust them into our faces. You have got the larger portion of the country. Keep your negroes and enjoy it. But leave the free Territory of Kansas to the unfortunate poor of the slave States and to the unfortunate poor of the free States. The Republican party, which is here opposing the admission of Kansas under this constitution, is in favor of giving the land of this Territory, in limited quantities, to the poor man South and to the poor man North, instead of giving it to overgrown corporations. We are in favor of distributing it to secure homes to the poor of both sections. Let southern men tell their constituents that, and, my word for it, they will approve the position taken by the Republican party in this matter.

Now, I know that the name of "Abolitionist" is an odious name to the people of the South. I have been told, and I have no doubt truly, that mothers in the extreme South, when their children are unruly, threaten them with an Abolitionist. I have been told that it is not unusual, when a negro becomes a little overbearing, for his master to threaten to take him to Indiana and sell him to an Abolitionist; and that the very threat causes the poor negro to almost cry his eyes out. We do not want to have that reputation among the people of the South. Let us have no more quarreling over the negro question. I have not referred to the poverty of the South with angry feelings, or with any other than those of regret. I find many very fine gentlemen here from the South. It may be in part attributable to their long association with gentlemen from the North. I hope the benefits may be reciprocal. Let us be done with wrangling, and decide this question according to the principles of righteousness and the will of the people of Kansas, and the country will be satisfied.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, this Kansas question is important in itself. It is also connected, in the course of the arguments pursued here, with many other questions and considerations which give to it an importance that is not ordinarily bestowed on questions coming up for decision by the Congress of the United States. I desire, before the vote be taken on the question of the admission of Kansas into the United States, to give my views upon the subject. I am glad, therefore, that I now have the opportunity to explain to this body, to the people whom I have the honor to represent, and to the country, if you please, the reasons which will control me in the vote which I propose to give when the question comes up legitimately.

I have the honor to represent, in part, the State of Maryland. The district which I represent is not affected by many of the considerations which control other sections. It is a quiet, beautiful section of country. All that the people there desire, in the movements of this great Government, is, that it will keep within constitutional limits; that the rights of all sections may be preserved; that aggression shall not be allowed from any quarter—neither from the South upon the North, nor from the North upon the South—but that the Government may move along in the path prescribed for it by the great charter that holds together the liberties of the people of this country.

Now, sir, Kansas has applied for admission into this Union. I take it for granted—because, I believe, it has not been questioned or denied from any quarter—that it is the will of the people of that unfortunate Territory that Kansas may be incorporated into the Union as one of the States.

The only question that embarrasses, is as to the method—the modus operandi, if you please. Well, sir, what is to be done? How are we to act? We are obliged either to admit Kansas or to reject her. It has been said that fraud exists, and has existed, in the proceedings of Kansas. Well, sir, we are obliged to affirm or disaffirm it. If we reject her, we assume the responsibility of saying that there have been such frauds, such malpractices, in the proceedings of Kansas, as to justify us in refusing to admit her into the Union. I present this view to the gentlemen who are willing to assume the responsibility of refusing to admit Kansas into the Union. There is no dodging the question. We must either, by voting for the admission of Kansas, affirm the regularity and correctness of the proceedings there, or, by voting against her, affirm that such frauds and irregularities have existed, and do exist, as justify us in rejecting her.

Now, I say to the men who go for law and order, to the men who go for regularity in the movements of this Government in all its dependencies, has anything existed in the proceedings of the Territory of Kansas sufficient to justify us in refusing her admission? I go back to the election of her first Legislature. Who had the right to decide who were the legally-elected members of that Legislature? That Territorial Legislature had the right to decide for itself upon all questions of contested elections, and no outside authority could interfere. We have the authority of the distinguished gentleman who was author of the organic act of that Territory, that the proceedings of that Legislature were regular and legal; that the Territorial Legislature elected in March, 1855, was in this respect unexceptionable. And I think the authority of that gentleman is conclusive upon that point so far.

Then, to follow up these proceedings, you find the people of Kansas in convention assembled. Now, in deciding upon the regularity of this body, you must look at its origin, and take it in all its stages. I ask gentlemen who are opposed to the admission of Kansas into the Union, at what stage of the proceedings of that body were fatal irregularities? The first Legislature, I have assumed, was regular and legal. They decided in relation to the election, returns, and qualifications of their own members. Who had the right to determine in regard to the legality of the elections of the members of the convention? Why, the convention itself. It would be a gross usurpation for the Congress of the United States to undertake to decide who were the legally-elected members of that convention. They had the right to decide the question for themselves. They did decide it. They adopted a constitution. How does that constitution appear here for our action upon it? The President of the United States, by the request of the president of that convention, has sent his message to the House of Representatives, and to the Senate of the United States, conveying intelligence to us that this constitution has been adopted by the State or Territory of Kansas. We have the authority of the Administration, therefore, so far as the facts were in its possession, that the proceedings have been regular, and that the constitution here presented is such as properly to justify us in admitting the State.

Now, the question which any plain commonsense man would naturally ask is, what interest had the President of the United States in recommending the admission of Kansas under this constitution? What interest had the members of his Cabinet? Why do they recommend to the Congress of the United States the admission of Kansas under this constitution? Has Mr. Buchanan any personal object to accomplish? It has been announced by himself, it has been reiterated by his friends, that having reached the highest point of his earthly desires, he is no longer before the country for any additional honors, further than the fair discharge of his duty. The desire of his ambition, I suppose, is accomplished, and he is not a candidate for reelection. Here, then, is the President of the United States, entirely disinterested in his motives, coming from the northern State of Pennsylvania, recommending the admission of Kansas. I speak with no degree of deference to the opinion of Mr. Buchanan more than I would of any other man under like circumstances, occupying a similar position. I think his opinion, certainly, in this view, is entitled to some consideration.

But if gentlemen attempt to set aside the proceedings of the Territorial Legislature as illegal, what comes of the legislation, which is the work of that body? Marriages have been solemnized, estates have been administered, under laws enacted by that Legislature. Is there any member of this House, I do not care to what party he belongs, who will undertake to say that the whole proceedings which have taken place under the authority of the government of that unfortunate Territory are illegal? Oh no, I apprehend not.

But we are met with two classes of objectors. One class—the Black Republicans—affirm that the whole government was founded in fraud; that the public sentiment was overruled or perverted by border ruffianism from Missouri—

Mr. HUGHES. I ask the gentleman from Maryland to yield the floor for a moment.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Yes, sir.
Mr. HUGHES. I understand my colleague, [Mr. KILGORE] to represent himself to the House as an old Whig, and as standing upon the platform of Henry Clay. I wish merely to read what he has heretofore said in reference to the fugitive slave law, a measure with which I believe Henry Clay had some connection, in order that it may be understood what kind of an old Whig he is. I read from the debates of the Indiana constitutional convention:

"In the discussion of the propriety of referring this section, no gentleman had as yet been found willing to take upon himself the advocacy of the odious fugitive slave law, which, since its recent passage, had created so much excitement, and upon which, in connection with this section, he desired to speak briefly.

"He would remark here that he did not wish to be misunderstood in what he should have to say upon this subject of the fugitive slave bill, so intimately connected with the section then under consideration. He was not in favor of repudiating the fugitive slave law while it remained on their national statute-book. Black and odious as it was, he had no objection to its enforcement, provided the officers of justice could carry into execution its provisions. The principle of the bill—the recapture of the slave by the master—he would not controvert; it was the details of it that were odious in his estimation. It would be the proudest hour in his life, if he should have to surrender his property and personal liberty by a refusal to obey the mandates of an officer who should attempt, in this land of freedom, to carry out those details. While he was willing, as he before said, to see the law carried out, if it could be—although he would not himself assist in its execution—he hoped no gentleman of any party would, during their deliberations here, become the advocate of so odious a measure. He was no Abolitionist. He was under as little obligation to that party as any gentleman on that floor; but, while he repudiated all connection or fraternity whatever with that class of their fellow-citizens, so far as their peculiar action was concerned, he must be permitted to enter his protest against the doctrine that the slaveholders of Kentucky and other southern States had the right to use the freemen of Indiana like blood-hounds to catch their slaves."

I merely read this in order that it may go before the world in connection with the statement of my colleague, that he speaks as a national Whig. I will not trespass upon the indulgence of the gentleman from Maryland, or I could strengthen the point which I make against my colleague, by some other and stronger proofs.

One word more. I understand my colleague to say that he is opposed to the admission of Kansas as a slave State, because of the repeal of the Missouri compromise. Here is the resolution of the Republican State convention of Indiana of 1856, of which my colleague was a member, and upon which his party made the canvass of 1856:

"Resolved, That we will resist, by all proper means, the admission of any slave State into this Union formed out of the territories secured to freedom by the Missouri compromise, or otherwise."

Mr. KILGORE. Will the gentleman from Maryland permit me to ask my colleague a question? Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Certainly.

Mr. KILGORE. Has not my colleague said, even since the commencement of this session, that the Dred Scott decision was not the law, and that nobody could pretend that it was the law?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think that I ever uttered such a sentiment in my life.

Mr. KILGORE. At no time?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not think I ever did at any time. I know that the gentleman's party charged me, during the last canvass, with being in favor of white slavery. They made the charge distinctly.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I presume, Mr. Chairman, it is best for me to go on with my remarks, as these gentlemen can adjust their dispute in their own way when they get home, subject only to the Constitution of the United States. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, in reference to the admission of Kansas, we are met with two objections. I understand that the gentlemen who follow the fortunes of the distinguished Senator from Illinois, [Judge DOUGLAS], to take the ground that everything was regular in the proceedings in Kansas, or sufficiently so as not to authorize any legitimate complaint; but they say that this constitution has not been submitted to the people, or is not an embodiment of the will of the people. The other objectors take the ground that the whole government in Kansas was founded in fraud. We are met, therefore, with these two objections.

Well, sir, in relation to the admission of a State into the Union, we find under the Constitution of the United States that Congress has the power to admit new States. I hold that it is not the primary consideration whether a people proposing to be admitted have a constitution or not. The great question here is whether we shall admit Kansas into the Union. The Constitution of the United States does not say that when a State is admitted into the Union that she shall have a constitution; and you do not find in the clause authorizing Congress to admit new States, anything said about a form of government. In another clause you find the language, that the United States shall guaranty to every State a republican form of government. It is not Congress, but the United States. It does not say that the United States should admit new States into the Union, and the Congress shall guaranty the States a republican form of government; but that Congress shall admit new States, and the United States shall guaranty to the States republican forms of government. Now, when Kansas comes here is she compelled, as a preliminary, to have a republican form of government. How can you guaranty this until she is in? It seems to me to be untenable to require that when a State comes in she should necessarily have a republican form of government, because she must first be admitted as a State before you can guaranty to her a republican form of government. The word "guaranty" is one of peculiar import. It does not say that the State shall have a republican form of government before admission; but that the United States shall guaranty a republican form of government. Rhode Island came into the Union under the British charter; and she did not determine for a considerable time after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, whether she would come into the Union or not. When she came in no question was asked as to her constitution. She had not a republican constitution when she came into the Union, according to our theory. She had not a constitution of that form, because she was living under the charter which she had derived from King Charles II. I therefore hold that it is not absolutely material whether a State, when she comes into the Union, has a constitution or not. She may, in fact, have a republican form of government without a constitution. She may settle all her proceedings in mass convention or in a Legislative Assembly.

Now, sir, States which have come into the Union have been admitted in different ways. There is no particular plan or method required. Some have been admitted by joint resolution, as was the case with Indiana. Some have been introduced by an act of Congress, express and direct, and others have been admitted by necessary implication. Ohio was never admitted formally by an act of Congress; but Congress, in the passage of a law, recognized her by reciting in the act, substantially, that she was in the Union.

Vermont was the first new State admitted into the Union, which occurred on the 18th February, 1791. Congress required no constitution, and none was submitted by her.

Kentucky, being the second new State, was admitted on the 1st of June, 1792. Her constitution was never submitted to Congress.

Tennessee was the third new State. She formed her constitution the 6th of February, 1796, and the same was submitted to Congress.

Ohio was the next. Having formed her constitution on the 29th of November, 1802; in February, 1803, an act of Congress was passed providing for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Ohio, and merely reciting that she had become a State of the Union. Congress had nothing to do with her constitution, and she became a State by necessary implication, as I have before stated.

Louisiana, on the 7th of April, 1812, was admitted into the Union by act of Congress.

Indiana came in on the 11th December, 1816, by a joint resolution, as before mentioned, having adopted her constitution on the 20th June, 1816. The State of Rhode Island continued for a long time without any constitution, having for her form of government, simply the charter from King Charles II., and for a considerable period, declined to adopt the Federal Constitution, and when she came in, no question was made as to the character of her government. General Washington, President of the United States, on the 1st of June, 1790, congratulated Congress upon the introduction of Rhode Island, in the following manner:

UNITED STATES, June 1, 1790.
Gentlemen of the Senate and House of Representatives: Having received official information of the accession of the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations to the Constitution of the United States, I take the earliest opportunity of communicating the same to you, with my congratulations on this happy event, which unites under the General Government, all the States which were originally confederated; and have directed my Secretary to lay before you a copy of the letter from the president of the convention of the State of Rhode Island to the President of the United States.
GEORGE WASHINGTON.

There does not appear to have been much consideration as to the character of the constitutions of the new States, or whether they had any or not, or as to the method of admission, until Missouri made her application. She was admitted, after long and angry controversy, and a restriction was adopted as to the admission of any future State lying north of 36° 30', undertaking to prohibit the introduction of slavery. This was in restraint of their indefeasible right under the Constitution, producing inequality of privilege. After an experience of thirty years it was discovered to have no solid foundation, and was ignored by the general adjustment of 1850, and repealed formally by the Kansas-Nebraska act of 1854, and pronounced to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the United States in the Dred Scott case. In its place, the policy was inaugurated, to submit the settlement of the slavery question, as indeed all other domestic questions, to the respective people of each Territory, when they regularly undertook to establish State governments. This plan fully maintained the equality of the States, and disposed of the slavery question, fairly, and without subjecting any State or section to disparagement or injustice.

We find, then, from the history of the Government and from precedent, that there has been no particular form of admission adopted. Some have been ushered in by act of Congress, one by joint resolution, and another by necessary implication. I hold, therefore, that the main question which is to govern Congress when they undertake to admit a new State into the Union is, not to assume with great nicety to look into and see what sort of a constitution she has. It is not to be expected that these territorial governments will settle all matters with the same precision as you would solve a mathematical proposition. The leading inquiries are, have they sufficient numbers and the ability to assume and maintain an independent government? If they have, you admit them into the Union. As to the question whether they have a constitution or not, it is secondary and subordinate, and is a matter more of form than substance. In the case of Rhode Island, about the Dorr rebellion, as it was called, before the Supreme Court, there being a dispute as to which government had the control, the old or the new, it was decided to be a political question, and they would not, per se, undertake to settle it. The President and the Congress of the United States, under some circumstances, have to decide such questions. It would seem we take cognizance of the case not so much with the view to ascertain whether a State has a republican government as to identify the government.

In the discussion of this question I have heard a great deal said in regard to slavery. Why, sir, there is a great deal of humbug and flummery in that. Why should the North require any restriction? Suppose you strike out from the constitution of every northern State all restrictions upon this subject—what would it amount to? Would there be any slaves there to disturb some conscientious nerves? I apprehend not. Take Pennsylvania or Ohio, neighboring States, and strike out the restriction from their constitutions and laws, and in all probability you will have no more slaves in those States than you have now under the restriction. The people of the South are obliged, in their section of the country, to have and employ such servants as may be had where slavery exists. It suits our social institutions, and the temper of our people, and the necessity of the case, to do so. Now, I submit to our friends upon the other side of the House, if the people from the South choose to go into northern States with their families for pleasure, amusement, or other cause, why should they not be permitted to take their necessary servants with them, and be treated hospitably, in the same manner as northern men go into southern States with their families and domestics? The law of politeness and gentility recommends this in a Government like ours, founded as it was in an era when slavery existed in every State of the Union; and I submit to the other side of the House whether they are not violating the Constitution of the United States in its letter and spirit, by putting at defiance all those principles and rules of good breeding, civility, and courtesy, justly due from one freeman to another?

Why, Mr. Chairman, this is not so much a question of slavery and anti-slavery, so far as this Kansas matter is concerned, as it is of government or no government—whether we are to have anarchy or the supremacy of law. Do not gentlemen concede that Congress has the power to admit new States into the Union? No one disputes this proposition. Well, suppose that, right or wrong, per fas aut nefas, Kansas is admitted; is not that a legitimate decision? Can an appeal be taken from it? Will not that proceeding be recognized? or will you make war upon the action of Congress as you have made war upon the Legislature of Kansas, and upon the constitutional convention? If Congress thinks proper, in the exercise of its delegated power, to admit Kansas, will you make war upon Congress, and say that Congress acted without authority? Will you not be bound and estopped by its action?

But, sir, the opponents of this measure have, in the progress of the debate, made war upon all the institutions of the country. They have made war upon Judge Lecompte, the chief justice of Kansas, a pure, upright, and accomplished judge, who has discharged all his duties with signal ability and fidelity under most difficult and embarrassing circumstances. On what ground has he been assailed? When you undertake to bring accusations against a judge, you ought to be prepared with proof to substantiate them. Where is the evidence here? None upon the face of the earth, but senseless clamor and insane abuse. It is an assault, not only on the Legislature and convention of Kansas, but on the judicial authority which derives its power from the Federal Government.

Is it not the same with regard to the Supreme Court of the United States—the highest judicial tribunal known to our Government? Does that high court command the respect of the opponents of this measure? Not at all. The same sort of assault is made upon that court. And I may here make a similar remark in regard to the members of that court that I have advanced in reference to Mr. Buchanan, when I said that Mr. Buchanan, now verging on threescore and ten, might be considered disinterested. Who compose the Supreme Court? Go into that tribunal and see what motives could actuate the men who wear the judicial ermine there, from the Chief Justice down. There is the honorable Roger B. Taney, the Chief Justice, a man of morality, of religion, of unimpeachable character. What motive has he for deciding in favor of the South, against the North? He is a man who must very soon, in accordance with the laws of nature, be called upon to have his actions below reviewed by the highest superhuman tribunal. What interest, I repeat, has he to decide this great question in regard to the constitutionality or unconstitutionality of the Missouri compromise in favor of the South against the North? None, none. Why then make such an assault on the Supreme Court? Look at the other Judges. Do they all come from the South? Where was Judge Nelson? Where was Judge Grier? These are northern gentlemen, representing, if you please, northern States, imbued somewhat, possibly, with the northern views. Did not they concur in the opinion of the court? The court was agreed, with the exception of Judge McLean and Judge Curtis. Judge Curtis has since resigned his seat; and, at the time of that decision, did not intend to remain on the bench. Judge McLean has been talked of for the Presidency. If I thought proper to speculate as to the motives of gentlemen here, I might have a field for doing so. But I shall not undertake to impute improper motives to these judges. I will not do it. But I will say, consider the character of that court. See how the majority and how the minority decided. You will find that the majority, consisting of gentlemen living in the North as well as in the South, adjudged this question without regard to anything but the law and the Constitution applicable to its merits, with all becoming modesty and judicial propriety, and with distinguished learning and ability.

How has it been also in the State of Massachusetts? Look at the case of Judge Loring. There was a judge who, I am told by all who knew him, was perfectly incorruptible; a man pure and undefiled. Has he not been swept by the besom of destruction, simply because he performed his duty? Alas! alas, for Massachusetts! I say, then, that this is a question involving grave considerations; whether we shall have a Government or no Government; whether law and order are to prevail, or this system of fanaticism from the North shall be permitted to run riot, to overturn the Supreme Court, upset all the hallowed institutions of the nation, and to inaugurate a reign of terror?

But, suppose you carry out your views, and emancipate, if you please, all the slaves of the South—what will be your condition? When you have made the constitutional guarantees of the Government as but a rope of sand, what will you have got to protect you at the North from the very same elements that now make war on the property in the slaves of the South? You may have a system of agrarianism there, and everything will be settled, regardless of the rights of property, of the Constitution, and of the consecrated maxims of law and order, by a wild and uncontrollable mob—popular sovereignty, if you please, with a vengeance. The very same elements that are now making war on the property of the South will, when they cut loose from all wholesome restraints and restrictions, make war upon the conservative institutions of the North; and then there will be no safety throughout the land, your Government, founded by your revolutionary fathers, overthrown, and madness and folly inaugurated in its stead.

Now let me refer gentlemen of the North to the precedents set by their forefathers. How have they acted? When did you hear anything from them about the poor Indian or the negro? Who, I should like to know, has now the original if not the best, right to the Territory of Kansas, the border ruffian, as you term him, from Missouri, the emigrant from Massachusetts, or the poor, untutored Indian? The policy now urged on the part of northern men tends, if carried out to its legitimate results, to equalize the two races—the black race and the white race—not to raise the black man up, but to pull the white man down to the level of the negro. Equality of races—that is the doctrine. Take the venerable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Giddings,] whom I desire to treat with no personal disrespect, who has been here longer than any other member on this floor, and whom I recognize as the head of the Black Republican party—and I deal with his political principles as I understand them. As I comprehend his speech, he considers the negro the equal of the white man, in natural and political rights, and just as estimable as the white man. I have heard no ground to the contrary taken by any other gentleman of that party, and I therefore place them all in the same category.

Mr. CURTIS. I hope the gentleman will not include the whole Republican party in that charge. I did not understand the gentleman from Ohio as taking that position.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I understood him so; and those of his party who did not except to it must be considered, in all fairness, I should think, as assenting to the proposition.

Mr. CURTIS. The Republican party platform asserts no such thing, and assumes no such position.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I understood the gentleman from Ohio to take this position—and I heard no one on his side of the House take ground to the contrary—that, under the Declaration of Independence there is no difference between the white man and the negro. And until we find the Republican party repudiate that doctrine and place itself in a different position, we have a right to consider that these are the views and policy of that party.

Mr. CURTIS. We agree with the Declaration of Independence nevertheless. The same doctrine was enunciated by Blackstone fifteen years before the Declaration of Independence was written.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Do I understand, then, that you do not consider the negro as being as good as a white man?

Mr. CURTIS. I do not consider negroes equal to white men in this country; but I believe that they have all the natural rights of white men.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Do I understand the gentleman to say that, under the Declaration of Independence, negroes can be citizens of the United States?

Mr. CURTIS. I did not say that they are not citizens of the United States; because, in some cases, they are citizens.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Then, if they are citizens, why not allow them to vote?

Mr. CURTIS. I would not allow them to vote until they are capable of comprehending the duties of voters.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Well, then, do you recognize the equality between the negro and white man?

Mr. CURTIS. I believe that they were created equal.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. All men were "created" equal. The Declaration of Independence does not say they were all born equal.

Mr. CURTIS. It says they were created equal. Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. But it does not say they were born. [Laughter.] Now, sir, the idea comes, perhaps, from the venerable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Giddings;] but I choose to place all gentlemen on that side of the House in the same class, because the course pursued by them is tending to the same result. I maintain that the gentlemen upon the other side of the House, who are making war upon the South, are seeking to establish the equality of the white and negro races in this country—

Mr. HOWARD. I hope the gentleman will except me.

Mr. CURTIS. We all wish to be excepted.

Mr. HUGHES. I would like to hear the opinion of the gentleman from Iowa on that clause of the Declaration of Independence which complains that King George III. had incited domestic insurrection in this country.

Mr. CURTIS. I approve of the whole of the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, there is a clause in the Constitution of the United States, which provides that, when a slave shall have escaped into another State, he shall be given up. I understand the law passed, and re-passed, if you please, requiring property of that description to be delivered up. But, sir, neither the law nor the constitutional provision on which it is founded is regarded. I have heard gentlemen contend that slave property was the creature of local law, and that it does not exist outside of that. Why, sir, this very provision in the Constitution of the United States was intended to place it outside and beyond that. The local authorities of Pennsylvania, for instance, may pass a law providing that when my horse escapes into that State he shall not be delivered up to me, but given to the finder; but they cannot constitutionally pass a law which will prevent my slave from being delivered up. The restriction contained in the Constitution of the United States comes to my aid in such a case; and no local law can operate to my prejudice, as is also reaffirmed by the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. The same principle as to such property is established by the British authorities, except in the case of "Somerset," decided by Lord Mansfield, and has been by the English judges determined over and over again. Mansfield's decision in the case of the negro man "Somerset" was considered an exception to the current of the common law authorities by Judge Story himself. I say, therefore, that slavery is recognized by the law of nations; and it is considered a violation of the international law, when the property of a citizen of one government comes within the jurisdiction of another government, to deprive him of that property without some special local law against its introduction. To refuse to recognize the same principle in the intercourse between the States is not only an assault upon the South, but it is a violation of the Constitution, and against the settled law of the land. If there is no stop put to it, we shall, in less than half a century, necessarily become a nation of aggressors, which may Heaven in its infinite mercy prevent! If it should turn out that we, as a people, are destined to become incapable of self-government; if it results that, when our forefathers established a government, laying down distinctly rights that should not be violated, those rights are to be cloven down or spirited away by noisy clamor, then the will and power of the strongest must prevail, or we shall be launched into a boundless sea, without chart or compass. The South, in such a tempest, will find terra firma as soon as the North.

Now, sir, I beg leave to refer very briefly to what some of the States at the North have done; which I may well commend to the grateful remembrance of those who now undertake to represent that section. Some of them, whilst they have been very eager to place restrictions upon the right of sovereignty in their neighbors, have gone to great and extraordinary lengths in the exercise of what they claim as their own peculiar and inalienable immunities.

The State of New York, by a law passed the 8th of April, 1801, seems to have declared war against strangers. Whether they designed the application to negroes alone, or to all, I am not able to say; probably to the former. The said law provides that if a stranger is entertained in the dwelling-house or out-house of any citizen for fifteen days without giving notice to the overseers of the poor, he shall pay a fine of five dollars. If such person continues above forty days, the justice may compel such stranger to be conveyed from constable to constable, until transported beyond the State; and if such person returns, the justice may direct him to be whipped by every constable into whose hands he shall come; if a man, not exceeding thirty-nine lashes; and if a woman, not over twenty-five lashes.

The State of Vermont, on the 10th March, 1797, by a law, declared that every white citizen above the age of eighteen and under forty-five, should be enrolled. She seems by this to have excluded the negro—whether to exempt him par excellence, or discriminate against him as unworthy of citizenship, scarcely admits of question. By another act, passed November, 1801, her selectmen were empowered to remove from the State any persons who came there to reside; and if they returned without permission they were to be whipped, not exceeding ten stripes. I presume this must have been intended for the free negroes who were not citizens; white people would not be apt to travel that way, if they were included.

New Hampshire, by her act of 1808, provided that every white male citizen of the age of sixteen, and under forty, should be enrolled. I suppose, by this, she hardly considered free negroes as citizens. If regarded as citizens, it would appear unkind to deprive them of the same means of aggression and defense as her white citizens.

Rhode Island, by one of her statutes, authorized the town council to bind out to service, for two years, any free negro or mulatto who kept a disorderly house. Another section of the same statute prohibited all persons keeping house in any town from entertaining any Indian, mulatto, or negro servant or slave, under a severe penalty. Another section declares that Indians, negroes, and mulatto servants or slaves, should not be absent at night after nine o'clock; and if found violating this provision, any justice of the peace is required to cause such servant or slave to be publicly whipped, by the constable, ten stripes. Another law of that State declared that whosoever is suspected of trading with a servant or slave, and shall refuse to purge himself by oath, shall be adjudged guilty, and punished. No laws of the South, in regard to slaves, are equal in severity to this.

Connecticut, by a law passed in 1796, provides that whatsoever negro, mulatto, or Indian servant, should be found wandering out of the bounds of the place to which they belong, without a pass, is to be taken up. By another section they are not to travel without a pass; and every free person shall be punished by fine for buying or receiving anything from a free negro, mulatto, or Indian servant, &c. By the constitution of this same State, of the 15th September, 1818, in the second section of the sixth article, it is provided that every white male citizen of the United States shall be an elector. Thus excluding negroes, mulattoes, and Indians.

Massachusetts, by her law of the 6th March, 1783, prohibits negroes, with a few exceptions, from remaining in the State for a longer time than two months; and if found within the State after ten days' notice, shall be whipped; and if still refusing, whipped again, &c. She also, by her act of the 15th June, 1795, provided that no person authorized to marry shall join in marriage any white person with any negro, Indian, or mulatto, under a heavy penalty, and the marriage is declared a nullity.

In the original constitution of Ohio, by the fourth article, none but white male inhabitants had the right of suffrage.

The State of Indiana, shortly after her admission into the Union, passed a law declaring that no negroes, mulattoes, or Indians shall be a witness, except in pleas of the State against negroes, mulattoes, or Indians, or in civil cases where they alone shall be parties.

In the District of Columbia, under the amended act of incorporation passed the 15th of May, 1820, it was declared that none but a free white male citizen could be mayor or alderman, and power was given to prescribe the terms upon which free negroes and mulattoes may reside in the city.

By the twenty-third section of the bill of rights of the proposed State of Kansas, free negroes shall not be permitted to live in that State under any circumstances. I do not suppose they mean by this to kill any that may be there, but, I take it, none are in the State. I believe a similar provision is in the Topeka State constitution.

It will be perceived, from several of the foregoing references, that the poor Indians are placed in the same category with the negroes and mulattoes. All the sympathy of the Abolitionists, it seems, now-a-days, is exhausted upon the negro, to the utter and inexcusable neglect of the Indian. From all cotemporaneous history, tradition, or record, founded on constitutional or legal provisions, does any man in his sober senses believe that negroes, mulattoes, or Indians were ever designed to be citizens of the States or United States, and on a perfect equality with the white man? that our Government intended, for them, equal rights and privileges?

In the beginning of the Government all the States were slaveholding. The Constitution and laws of the United States and of the several States demonstrate that Indians, negroes, and mulattoes have never been considered citizens. They have been excluded from voting, from serving in the militia, or from giving evidence against white persons, North as well as South, East, and West. If the Declaration of Independence was intended to embrace them, why were they not, by our revolutionary ancestors, freed from slavery, emancipated, and disenthralled? The naturalization laws of 1802 restrict all negroes from becoming naturalized, else black republicans of Hayti might come over and become a part of our body-politic. I wonder if the Indians have not, upon natural principles, a better right in Kansas than the emigrants from Massachusetts or Missouri?

I take it the Supreme Court of the United States, in their recent decision in the Dred Scott case, could not, without manifest disregard of all authority, have decided that negroes were citizens of the United States. They have only, judicially, recognized the truth of history. The constitution which was established at Topeka, and which has been the bantling of our Black Republican friends, has a provision that free negroes are not to come into the State of Kansas.

Mr. BINGHAM. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the Topeka constitution contains a clause excluding negroes from the State of Kansas?

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I understand that it has such a provision.*

Mr. BINGHAM. I have examined that instrument since this charge has been made, and before; and I say that it does not contain any such provision.

Mr. HUGHES. Let me set this matter right. The convention at the Big Springs, which initiated the Topeka movement, passed the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is the opinion of this convention that the admission of free negroes, or mulattoes, into the Territory, or future State, of Kansas, will be productive of evil among the people of Kansas, and dangerous to the institutions of our sister State; and that we will oppose their admission into the Territory, or future State, of Kansas, now and forever."

In pursuance of that resolution, the proposition was submitted to a popular vote with the Topeka constitution, as to whether the first Legislature under that instrument should exclude free negroes or not, and it was carried. But the provision is not expressly in the Topeka constitution. Still, the adoption of that constitution would have brought into legal existence a State Legislature bound to exclude free negroes.

Mr. BINGHAM. And it never was.

[Here he hammer fell.]

Mr. BUFFINTON. Mr. Chairman, a little

* Mr. STEWART refers, as authority, to the speech of Judge DOUGLAS, to be found in the Appendix to Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress, pages 387-388, where Judge DOUGLAS, commenting upon the memorial or constitution presented by General Cass to the Senate, and known as the Topeka constitution, uses the following language:

"I have kept my eye on the history of that document, and the proceedings connected with it; and it is well known to the country that there was a clause, adopted by a separate vote of the people, and made a part of that constitution, making it a duty of the Legislature never to permit negroes (free or slave) to enter the State of Kansas—a provision similar to the one in the constitutions of Illinois and Indiana, and some other States, which have been so severely condemned and denounced by those who have become the special champions of Kansas. Look into the constitution as they furnish it, and as the Senator from Michigan has presented it here, and you will find that clause is suppressed. That important, material provision, is not to be found in the document which they bring here. I know, from the history of the transaction, that it was voted in by a majority of the persons who voted for the adoption of the Kansas constitution. Am I mistaken? I ask, was it not adopted at the same election at which the constitution of the pretended State of Kansas was adopted, as a part of the constitution?"

less than two years ago, I had the honor to address the House of Representatives upon the application of the people of Kansas to be admitted into the Union with a constitution which they had formed for themselves. That constitution was unexceptionable in its character and general provisions. It embodied the will of a large majority of the people; and, had it been accepted by Congress, and had Kansas been admitted as a State, the then existing difficulties would have been settled, and the subsequent scenes and events which form the blackest stain upon our national reputation would have been prevented. I advocated, sincerely and earnestly, the admission, as an act of justice to the people who asked respectfully and in a proper manner to be permitted to join the Union, and also as a wise, just, and politic means of removing this exciting and dangerous question from the national councils. The Administration party then in power opposed the admission successfully; and during the time that has since elapsed, Kansas has been the theater of crime and disorder unparalleled in our history.

The arm of the Federal Government, which should have shielded and protected the people in the enjoyment of their rights, has sustained the invasion of those rights, and has sustained the minority in establishing its supremacy over the majority, until the executive power, instead of being respected and loved as a protector and friend, is slighted and detested as an enemy and an oppressor. Since the first session of the last Congress an entire revolution has taken place. Now there is an application that Kansas shall be admitted as a State; but under how different circumstances! Instead of a constitution embodying the will of the people, one is offered to which five sixths of the people have expressed their opposition. Instead of institutions which the people have chosen and prefer, there are provisions in the organic law which they loathe and detest. And this constitution, framed by a minority of a convention authorized by a Legislature chosen by a minority of the people, and adopted by a minority of one sixth of the legal voters, is attempted to be forced upon an unwilling people by the Administration and its friends. The reasons which led me to favor the adoption of the constitution presented to Congress two years ago compel me to oppose the acceptance of that which is now presented to us. And I propose to submit, as briefly as possible, the considerations which influence my opposition to it.

The debate upon this question has taken so wide a range, that almost all the issues between the two sections of the country have been discussed, and the extreme views on both sides have been presented to the House. I think that some of these do not necessarily present themselves. The question has enough of the elements of discord in itself, and I regret that topics that do not necessarily appertain to it should have been introduced. In the conclusions which I have formed upon the subject now legitimately before us, I have not found it necessary to consider whether slavery is or is not a just, moral, and humane institution. It is not merely because slavery would be established in Kansas by the Lecompton constitution, that I oppose its admission as a State. There are a sufficient number of other objections which compel me to oppose it; objections which arise in the incipient steps which were taken to organize a government of the Territory, and which increase in number and force from the first invasion of the Missourians to overpower the actual residents, down to the present time. Had a constitution recognizing and authorizing slavery been legally adopted by the people, and had they clearly and unequivocally offered such a constitution, indorsed by a majority, and demanded admission under it, the question whether slavery would be a sufficient objection to the admission of a State would be fairly before us. Should a State ever ask to be admitted into the Union with a pro-slavery constitution while I am a member of Congress, I shall then feel obliged to determine whether or not the pro-slavery provisions would be a sufficient objection to the admission to require me to vote against it.

While I say that there are enough other considerations besides that of slavery which require me to oppose the imposition of the Lecompton constitution upon the people of Kansas, it is not because I wish to avoid a discussion of that question of slavery which has produced at different times so great excitement in the country; and which is now convulsing the people and attracting the eyes of the whole civilized world upon us, watching to see if our institutions can stand firm against these violent political shocks. Could the men who framed our Federal Constitution have foreseen the extent of the danger which then lay hidden under this question, they undoubtedly would have provided for its settlement either by giving Congress the power, clearly and unequivocally, to control the establishment of slavery in the Territories, or what is perhaps more probable considering the prevailing dissatisfaction with, and hostility to, the institution existing both North and South at that time, Congress itself would have prohibited forever its extension in all Territories, as it did in the Northwestern Territory. No human foresight could then have apprehended that slavery, which Virginia and North Carolina, equally with Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, denounced as a great evil, the gradual and entire abolition of which had, as was supposed, been secured by its prohibition in the Northwestern Territory, and the prohibition of the importation of slaves after the year 1808, could have grown into such importance, and so absorbed all other questions as to threaten the continuance of the Union which was then being consolidated. The causes which have made the slaveholding interest one of such magnitude, so dearly cherished by the South, did not exist at the time of the formation of the Constitution.

The subsequent discovery and development of the immense agricultural resources of the South, unknown at that time, offered the opportunity of rapidly accumulating great wealth by the employment of slave labor in the cotton fields, and cupidity and avarice at once operated, to convert what till then had been thought an evil and a curse, into a blessing, from which all moral and political good flowed. While the sentiment of the South underwent this change, perhaps naturally enough considering the infirmities of human nature, the North became more confident in its hostility to slavery, and this speck upon the dawn of our prosperity soon enlarged and became a black and lowering cloud, bearing a tempest in its bosom, threatening to overwhelm and destroy the fabric which was yet scarcely established upon its foundations. Timid apprehensions of the consequences or still baser influences, have at different times operated upon a portion of the North sufficiently to avoid and delay a definitive settlement of the question. Concessions of northern rights and principles, falsely called compromises, have been yielded to the clamorous demands of the South, until the natural result has ensued of an attempt at absolute domination, regardless of even the forms of justice or fair proceeding. Had the North been unanimous in its opposition to the so-called Missouri compromise act, had there been no traitors to the sentiment and interests of their constituents, it is my belief that our history would not have furnished the subsequent instances of violent sectional strife which now tarnish its pages. The question would never again have assumed sufficient importance to have produced serious agitation. The North then conceded all that the South asked, and received in return some promises, to be fulfilled in a distant future, for which fulfillment there were no guarantees, except the good faith and honor of the South.

Now, when the first occasion arises to test the good faith of the South, how is it kept? The Missouri compromise, unjust as it was, had been universally acquiesced in for over thirty years; the agitation on the slavery question had almost entirely subsided, and the most friendly relations and feelings existed between the different sections, when the South, with a few northern coöperators, by organizing a territorial government when none was there needed, and where, if there had been, there was no demand for any unusual provisions in its organization, wantonly threw a firebrand to reillumine the flames of civil dissension and revive the sectional bitterness which always attends the agitation of the slavery question. The solemn engagements of the South were disregarded. The faith which they had pledged, and for which they had received a consideration, was broken. Their honor, which they profess to regard so highly, and which had been pledged that if we would let them have Missouri they would ask for nothing more north of the line of 36° 30', was violated. We ought not now to be surprised that the consummation of the act is attempted by the most odious frauds. In the repeal of the Missouri compromise were the "seeds and roots of iniquity and shame." From this egg was hatched all those subsequent atrocities which have culminated in an attempt to enforce upon Kansas a tyranny as monstrous as any ever attempted by a despotic government.

The North pronounced its judgment upon this first act in the series, by consigning those of their Representatives who had so basely betrayed them, to a political grave. But specious arguments and delusive pretenses were not wanting to appease the indignation which was aroused. Squatter sovereignty, the right of the people to regulate their own domestic institutions, tickled the ears and deluded the judgment of honest men at the North. Assurances were loudly proclaimed and often repeated throughout all the free States, from the Penobscot to "Lower Egypt," that if the candidate of the Democratic party should be elected, the whole influence of the Administration would be used to secure to the people of Kansas the rights guaranteed to them by the Nebraska act. The votes of thousands of honest Democrats were obtained by these falsehoods, who would have seen their hands wither before they would have deposited a ballot for this Administration, could they have foreseen that it would go beyond its predecessor in its base prostration before the shrine of slavery.

The pro-slavery party, having just broken their faith and violated their solemn pledges, by the repeal of the Missouri compromise, now offered new pledges; and to relieve, if possible, the odium which always attaches to an act of perfidy, proposed a substitute, and plighted the public faith by an act of Congress, assuring the people in terms as clear as language can make them, that the inhabitants of the Territories shall be left "to form and regulate their domestic institutions in their own way." And here begins the series of acts always attended by fraud or violence; the direct result of which, if Congress accepts the Lecompton constitution, will be to deprive the people of Kansas of the rights in the exercise of which the Federal Government had solemnly assured them they should be protected.

Contrary to expectation, however, the preconceived plan of making Kansas a slave State was not to be accomplished without a struggle. Emigrant aid societies were formed, and an "organized emigration" poured into the Territory a population who had the courage, the energy, and the will, to contend with firmness and patience, by all lawful means, against a desperate party which, sustained by the whole influence and power of the Federal Government, was striving to wrest the Territory from freedom. The projectors of the scheme to make Kansas a slave State were sorely troubled by the success of this emigration, and, in the bitterness of their rage, heaped opprobrious epithets upon the emigrants—the late Executive of the United States even descending to denounce them in a special message. They were called factious, impudent intruders into a place where they did not belong, and where they went only for a special purpose, which interfered gravely with the projects of certain political schemers. Sir, what business was it of the President, or is it of yours or mine, or any one else's, for what purpose they went there, as long as that purpose was lawful? They were a people whose education and whose moral and physical condition reflected credit on the country from which they emigrated, and gave assurance of as useful, law-loving, and law-abiding population, as ever formed a new State. If they made any sacrifices in leaving homes abounding with all the comforts of civilization, to make their abode in a wilderness, for the sake of accomplishing what they believed to be a great and good result, all honor to them for their devotion to freedom, and for their readiness to encounter hardships and dangers for the establishment of their principles, and the principles of their revolutionary ancestors, in a new State. They went to the Territory with their families and household goods, intending to remain there, to establish their homes there, to build up villages, and erect churches and school-houses and mills, and rear up their children to be good and useful citizens. No new Territory has received a better class of emigrants, many of whom are far superior in moral worth and intellectual cultivation to those who have denounced them.

This population formed a part of the census of 1855; and the election of March 30, of that year, having been ordered, the pro-slavery party found that something must be done to defeat the decided majority which clearly existed against them. Less than one year previous, the public faith had been pledged that the people of the Territory should govern themselves as they saw fit; but the astute and unscrupulous managers of the pro-slavery party took the liberty, under the unexpected state of things which had arisen, of making practically an informal and somewhat illegal amendment to the act, so that in effect, instead of the people of Kansas, it was the people of Missouri, who should be left to form and regulate the domestic institutions of Kansas in their own way. During the few days preceding the election, the roads leading from the Missouri border into Kansas, were filled with armed men, without women or children; with no furniture, except that of the camp; everything indicating an invasion, and not an immigration. The districts where they voted were dotted with their camp-fires, and "night was made hideous by their revels."

The few days succeeding the election, the roads were again filled by these men, with their backs turned on Kansas, making their way home, to relate to their families the incidents of their little jaunt over the border. Can there be any doubt what was the duty of the government officials at that election? Unquestionably they should have so ordered it that the bona fide inhabitants should have voted, and those alone. If their arrangements to secure this were defeated by the irruption into certain districts of an overwhelming armed force, against which they had not the means to contend, they should have so reported it, and have never consented to make returns, for there were no legal returns to be made, until a fair election had been held by actual residents, who alone had the exclusive right to make an election.

But it was not the power, it was the will to do justice and carry out the pledges which Congress had given, that was wanting. Kansas must be made a slave State at all hazards. That had been determined upon. But as the people would not do it if, as had been promised them, they should be left perfectly free to form their own laws, the unscrupulous official agents and instruments of the slave power returned the Legislature elected by the Missourians, and these representatives of a foreign people thus fraudulently returned, immediately proceeded to perform the work which they had been chosen to execute.

The free-State people were to be oppressed, intimidated, and, if possible, crushed out and expelled; and this was attempted by robbery, arson, and murder in the country, and by tyrannical and intolerable laws in the Legislature.

The houses of the free-State inhabitants were burned; their crops were destroyed; they were subjected to the most cruel persecutions, and when they sought redress in the courts, they could procure scarcely a show of an effort to punish or arrest the ruffians. This is no exaggerated picture; it is well attested by men entitled to credit, and who came home to the communities where they were well known, to relate it. The Legislature passed laws which no one dare defend in a free, civilized community. The right of free speech, the freedom of the press, the rights of conscience were destroyed. There cannot be found to-day, in the records of any government, however arbitrary and tyrannical, laws so infamous, so disgraceful to the enacting power, as those enacted by this foreign Legislature, established by an armed invasion, over a people who are derisively told that they may form and regulate their institutions in their own way.

The pro-slavery party, however, had mistaken their men. The people of Kansas were not of that material which could be cowed by intimidation, or crushed by persecution, sustained though it was by Federal dragoons. Accustomed to obey the laws of a real government, they disdained and disregarded the enactments of a usurpation. They held a convention, chosen by a majority of the people, and framed a constitution, adopted by the same majority of the people, and formed a State government; and for this they have been declared rebels, guilty of treason. Where was the rebellion, and what acts constituted it? There was no insurrection against the legal authorities; there was no resistance to the enforcement of legal enactments; there was never an attempt to put the Topeka government in operation against the laws or officers of the United States. There was simply an organization which Congress was respectfully petitioned to recognize; and it was never contemplated by any body of men, as far as I know, that it should go into operation without such recognition. The whole proceeding, from beginning to end, was entirely legal and proper, and in accordance with precedents established in the formation of other States.

The troops of the United States compelled an obedience to laws which the people did not believe to have any validity, because they were not permitted to have any voice in the enactment of them, and because they were the tyrannical and oppressive enactments of a usurpation. They would not have obeyed them if they had not been compelled to; but they have made no armed resistance to their enforcement. It is an every-day occurrence in all the States for the officers to be obliged to enforce some law or other; yet I never heard that those who were so compelled to a reluctant obedience were called rebels or considered such. Had the inhabitants resisted with arms the enforcement of the acts passed by the usurpers, there are many who would have applauded them; and had the people called for aid undoubtedly they would have had it, and matters would have been precipitated. But they took the wiser and more prudent course, and deserved great praise and honor for their temperance and patience. They resolved to trust to the justice of their cause. They would "test the truth of God against the fraud of man." They relied upon the justice of their countrymen, who, they believed, perhaps too confidently, would indignantly hurl the usurpers from their places, as soon as they learned the true history of their crimes. The party who sustain the oppressors would have been very glad if the free-State people had resisted ever so little, so that it had been enough to afford a slight foundation for the charges of factious and rebellious conduct which are repeated with as much persistence as if they had been true. But the free-State men heroically endured the sufferings and persecutions to which they were subjected, rather than involve themselves and their friends in a direct opposition to the United States Government, with the immense possible consequences. There would be time enough for that when there was no hope of relief or redress in any other way.

But this majority, so patient, and so cautious to keep within the strict pale of the law, continued to increase in numbers and grow stronger in their resolution. The foreign force, which had established a nominally legal authority over them by armed violence, must now devise some new mode of oppression to prevent this continued accretion to the strength of the majority. They determined to expel, if possible, some of its members, and to render it impossible for those who remained to exercise the rights guaranteed to every citizen of the United States, and especially promised to the people of Kansas by the Kansas-Nebraska act. Laws were passed such as are not uncommon in countries subject to a despotic government; for there the rulers make no pretense of deference to the will of the people; but here, under our Government, whose fundamental principle is that the people shall have perfect freedom of speech and conscience and of action, we have, for the first time, an instance where the people are deprived of all of them. There is an attempt made to establish, by violence, or fraud, or any iniquity which may be necessary to accomplish the purpose, the relation of slavery among a people, a great majority of whom detest it; a great majority of the people of the whole country sympathizing with them in their abhorrence of it. They oppose it because they believe it an institution nefarious in itself, and pernicious in its influence. It is a curse upon any State where it exists; it affects all the relations of a community, internal and external; it is a blight upon moral and social progress; it affects all the material interests; it depresses the value of lands; it discourages and debases free labor; and gives the political control and social predominance to a few aristocratic proprietors of slaves; it retards and prevents the development of all the resources of a State, and is a withering blight upon its prosperity.

The free-State people of Kansas resist this scourge, which would afflict and injure them, and would be a curse upon their posterity. Yet by those laws, which are upheld by the pro-slavery party, they are forbidden to write, speak, or circulate in any way, the expression of their hostility to this great wrong; and the national Administration emulates the oppression of foreign despotism, in its efforts to sustain, by the employment of United States troops, the enforcement of this tyranny.

The people were also required to take an oath to support the organic act of the Territory, and the fugitive slave law. Who ever heard before of a people being required to swear that they would support a statute? If it is proper to require an oath to support one legislative enactment, why not another; why not the tariff, why not the sub-Treasury, why not any act, good, bad, or indifferent, insignificant or important, which Congress or a Legislature, in its wisdom or its folly, may have passed? Officers are required to swear fidelity to a constitution because that is the source of all law. It is an embodiment of the sovereignty of the people, to which they owe their allegiance; and if it was not sustained and enforced, there would be anarchy and an entire absence of authority for any law. But the requirement of an oath by the citizen to sustain any law, is a requirement to give up one of his dearest privileges, which is to oppose any law as far as he can do so legally. The law may be unconstitutional, and he may think it his duty, as a good citizen, to resist its enforcement. And where, as in Kansas, the people are required to sustain a law which many of them do believe unconstitutional, and which is repugnant to their consciences and their sense of right, before they can vote, it is a wanton act of injustice, calculated and designed, not to protect the law, but to oppress the citizen, and deprive him of his right by requiring him to do what, if he is an honest man, it is morally impossible for him to do. These two sections, eleven and twelve, of the law should be preserved and go down in history as examples of the extremes to which the passions and the rage for power will carry men. The law accomplished its intended; purpose, and, sustained as it was by armed numbers from a neighboring State, effectually prevented the attendance of the free-State voters at the polls at the election in October, 1856, and another House of Representatives was chosen by a foreign people "to form and regulate the institutions of Kansas in their own way."

By this Legislature was called the convention to frame a State constitution. The facts and incidents attending the choice and action of that convention have been so often repeated of late that I shall not recite the details. The people had the most solemn and earnest assurances from the Federal officers, the faith of the Executive being pledged thereto, that the constitution should be submitted to the popular vote; and strange to say, considering the number of pledges to them which had not been kept, they once more trusted to the honor of their opponents. It is due to the Governor and his Secretary to say that they did all they could to keep their word, and for so doing, one was compelled to resign, and the other was removed by the Executive. The convention framed a pro-slavery constitution. As if in mockery they offered it to the people, with the power to vote upon the slavery clause alone, while, if every vote in the Territory had been for the "constitution with no slavery," slavery would have been continued and established there by that constitution. Here were a people who believed that the question of the establishment of slavery was of greater importance than any other in the formation of their State government. It was one which would have immense influence upon their present and future prosperity. The value of their property, and their means of increasing it, would be seriously affected by it, yet they were not permitted to decide that question.

It is asserted that this, the only question of great importance to the people of Kansas, was submitted to their vote. There are many men upon this floor, who support the acceptance of this constitution, who I was unwilling to believe would consent to countenance and sustain so great and palpable an injustice as this is. The right to interfers with the property of slaves in the Territory is expressly exempted. They, and, of course, their increase, must remain and continue slaves. The vote, "constitution with no slavery," could not affect them. Now, I ask any man of candor and fairness to show me how he can maintain that the question of slavery was fairly submitted to the people. Suppose that all the people had been willing to vote upon the acceptance of the constitution: I ask in what manner any means had been provided by the convention, or by the Legislature, by which the people could have rejected slavery? The vote for the Legislature, in October, 1857, showed clearly that a large majority of the people were opposed to slavery. The convention resolved to impose slavery upon them, against their expressed will; and the Administration now asks us to sustain and confirm this imposition. To make assurance doubly sure, the absolute control of the election and the returns was given to the president of the convention; he appointed the commissioners who appointed the judges of the elections, and the votes were to be returned to him; he was entirely irresponsible; he could create or destroy votes with perfect impunity. It is stated, by men competent and having the means to judge rightly, that there are not more than twenty-five hundred pro-slavery voters in the Territory. One of the Government officials who was here, in frequent communication with the Government, some three weeks before the vote on the constitution was to be taken, asserted that there would be about six thousand pro-slavery votes for the constitution. He returned to Kansas, and about six thousand votes were returned for the constitution.

The constitution had been framed and adopted by a minority of all the members of the convention. The people of Kansas have voted upon it; and, admitting all the votes to have been cast which were returned, there is a clear majority of five thousand against the constitution. And now it is before us, the product of a singular series of minorities. It is adopted by a small minority of the people, and framed by the minority of a convention chosen by a minority of the people, and appointed by a Legislature itself elected by a minority. And this is done in the name of popular sovereignty! This is leaving the people perfectly free to form and regulate their own institutions in their own way, and to carry out this new democratic system of the party which calls itself, par excellence, the Democratic party!

The first act, after this scheme comes before us, is to give the control of a committee, which the majority of the House voted to raise to investigate the facts, to the minority who opposed such investigation, so that this House cannot carry out their wishes in what relates to this project of forcing slavery upon Kansas. This has the merit of consistency, at least; and I do not know but what, if we reject the Lecompton constitution, there will still be found some means to annul our action, so that the voice of Congress will have as little effect against the will of the South, operating through its instrument, the Administration, as the voice of the people of Kansas has had against the violence of border ruffians, sustained by Government officials and Government troops. I have not given the authorities for the facts which I have stated, because they have been before us, and the public know them well, and I did not wish to occupy the time of the House more than was necessary to give the reasons which govern my vote on this question. The facts are sustained by the report of the Kansas investigating committee of the last Congress, by the statements of the Government officials, the evidence taken by the Kansas Legislature, and the statements of individuals worthy of credit. They are sustained beyond all dispute, and are, for the most part, uncontradicted. Can there be a stronger argument than the recital of them? They show that there has been fraud, violence, or crime at every stage of the proceedings which result in the presentation of this constitution for our acceptance. Must we use argument to convince men that they should oppose crime? Must we reason with them to persuade them to condemn the wrong and uphold the right?

Those who sustain this constitution must show that an armed invasion did not prevent a large portion of the people from coming to the polls. They must show that laws were not passed which unjustly required their submission to conditions which an honest man could not submit to, before they could vote. They must show that the people have had a fair opportunity to express their wishes regarding this constitution; or, if they cannot show that, these charges, which now stand upon uncontroverted evidence, are untrue. In advocating the acceptance of this constitution, they must give their support to the crimes which have attended its progress:

"They see the right, and they approve it too;
They know the wrong, and yet the wrong pursue."

The Governors who have been sent to Kansas to enforce the policy of the Administration in compelling submission to the yoke, have returned disgusted with the duties imposed upon them. Once removed from the baneful influence of immediate contact with the Administration, which, like the "deadly opus," seems to poison all who seek shelter under it, they see the iniquity of the scheme, and the enormity of the wrong by which it is attempted to enforce it. They depart for their post resolved to carry out the views of the Executive, believing, as many here believe, or profess to believe, that the free-State men are factious, rebellious fanatics, who have selected Kansas as the theater of their turbulence, for no other purpose than to effect party political objects. They find them peaceful, well-disposed citizens, who have gone into the Territory intending to make their homes there, practicing the mechanical arts, pursuing agriculture, and forming all the machinery of a republican community, only asking that they may be permitted to do so themselves, without the interference of another people, and the intimidation of Federal troops. Five Governors have gone there; their sympathies and their prejudices, if they had any, wholly with those who support this constitution; their private and political interests being to carry out the slavery policy, sure of the support of the Executive and of the South, in any measure they might adopt to crush out the free-soil sentiment in the Territory. In every instance, possibly with one neutral exception, the scales have fallen from their eyes after a short residence among the people of Kansas. Actual observation, the evidence of their own senses, converted them; and their testimony in favor of the free-State men and their cause is overwhelming.

The Executive sends out the Governors to afflict the people of Kansas, as we read in Scripture Balaam sent Balaam to curse Israel—"Come curse me Jacob, and come defy Israel." But Balaam found that it was the will of God that the people should be blessed. He answers, "And He hath blessed, and I cannot reverse it. He hath not beheld iniquity in Jacob; neither hath He seen perverseness in Israel." And Balaam angrily says, "I called thee to curse mine enemies, and behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times. Therefore, now, flee thou to thy place. I thought to promote thee unto great honor; but lo! the Lord hath kept thee back from honor." In the same manner, our Democratic Balaam angrily rebukes the Governors of Kansas, because they obey the manifest will of the people, instead of his own. He removes them from their office, and withholds all intended promotion and reward. I ask those gentlemen who say that the statements favorable to the free-State cause are misrepresentations, and that the arguments against the pro-slavery cause are the result of sectional animosity, to consider the fact, which I think is entitled to have great weight with you, that men taken from among you, believing as you do, and acting with you, who have been on the ground, and have seen with their own eyes and heard with their own ears, with the very best opportunities of confirming their belief, have renounced the opinions which they had upheld, and tell you that they were deceived. They tell you that this Lecompton constitution is a monstrous iniquity; and that if you persist in forcing it upon the people, you commit an act of oppression upon an unoffending population. Has this opinion of your comrades, your former co-operators, no weight with you? Does it not compel the reflection that it is you who may be blinded by sectional prejudice, and actuated by partisan political influences?

The consequences of the acceptance or rejection of this constitution have been introduced into this discussion. We hear one day that the pro-slavery ticket has been elected, and the next day that the free-State ticket has been elected. The president of the convention maintains an oracular silence regarding the result of the election. I condemn his silence, which I cannot believe is maintained with an honest purpose; but the result of that election will not affect my vote. Were every officer on the free-State ticket elected, executive, judicial, and legislative, I should oppose the acceptance of the constitution while it appears that the people have had nothing to do with its presentation to us, and a majority of them are opposed to it. The people say that they will resist with arms any attempt to force this constitution upon them. I think it more than probable that they will do so. I should justify and applaud such a course, as I do the resistance of our ancestors to the illegal and oppressive impositions of the mother country. I should deplore the occasion of the revolution as I should the consequences likely to follow it; but my belief and apprehensions do not influence me to vote for the rejection of the constitution. I believe that on a question which involves a principle it is better to vote for the right, according to one's best knowledge and judgment, and leave the consequences to God.

It is said that if the constitution is rejected, there will be attempts to secede made by some of the southern States. I do not believe it. I have no doubt that there are men who would gladly see such an attempt, and who have labored and intrigued to bring it about. But the people will not sustain them, and their traitorous efforts would be as abortive as those of Catiline. But if I am mistaken, and serious attempts to secede shall be made—if any men are resolved to try to break up the Union for this cause, I say, let them try it. We have listened with patience to these threats of disunion for a long time. They may or may not have had their intended effect; but the South has always obtained what it demanded. It was the intention of those who formed our Government, to restrict slavery to its then existing limits.

Had the North been true to itself at the time of the Missouri compromise, and firmly maintained that slavery and slave representation should never be extended into free territory, the question would have been settled forever. The South carried their point then, they carried it in the admission of Texas, and in the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, always growing more exorbitant in their demands, and more violent in insisting upon them, until now they claim everything. The Executive is wholly theirs. The Supreme Court have degraded the bench to the purposes of the political stump, and from their tribunal have uttered political harangues upon a subject which they had but just before declared was not before them for judicial action. The South are exulting in the expectation that the North will continue to yield until the toleration of slavery, more or less temporary, shall be compelled in all the States of the Union. Unquestionably a large majority of the people are opposed to the further extension of slavery, and it is full time to try whether our Constitution, which is called the greatest example of popular government that has ever existed, has sufficient strength to carry out the principle that the majority shall govern.

This question has been suffered to agitate the country for nearly forty years. It is now before us in the most odious form it has ever assumed. Heretofore we have been required only to permit slavery to remain where it had existed for a long time, and where the people wished to retain it. Now we are asked to assist you to establish it where seven eighths of the people hate and detest it. To force this upon us is tyrannical as manifest and as oppressive as any that was ever exercised. It is worse than the threatened overthrow of the Constitution, for it is a violation of the great principle on which the Constitution is founded. If men will strike this blow at the foundation of our Republic, can they expect that the superstructure will long stand? I oppose the adoption of this Lecompton constitution now and always, let the consequences be what they may. Conscious that I am right, I leave the result to that Providence which has protected and favored us so long.

Mr. TALBOT obtained the floor.

Mr. PHELPS. As it is late, if the gentleman from Kentucky will yield the floor, I will move the committee rise.

Mr. TALBOT. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. PHELPS submitted the motion; and it was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill (H. R. No. 306) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the service of the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1858, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

WILLS CASE.

Mr. COMINS. I move the House adjourn.

Mr. JEWETT. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the motion for a moment.

Mr. COMINS. I withdraw it to hear what the gentlemen wants.

Mr. JEWETT. The Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads reported adversely on the case of Mr. Wills, of Kentucky; and I ask that his petition and papers be withdrawn from the files of the House, and referred to the Court of Claims.

There was no objection; and it was ordered accordingly.

And then, on motion of Mr. COMINS, (at a quarter to five o'clock, p. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, March 25, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. C. C. MEADER.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating a letter of the Commissioner of the General Land Office, explanatory of a change in the schedules of all the Pueblo and private land claims in New Mexico, heretofore reported to Congress, which has been proposed by the surveyor general and adopted by the General Land Office; which was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Interior, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, a statement showing the progress of the report of Major W. H. Emory on the United States and Mexican boundary survey; which, on motion of Mr. MASON, was ordered to lie on the table, and a motion by him to print it was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a letter of the chief clerk of the Court of Claims, returning, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, the petition and papers of James Myer; which was ordered to lie on the table.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. BIGLER presented a petition of citizens of Belldona and its vicinity, in Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Waterford to Wattsburg; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. DIXON presented the memorial of Charles H. Jackson, a commander in the Navy, who had been placed upon furlough, and subsequently restored to his rank and position in the service, praying to be allowed arrears of pay for the time he was furloughed; which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CAMERON presented a memorial of the Board of Trade of Philadelphia, remonstrating against any change of the law establishing the Light-House Board; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Bedford county, Pennsylvania, operatives engaged in the manufacture of iron, praying for protection to that branch of American labor; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented the petition of Robert K. Smith, heir of John Smith, praying for the confirmation of his title to certain lands in the Bastrop grant in the State of Louisiana; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented additional papers in relation to the claim of Anson Dart; which were referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

BILL RECOMMENDED.

On motion of Mr. DOOLITTLE, it was Ordered, That the bill (S. No. 181) for the relief of Anson Dart be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SECRETARY OF THE SENATE.

Mr. MASON. I wish to bring before the Senate a matter, in the nature of a question of privilege I presume, which is interesting to the organization of the Senate. It is known to the Senate that we have been, unfortunately, deprived of the services of the Secretary of the Senate for some few weeks past by illness, which, I regret to say, although he is certainly convalescent, still continues, and which not only disables him from the active duties of his office, but which renders it desirable, in the opinion of his physician and of his immediate friends, of whom I am happy to count myself one, that he should be relieved as far as possible from any of the business of the Senate. There are some duties—very few, however—which the Secretary alone is competent to perform. He is the disbursing officer of the Senate under bonds, and none but he, of course, can act as such. Besides that, he is the only officer of the Senate who is indue with the franking privilege in sending off public documents and public papers; a duty which he alone can discharge.

My proposition is to appoint, ad interim only, an acting Secretary who shall be placed under the same responsibility, and who shall discharge the duties of the Secretary during the pleasure of the Senate, and during his disability, not at all to interfere with the existing office or officer. I have drawn up a resolution which I ask to have read. I shall not now ask for its consideration, but I will call it up in the course of the day to be disposed of. The immediate purpose is, from a very kind regard which I am sure all Senators entertain to that officer, (who has been very long an officer of the Senate, and a very exemplary, efficient, and well informed one,) if we can, and I think we can, to divest him, while he is disabled, from any of the responsibilities of the office, or any of the duties of signing his name, which it is supposed may prejudicially affect his convalescence. I ask that the resolution may be read, and may lie over for consideration.

The Clerk read it, as follows:

Resolved, That — be, and is hereby, appointed acting Secretary of the Senate during the temporary disability by sickness of the Secretary of the Senate, and that said acting Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered to do all official acts pertaining to the office of Secretary aforesaid, and under the same responsibilities now devolved on the Secretary, and after giving the like official bond, and that he shall continue so until the further order of the Senate.

Mr. MASON. I would only say, in addition, that I propose to fill up the blank with the name of the present chief clerk of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I should think there would be no objection to the resolution, and I know of no reason why it should not be passed now.

Mr. MASON. There is certainly, I presume, no objection; but it occurred to me that possibly some Senators might desire to see how far this would be in conformity to any existing laws.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would like to look at that point.

Mr. MASON. I will state that I have examined the laws, and I find the condition of the Secretary of the Senate to be this: It is an office created by the Senate only, not by law, under the general authority of the Constitution to each House of Congress to appoint its own officers. The office of Secretary is created by the Senate, and not by law. The law devolves certain duties, especially those of disbursing officer of the Senate, on the Secretary as an act of the law; but when we appoint the officer, I feel no doubt that he is competent, by resolution of the Senate, to discharge all the duties.

Mr. CAMERON and others. Let it be acted on now.

Mr. MASON. I ask that it be acted on, unless the Senator from Louisiana desires that it shall lie over for the present.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should like to look at the law. I think probably there will be this difficulty: I do not doubt at all the power of the Senate to appoint an acting Secretary; but I think there are certain duties which, by law, are devolved on the Secretary of the Senate, and if Mr. Dickens remains titularly the Secretary of the Senate, I doubt whether our appointing an acting Secretary will confer on that acting Secretary the necessary powers of performing certain functions which are devolved by law, on the Secretary of the Senate, and I apprehend there may be a necessity for a joint resolution. It is only with that view that I make the suggestion.

Mr. MASON. Let it lie over. It is certainly worthy of consideration.

The resolution lies over.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the petition of John Caris and others, members of Captain Campbell's company of volunteers in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Iowa, relative to a post office, court-house, and custom-house at Burlington, in that State, asked to be discharged from the further consideration of that subject.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of citizens of Trenton, New Jersey, praying for the enactment of a law to change the name of the port of Lambertton to that of Trenton, reported a bill (S. No. 213) to change the name of the port of Lambertton, in the State of New Jersey; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred a bill (S. No. 192) to provide for the general introduction of an international code of marine signals, reported it without amendment.

SHIP FRANKLIN.

Mr. HALE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be requested to inform the Senate of the present condition of the United States ship Franklin, and of the expediency of fitting her for sea as a screw-steamer, with full steam power.

ADJOURNMENT TO MONDAY.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, it was Ordered, That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it be to Monday next.

LAND DISTRICTS IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 210) to create additional land districts in the State of California, and for other purposes, have instructed me to report it back, with an amendment. If there be no objection, I hope the bill will be now considered and passed.

Mr. GWIN. I hope it will be acted on now. It is a matter of pressing necessity to have additional land districts. Our lands are advertised for sale, and it is impossible to go on with the sales unless we have the new districts.

Mr. BRODERICK. There are two letters accompanying the report, which I ask may be printed, so that they may go with the bill to the other House.

The motion was agreed to.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The amendment of the Committee on Public Lands is in line three, to strike out the words "two or three;" and in the same line, after the word "districts," insert "in his discretion, not exceeding three;" so that it will read:

"That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish additional land districts in his discretion, not exceeding three."

The bill will then read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to establish additional land districts in his discretion, not exceeding three, in the State of California, and to fix, from time to time, the boundaries thereof as the public interests may require, which districts shall respectively be named after the places at which the offices shall first be established, and the President of the United States shall be authorized hereafter, from time to time, as circumstances may require, to adjust the boundaries of any and all the land districts in said State, and remove the offices when the same shall be expedient.

Sec. 2. And he it further enacted, That the President is hereby authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or during the recess thereof, and until the end of the next ensuing session, a register and receiver for each of said additional districts, who shall respectively be required to reside at the site of the offices, shall be subject to the same laws and responsibilities, and whose compensation shall be the same as is now prescribed by law for other land officers in that State.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should like to inquire what the compensation now allowed by law for other land officers in that State is?

Mr. GWIN. The compensation is $3,000 for each of the officers, and that is the same as other land officers throughout the United States receive. They are all the same throughout the United States.

Mr. STUART. Not to exceed $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and it was read the third time, and passed.

WILLIAM ALLEN.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to consider the bill for the relief of William Allen at this time. It will be passed without objection, I think.

The bill (S. No. 117) for the relief of William Allen, of Portland, in the State of Maine, was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to cause the name of William Allen to be placed on the pension list, at the rate of six dollars per month, during his life, in lieu of the pension to which he is now by law entitled.

Mr. HAMLIN. There is a very brief report accompanying the bill, which explains it; but if there is no call for it, there is no necessity for reading it.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MAINE ON KANSAS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask leave to offer certain resolutions of the Legislature of the State of Maine, and ask that they be read.

The Clerk read them, as follows:

STATE OF MAINE.

Resolves relating to Kansas and Slavery.

Resolved, That the people of Maine are unalterable in their devotion to the Constitution and the Union, and demand of the national Administration an immediate return to the principles on which the Constitution was framed, and by which alone the Union can be preserved.

Resolved, That the Missouri compromise was a solemn compact between the free and slave States, that its perfidious breach in 1854 deserved, as it received, the universal condemnation of our Legislature and people, without regard to party, and such remains the unchangeable conviction of the State.

Resolved, That the reign of the late territorial government in Kansas presents a record of villainy and violence unparalleled in modern history, unfolding a gigantic plot to force African slavery upon the freemen of that Territory by the barbarous and bloody edicts of a foreign Legislature, sustained throughout by the Administration, with its Army, and territorial judiciary.

Resolved, That the recent message of the President of the United States is a falsification of the history of Kansas, a libel upon the free people of that Territory, and a deep disgrace to the American name and to the office once filled by Washington.

Resolved, That the President's confession that the late foreign territorial government in Kansas would have been overthrown by the people long before its annihilation in October, unless he had upheld the usurpation by military power, reveals the complicity of the Administration in the execrable scheme of governing Kansas by a minority sustained by Federal bayonets, setting up a military despotism to "crush out" the free-State majority, and the sovereignty of the people; and his estimate that a standing army of "at least two thousand regular troops" had been found necessary to maintain the equilibrium of parties in that Territory, measures the magnitude of the free State majority—so enormous as to equal in effective power "at least two thousand" of his best "troops."

Resolved, That the President's astounding assertion, that "Kansas is at this moment as much a slave State as Georgia or South Carolina," is a monstrous heresy, the slave power's latest commentary on the doctrine of popular sovereignty, and a suggestive example of the operation of the Kansas-Nebraska bill.

Resolved, That since this is his interpretation of the Constitution and the law, the people of Maine demand of the President its practical recognition by an immediate withdrawal of the Federal Army, the territorial Governor, and the infamous judiciary, that the "State" of Kansas may be left, like "Georgia or South Carolina," to the government of State officers, and to the protection of a "State" militia.

Resolved, That the Lecompton constitution was conceived in fraud, and brought forth in contemptuous defiance of the popular will and in mockery of the professions of the Kansas-Nebraska bill, by which alone the iniquity became possible. Maine enters her solemn and indignant protest against the stupendous swindle.

Resolved, That those members of Congress who at the passage of the Kansas-Nebraska bill professed a belief in its avowed principle of popular sovereignty, are now loudly called upon to vindicate the sincerity of their professions by repudiating the Lecompton constitution, in which that principle has been shamefully betrayed.

Resolved, That if that constitution shall finally be forced upon Kansas against the solemn remonstrance of its people, then, in the opinion of this Legislature, they will be justified in resisting it at all hazards, and to the last extremity; and in so righteous a struggle the people of Maine are ready to aid them, both by sympathy and action.

Resolved, That the people of Maine have just cause for gratitude and pride that they are now fully represented in both branches of Congress by the surest guarantee that maintaining sentiments and principles in harmony with an immense majority of their constituents, require no specific instructions from this Legislature. While their past course meets our approval, it affords us the surest guarantee that they will, to the extent of their ability, strive to avert from our country the impending danger, by resisting to the end the attempted outrage of forcing upon the free people of Kansas a slavery constitution that they abhor, and in the formation of which they have had no part.

Resolved, That the Governor be requested to forward a copy of these resolves to the Governors of the several States and Territories, to be laid before the Legislatures thereof, and to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to be laid before the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 13, 1858.

OFFICE SECRETARY OF STATE,
AUGUSTA, March 18, 1858.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true copy of the original deposited in this office.

NOAH SMITH, JR.,
Secretary of State.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that the resolutions be laid on the table and printed.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, there is a rule of the Senate, I think, which requires that all petitions or other communications made to it should be couched in respectful language—a rule adopted not to preserve, or from regard to, the dignity of those who are Senators, but to the character and dignity of those whom Senators represent. I take for granted that the honorable Senator from Maine, who presented these resolutions, considered that his duty as the Senator of the State, whose resolutions they are, required him to present them; but the honorable Senator knows that in those resolutions, the act of the Legislature of Maine, there is charged directly and in terms, perfidy upon Congress, falsehood upon the President, and infamy on the judiciary.

Now, sir, I have always considered it a duty in the Senate to receive communications from one of the States of this Union, whatever may be contained in the general rules of the Senate, taking for granted that the States of this Union would respect themselves in their intercourse with the Senate of the Union. I have not a word to say either in censure or advice to the honorable Senator representing the State of Maine, and who has thought it his duty to present resolutions of this character. My respect for the States of this Union will deter me from doing what, if the communication came from any other quarter, I should deem it my duty to those whom I represent to do—moving that the resolutions be rejected. I will continue to respect the States of this Union who are particularly represented here in the Senate, and who are parties to the Government. But I have risen only to call the attention of the country to the fact that, because of this slavery agitation, one of the States of this Union has thought it not unbecoming in her, in a communication to the Senate, to charge, in terms, perfidy upon Congress, falsehood upon the President, and infamy upon the judiciary; I shall make no motion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I suppose the fact that I presented these resolutions renders it incumbent on me to say a word or two in reply to the honorable Senator from Virginia, although he has been kind enough to say that he would not hold me responsible for the action of the Legislature in adopting them. I think he must have misapprehended somewhat the resolutions, or else I have misapprehended them; and I say to him that I have no desire to escape from the responsibility of presenting them because it was my duty to do so; but I go further, and say most distinctly, that I approve and indorse what has been said in these resolutions. I say, sir, the Senator has misapprehended them, because they make no charge whatever upon the present Congress. In speaking of perfidy, they speak of the past. The resolution with reference to the Missouri restriction, has reference to a previous Congress; and I have yet to learn that it is disrespectful to this Congress to speak in disrespectful terms of one of its predecessors. I do not know that we are called upon to vindicate, in this way, what may have been done by our predecessors here.

With reference to the opinion expressed as to the repeal of the Missouri restriction, I have said the same thing upon this floor substantially, and upon any proper occasion I am ready to say it again. I always have considered the repeal of that restriction a breach of the plighted faith of the nation, and I have said so here; and I think that resolution says no more. I may have misapprehended it. I read the resolutions hastily. If I am incorrect, the Senator will correct me, as he has the resolutions before him.

The Senator has spoken of the charge of corruption upon the judiciary. Why, sir, the judiciary spoken of is the judiciary of Kansas, not of the United States. I go just as far as the Legislature of Maine does, and say that I consider it a corrupt judiciary, to all intents and purposes. I have expressed that opinion in private, and I am perfectly willing to express it in public. The acts of the judiciary of Kansas I consider to have been disgraceful to any persons holding the judicial office.

There is one other point of which the Senator has spoken, and that is the charge made upon the President of the United States of having falsified the state of things in Kansas. I am yet to learn that it is a breach of the privileges of this body to present a resolution here disrespectful in terms to the President of the United States. I do not know on what ground we should reject a petition or resolution for that reason. We have a rule or an understanding among ourselves that resolutions and petitions presented to Congress should be respectful in their terms to the body to which they are presented. That rule is very well, but I think the immunity goes no further than that; and I know of no reason why the people should not, in their addresses to Congress, speak as they feel with reference to other branches of the Government. I know nothing that they infringe.
